WILLIAM PENN, THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA—Scenes in his Life.

WILLIAM PENN.

The Founder of Pennsylvania.

Birth in 1644—Early Religious Impressions—His Career at Oxford University—His Continental Tour—Attacked by a Desperado—Becomes a Quaker and a Preacher—His Imprisonment—Before Lord Mayor Starling—Penn's American Colony Founded—His Visit to It, and Interview with the Indians—Peter the Great in England—Penn's Illness, Death, and Interment.

It is now more than two hundred years ago that William Penn first set foot on American soil. The house at New Castle, in the State which bears his name, is still pointed out where he slept on the night of the day he landed. Why he came here, what he hoped to accomplish, the motives which influenced him, and the principles on which he conducted his management of the province given to him, are matters of history with which our school boys are acquainted. It may, however, be well to give here a short sketch of them of a more personal bearing, with the object of showing how persecution and love of religious freedom are the basis on which was founded the great State of Pennsylvania, as it also was of New England.

BIRTH AND PARENTAGE.

William Penn was born, in 1644, on Tower Hill, London, a spot which has been the last on which have gazed the eyes of many illustrious men and women, as the headman's axe hangs bright beside them. His parents were young, energetic, and talented, his father, afterward Admiral Sir William Penn, being one of the greatest sea-captains of the age, taking a place among the Drakes, Frobishers, Howards, and the roll of brave seamen whose exploits raised the power and glory of their country to the proud position it occupied at the commencement of the eighteenth century. Carlyle describes the old admiral as a thorough sailor in disposition, with the virtues and the faults of his profession—"a man somewhat quick of temper, like to break his heart when affairs went wrong; unfit to right them again." His mother was Margaret Jasper, the daughter of a rich Rotterdam merchant. Thus the union of British energy and Dutch shrewdness, which surrounded Penn's childhood, contributed to the formation of the boy's character, giving it elements which constituted at once its strength and weakness. Afterward, when the Spirit of God took possession of him, the same elements were still there operating under the control of the divine power.

EDUCATION AND RELIGIOUS IMPRESSIONS.

During his childhood his father was often absent, on his country's service, on far-off seas; and upon the faithful Dutch mother devolved the nurture and training of the bright young boy. During these early years the family resided chiefly at Wanstead, a few miles out of London, on the outskirts of the beautiful Epping Forest. At Chigwell, also on the outskirts of the Forest, Penn's school-days began, in the picturesque, low-roofed, ivy-covered grammar-school which still stands. During his stay at Chigwell, young William Penn became the subject of serious religious impressions, having been attracted by the preaching of George Fox, who, like a second John the Baptist, went through the country, often barefoot, calling upon men to repent. "Woe, woe!" he cried on one occasion, as he walked through the streets of Lichfield; "woe, woe to the bloody city of Lichfield!" Fox was often in prison, often publicly beaten, but he still persevered, and crowds were drawn to him, and were induced to leave their sins and believe on Jesus. Among them was William Penn.

At the age of fifteen he was sent to study at Oxford University. Here, at first, his stay was marked by his proficiency in classical studies and in many sports and exercises. But an humble individual in the town—a Quaker, named Thomas Loe—who also had become a disciple of Fox, was preaching, and was followed by Penn and other students; and, by fervent exhortations to a life of spiritual religion, succeeded in giving several of them a distaste for some of the arrangements ordained by the University authorities. Not only did young Penn and some companions withdraw themselves from the services of the College Chapel, but when an order came down from the King, prescribing the wearing of surplices by all the students, the young men not only refused to obey the mandate themselves, but set violently upon some of the collegians, and tore their surplices off their shoulders. Such procedure could not, of course, be justified, especially in William Penn, who was expelled the University.

A FAMILY QUARREL.

A glimpse of the Penn household as it was when the expelled undergraduate returned to it in disgrace may be gained from the quaint pages of Pepys's Diary. The naval hero, the head of the house, had won a grand victory, and Mr. Pepys called at the Penn mansion, where, he says, "they are all joyed and not a little puffed up at the good successes of their father; and good service indeed is said to have been done by him. Had a great bonfire at the gate . . . and I did give the boys four shillings among them, and mighty merry [they were] . . . the consideration of the victory is too great for me presently to comprehend." Admiral Penn was now in high favor at court, and high in favor with the King and his brother, afterward James II.

It was to meet this irascible old sailor that the young man went home guilty of an offence beyond all others to him heinous—open disobedience of the King's commands. Confronted with his son, the Admiral was in a furious rage. There was a most distressing scene, "My Lady Penn and Mistress Peggy wept sore," and the Admiral bade his son quit his house and never show his face in it again. But the paternal anger did not last long. Sir William was not a vindictive or bitter man. His wife's pleadings for her son soon induced him to try gentler means with the lad of eighteen. Accordingly, young William was sent to the Continent for a while, in the hope that the gay scenes of foreign life might dissipate his serious impressions.

The scheme succeeded temporarily, for the young man plunged into the vortex of fast life, became a backslider, with a backslider's usual desperation and recklessness. It was during this visit to Paris, where society was as profigate as in London, that Penn became involved in a street fight, in which swords were drawn, and young Penn and a formidable antagonist were doing their best to kill each other. (See frontispiece.) Penn disarmed his antagonist, and was praised for his courage and forbearance.

A MOMENTOUS JOURNEY.

The young man now proposed to his father that he should enter the army, but the Admiral was bent on his following his own career of the sea; and while the question was still pending, he requested William to proceed to the South of Ireland and look after some landed estates, including Shangarry Castle, which the Admiral had recently acquired by exchange for another estate, which had been presented to him by Oliver Cromwell in return for services rendered to the Commonwealth. The old Admiral shrewdly thought that a title based on a gift of the Protector was not a particularly safe one, and he had accordingly shifted the risk to other shoulders.

While thus resident in South Ireland, and one day visiting Cork, young Penn heard that his old Oxford friend, the Quaker preacher, Thomas Loe, was about to deliver an address. Penn attended and listened, with emotion, to an eloquent sermon on the faith that overcometh the world. After the sermon the Quaker privately pleaded with the young backslider, who was brought to his knees in tears. He then boldly took his place as

A MEMBER OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

William Penn began at once openly to assemble with the despised sect, and, in consequence, was promptly committed to jail at Cork. Through the influence of the noble family of Ormonde he was soon liberated, and proceeded to London, on the summons of his father, who could hardly believe the astounding intelligence. But William's arrival proved it true; and he added to his father's fury by refusing to put off his hat, in honor to his father, or even to promise this mark of respect if admitted again to the presence of royalty. He objected to uncover his head as a token of honor to any man however exalted, the Quaker principle being that such reverence was due to God alone, and should not be offered to a mere man. But the admiral despised the explanation as fanatical and nonsensical, and once more he turned his son out of doors. For awhile William became dependent upon the private bounty of his mother and of a few members of the Quaker body, by whom he was welcomed. He became at their meetings, and entered heartily into their polemics. A controversial pamphlet, published by him at this time, alarmed the minds of a number of religious persons by his strictures on the doctrine of the Trinity, as held by the orthodox. The Bishop of London and other authorities procured his imprisonment, for eight months, in the Tower, for writing this work. During this incarceration he actively employed himself in preparing a larger volume, which has become one of the classics of Quakerism, and so continues down to the present day. The quiet hours in his solitary chamber in the Tower gave him leisure for thought, and he was led to see the mistakes of his previous pamphlet; he therefore wrote a sequel, entitled "Innocency with her Open Face," which, being regarded as a sort of retraction of at least the bolder portions of his "Sandy Foundation," he was liberated.

In 1670 William Penn again got into trouble; for in August he and Captain William Mead and others went to the Quakers' Meeting House in Gracechurch Street to worship, but found it closed by the military. They therefore gathered at the door, and Penn began to preach; whereupon he and Mead were taken before the Lord Mayor, Sir Samuel Starling, who committed them for trial at the Old Bailey. The Recorder expressed a wish that the Inquisition could be revived in England! The jurors, however, were men of the people, among whom the impression was growing that the Quakers were doing a good work in reviving religion and checking the vice which was prevalent, and which was calling upon God for vengeance on the land. They were kept for fifty hours without food, bed, or tobacco, and at length, weak and famished, handed in their final verdict—"Not guilty!" Penn, on demanding to be set at liberty, was sent back to the filthiest part of old Newgate Prison, with heavy fines upon him for appearing in court with his hat on, although, when first placed at the bar, he was bareheaded. But the Lord Mayor ordered his hat to be placed on his head, and immediately afterward fined him forty marks for "contempt of court." (See frontispiece.)

Penn's fines were paid for him by his father, who was now near his end, and was so solemnized by the approach of death that he too began to look with favor on the revival of religion. Shortly before his death the admiral said: "Son William, if you and your friends keep to your plain way of preaching and living, you will make an end of priests to the end of the world." He added: "Live all in love. Shun all manner of evil. I pray God to bless you all; and He will bless you." With these words Sir William Penn passed away, leaving his Quaker son his executor, and the personal possessor of estates worth $7500 a year, and with claims upon the King for $80,000, which had been promised him as reward for his distinguished services, but had never been paid.

THE GRANT IN AMERICA.

Howard Pyle, in his excellent work on this subject, published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers,* describes the origin of the negotiations which led to Penn's grant of land in America: "William Penn became the trustee of Byllinges and Fenwicke, who held under grant from the Duke of York, afterward James II., the whole of the land now comprising the State of New Jersey, to whom it had been given by his brother, King Charles II., when it was conquered from the Dutch. Byllinges and Fenwicke became involved in financial difficulties, and their estates passed into the hands of trustees, one of whom was William Penn. In this position he became deeply interested in the country; he devoted his attention wholly to the settlement and improvement of this part of the Jerseys, and, as his letters afterward showed, thereby made himself well acquainted with the resources of that which was to him heretofore an almost unknown world. He saw at a glance the vast possibilities it held forth to such a one as would undertake the development of them, and finally determined to found a province there, not in the loose, unsystematic way in which West Jersey was being peopled, but endowed with a good internal government for its foundation and support."

* In Harper's Magazine.

Penn saw that such a country might be a refuge for the Quakers, who, persecuted, beaten, and imprisoned in England, had in large numbers fled to America, where in some parts they were hanged. The eighty thousand dollar claim on the King was an opportunity for realizing his scheme, and he accordingly petitioned the King to liquidate his claim by a grant of the land he had chosen as a suitable place for his colony.

The poor, shiftless, impetuous King was willing to make any grants whatsoever if he could thereby escape the payment of his just debts. He would doubtless have granted the whole of North America if he could have done so. There seems to have been no trouble in that direction; the greatest difficulty arose from the conflicting claims of the Duke of York and the delays incident upon the unraveling of an almost interminable tangle of red tape connected with a transfer of such extent. But even the delays of the law must have an end some time, so at last the matter was brought to satisfactory conclusion, and William Penn, the Quaker pamphleteer, who had suffered imprisonment at Newgate, and insult and obloquy at the hands of magistrates and people, found himself the most considerable private landed proprietor the world ever saw. The royal signature was affixed to the patent that thus granted him his province under date of March 4th, 1681.

THE STATE NAMED

It was the King himself that endowed the territory with the name that it yet bears. Penn, in a semi-apology, thus describes the manner which it came about, in a letter written immediately after his grant had been finally commended to him, and while he was still warm and bliant over his success. He says:

"For my business in hand here, know that I spent many waitings, watchings, solicitings, and sputes in council, this day my country was confirmed to me under the great seal of England, with large honors and privileges, by the name of Pennsylvania: a name the King would give it in honor of my father. I chose New Wales, being, as this, a pretty hilly country, but on being the Welsh for a head—Penmaenawr in Wales, and Penrith in Cumberland, and Penn in Buckinghamshire, the highest land in England—called this Pennsylvania, which is high or head woodlands; for I proposed, when a secretary, a Welshman, refused to have it called New Wales, Sylvania, and the King ordered Penn to it; and though I much opposed and went to the King to have it struck out and altered, he said it was passed, and would keep it upon him; nor could twenty guineas over the under-secretary to vary the name; for I feared lest it might be looked upon as vanity. It is a clear and just thing, and my God at hath given it to me through many difficulties will, I believe, bless and make it the seed of a nation. I shall have a tender care to the government that it will be well laid out at first."

His first care was to direct a letter to the inhabitants of Pennsylvania apprising them of his grant from the King. At the same time he assured them of his intention of dealing honestly and justly with them. In one passage of the communication he says: "You shall be governed entirely by laws of your own making, and live a free, and, if you will, a sober and industrious people." After dispatching this notification, together with certain letters of authority from the King, he set himself vigorously to work framing a constitution, and forwarding prospectuses to various influential members of the Society.

FAIR DEALING.

In his letters and prospectuses the most liberal terms were offered to all who desired to purchase land in the new province. No flaming inducements were set forth to cajole people into securing shares in his country. He stated precisely, and with a knowledge acquired by long experience in business connected with the New World, just what they might expect if, giving up their lands in England, they sought a new home for themselves across the ocean. He says, for instance: "I know how much people are apt to fancy things beyond what they are, and that imaginations are great flatterers of the minds of men, to the end that some may delude themselves with an expectation of an immediate advancement to their conditions, so soon as it shall please God that they arrive; then would I have them understand they must look for a winter in their affairs before a summer comes; they must be willing to be two or three years without some conveniences that they enjoy at home." Further, he says, expressing his design in obtaining the grant: "As for my country, I eyed the Lord in the obtaining of it, and desire that I may not be unworthy of His love, but do that which may answer His kind providence, and serve His truth and people; that an example may be set to the nations. There may be room there, though not here, for such an holy experiment."

SETS SAIL FOR AMERICA.

In the autumn of 1682 he and a number of his friends sailed for America, and, after a six weeks' voyage, landed near the mouth of the Delaware. One of his first proceedings was to summon a general assembly of the Indian tribes of Pennsylvania, for the purpose of ratifying the celebrated treaty, whereby he desired to be honorably confirmed, by the aborigines, in possession of the soil. A copy of the treaty was then solemnly handed to the chiefs by Penn, whose genial presence, gracious manners, and dignified demeanor made a most favorable impression on the Indians. In their turn, they promised to live in love with William Penn—or Father Onas, as they called him (Onas signifying, in their tongue, a pen or quill)—and his children, so long as the sun and moon should endure. (See frontispiece.)

William Penn's first visit to America was cut short by pressing requests to return which reached him from England. His beloved wife was ill; his enemies were diffusing all manner of evil reports against him; and the Quakers were being persecuted more violently than ever, and urgently needed his powerful intercession at Court on their behalf. Penn therefore made arrangements with the colonists to carry on some, at least, of the good works which he had inaugurated. He also summoned another large gathering of the Indians, and bade them farewell, with much kindness and good advice. He especially counselled them earnestly to abstain from "fire-waters," and endeavored to prohibit the colonists from selling to them brandy or rum. He then returned to England, having already spent upon Pennsylvania, for its benefit, $6000 more than he had received for the lands (nearly equivalent to $100,000 of modern money).

About this time (1696) there might be seen working in the Royal Dockyard, at Deptford, no less a person than Peter the Great, Emperor of Russia. He went there to learn ship-building with a view to the foundation of a navy of his own. Two Quakers visited his Imperial Majesty, in York Buildings, where he took up his abode, and had through an interpreter a conversation, in which he inquired about hat-worship, as he called Quakerism. (See frontispiece.) Penn presented His Majesty with some books, which were graciously accepted, and so pleased was Peter with the interview that he actually attended a meeting at Deptford, where he conducted himself with decorum, "copying the rest in their manner of worship, sitting and standing as he could best accommodate others."

On one occasion in his life Penn paid a visit of two years' duration to his colony, but the minister of the Gospel was not merged in the governor. Subsequently, on the service of his Divine Master, and riding along the road, he pulled up his horse on seeing a poor little Quaker girl, without shoes or stockings, bent on hearing him at the meeting whither he went. "Where art thou going?" he asked. On being told, he bid her get up, and bringing his steed to a place where she could conveniently mount, off he trotted with his youthful disciple behind him. (See frontispiece.)

Penn's latter days were days of trouble and sickness. For six years longer he led a dreary life, worried with political complications and bodily illness. At last he sank into a condition of painful mental prostration, though he continued, to the last, kind and gentle to all around him. But the fine intellect, the bright and lively genius, had departed. He was the wreck of his former self.

DEATH AND INTERMENT.

At length, on the 30th of July, 1718, at the age of seventy-four, death released him from his pitiable condition, and he quietly passed away into a better world, "where the wicked cease, from troubling, and the weary are at rest."

His body was laid in the peaceful rural burial-ground of Jordans, near Uxbridge, where, after "life's fitful fever," near his varied experiences of bitter persecution and royal favor, after long voyages and arduous travels, after a noble career of splendid philanthropy, all that is mortal of William Penn peacefully awaits a glorious resurrection to eternal life, through the grace and merits of Jesus Christ our Lord.

Mission Work in Japan is Making Encouraging progress. At a meeting held last week in the Church of the Holy Trinity, in New York, Mr. J. McD. Gardiner, the head master of St. Paul's School at Tokio, gave a brief summary of the work done in Japan by Bishop Williams and nine assisting clergymen, among Japan's population of forty million of people. Although work was begun twenty-five years ago, practical results date only from 1873, when the three edicts—a penalty of death to native Christians, the banishment of foreign missionaries, and the recall of the natives who were in foreign lands—were annulled. The speaker predicted that at no distant date the Government would proclaim Christianity as the national religion of Japan. The inhabitants are just beginning to recognize, said he, that missionaries go to Japan not for selfish reasons. The favorable attitude they manifest makes the present the very best time for the advancement of the Christian religion. Mr. Gardiner said: "Food for the Japanese costs about three dollars per month, and it will probably astonish you to learn that a Japanese girl can be clothed, fed, and educated for forty dollars a year. The principal of the male school at Osaka asks but for forty-five dollars to pay the expenses of one of his pupils for the same time." Mr. Gardiner stated that one hundred and sixty converts had been made, and there was a great literary field for those who would translate religious works into the language, and thus reach the minds of the people who did not come into the churches.

CHRISTMAS IN AMERICA.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, Dec. 28, 1884.

"Then shall the lame man leap as a hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing: for in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert."—Isa. 35: 6.

Temporal Blessings from Christ's Birth—Merry Christmas—The Trouble in the Nation—Temporary Plethora—Two Duties—Help and Good Cheer—Experiments on the Nerves—The Encouraging Signs—Settlement of the Colored Question—The Colored Race in the South—Better off than in the North—Contrasted Legislatures—Gov. Colquitt and the Colored Clergyman—Among the Prophets—Encouragement from Contrast—The Burdens in Europe—Royal Burdens—Titled Land Monopolists—Ecclesiastical Rapacity—Dense Populations—National Jealousy—American Happy Homes.

FOR fourteen Christmas seasons I have spoken to you about the spiritual benefits of Christ's nativity. To-day, I speak of the temporal benefits of the Saviour's birth. Fertility to the land, health to the body, manumission to serfs, good government for the barbaric, blessing for this life as well as blessing for the life to come. Christ's cradle was as wonderful as His cross. Persuade me of the first and I am not surprised of the last. The door by which He entered was as tremendous as the door by which He went out. Through that one stable gate of Bethlehem have come in more than the world has ever celebrated in song, or sermon, or picture, or cathedral arch. "Then shall the lame man leap as a hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing, for in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert." In that one passage promised banished crutch, accentuation of speechless tongue and irrigated Sahara.

Amid a thousand mercies we give each other holiday congratulations. By long established custom we exhort each other to healthful merriment. By gift, by Christmas-trees which blossom and fruit in one night, by early morning surprise, by clusters of lighted candles, by children's procession, by sound of instruments sometimes more blatant than musical, we wake up the night and prolong the day.

I am to speak this morning more especially of Christmas times in America. In no land are there so many as in America, such varieties of food on the table, such appropriateness of wardrobe, such healthfulness of domestic architecture. At the same time, we have to-day in America a great many without work, without food, without shelter. There is something awfully wrong, as you will see when I put two facts parallel: In Dakota and Minnesota and Michigan, more wheat than they know what to do with. In the Southern States more cotton than they know what to do with. Plenty of bread, plenty of clothing, and yet, multitudes half fed, and half sheltered, and to hundreds of thousands of people it is a hungry and starving and

SHIVERING CHRISTMAS.

The trouble is, this nation has had to take too big a dose of politics. Our public men have spent too much time in destroying the equilibrium of public affairs, and business staggers and stops. The eloquent campaigners have tried to make out that the success of their party decided the fate of everything, when the fact is that with the vast multitude of us it will not make two cents' difference for the next four years who is President. But this great surplus of wheat and rice and cotton and flax must, after a while, better the condition of this nation. The national depression now is not like that which comes from deluge or drought or plague. It is more like the depression of a man who has plenty of money in the safe, and of a woman who has plenty of food in the pantry and they have lost the keys, and though it is an impatient and irritating search, the looking for the keys, they will find them, and there will be plenty to eat, and there will be plenty to wear, and there will be plenty to read and there will be plenty of all styles of comfort.

I enjoin upon all those whom these holiday times find in comfortable circumstances two things: First, helpfulness to the helpless—and the next,

CHEERFUL TALK.

This experiment has been made by medical scientists. A dozen men conspire to tell a well man he looks sick. They are to meet him on a journey and by the time the fourth man is giving him melancholy salutation, he feels he is doomed; and the twelfth man comes up with his melancholy salutation just in time to help carry him home on a stretcher. Then twelve men conspire that they will meet a man in uncertain health and tell him how well he looks. By the time the fourth man has met him with a cheerful salutation, his nervous system is all toned up, and by the time the twelfth man has met him with his cheerful salutation, he says to his wife: "Throw out that apothecary shop from our shelves: I don't want any more medicine."

Now, the nation is only a man on a larger scale. If you want to prostrate business and keep it prostrated, talk in dolorous tone and keep on talking. Let all the merchants sigh and all the editors prognosticate a hard winter, and all the ministers groan in the pulpit. In the great those who play the loudest trombones are those who have the fullest salaries and the completest wardrobe. They are only mad because they have to fall back upon the surplus resources of other years, or because they cannot make as large investments as they would like to make. Did you have your breakfast? Yes. Did you have your supper last night? Yes. Did you have a pillow to sleep on? Yes. What are you complaining about? The genuine sufferers, those who are really in destitution for the most part suffer in silence; but the loudest cries against hard times are by the men to whom the times are not hard. Artists tell us it is almost impossible to sing well on a full stomach, but it has been demonstrated over and over again that it is possible for men to groan well on a full stomach!

Now, in these holidays let all the comfortable classes exchange the Lamentations of Jeremiah for the exultant Psalms of David. "Praise ye the Lord, let everything that hath breath praise the Lord," and we will have a different state of things in this country. I wish there might be a conspiracy formed—I would like to belong to it—a conspiracy made up that all the merchants and editors and ministers of religion in this country agree that they would have faith in God and talk cheerfully, and there would be a revival of business immediate and tremendous and glorious. Stop singing Naomi and old Windom, and give us Mount Pisgah and Coronation. Merry Christmas!

There is a very cheerful Christmas thought at this time in the fact that the great question which for sixty years has been dominant in politics, in philanthropy and in religion is coming to a righteous solution. What of in this country? You know that that question put a million men into the grave trenches and ever since the war closed it has kept our national finances in a jangle. Through the five thousand miles of my recent journey up and down the South and up and down the South-west I kept asking that question, and I kept getting an answer from all classes of persons and from both colors, and I believe I can give you the right impression this morning when I say I believe the black man is better treated at the South than he is treated at the North.

In Montgomery, Alabama, the day I spent there, the Legislature of the State passed a law for the full and complete education of colored people, making it a specialty. Colored mechanics have large wages and plenty of employment all though the South. The colored men of New Orleans have their three dollars a day and are expecting more wages. The colored people have the preference in the South service in all the hotels and boarding-houses and in the railroads and in the steamers. They are represented

IN THE STATE LEGISLATURES.

The eloquent and accomplished United States Senator Bruce, whom I met on my journey, only an illustration of the possibilities of colored men of the South. In how many of the Legislatures of the North are there colored men? How many are there in the Legislature of New York? How many in the Legislature of Massachusetts? If in the North a colored man come into any kind of service all the other servants run—all the other servants resign. There is a more kindly and Christian feeling among the white people of the South toward the black people than there is at the North. If we were a black man and had a family and we determined to be industrious and sober, would go to the South. I have noticed the treatment of colored men in the North and have noticed the treatment of colored men in the South, and I believe justice will come to the black man at the South sooner than will come at the North. We cannot at the North teach the South how to treat the black man until we treat him better ourselves.

I will imagine a scene. A Northern Legislature assembles. White men take the oath of office, as legislators they take the oath. A colored man has been accidentally elected. He passes in to take his seat, what do the white members of the Legislature say? "Put the colored gentleman near me?" No. "I made God cut in ebony?" No. "Downcast race come to justice at last?" No. They all snarl the breeze, and their hair rises in indignation and they say, "Nigger!" There is a more Christian and kindly feeling among the white people of the South toward the black than the is at the North.

As for myself, I am so peculiarly constituted that I have not in my nature one particle of race prejudice, and I could sit in church perfectly contented, with a colored man before me and a colored man behind me, and a colored man at the right, and a colored man at the left and a black man in the pulpit, and a black man to lead the music. But we are not all constituted alike. But you may depend that among the merriest Christmas thoughts to-day, America, ought to be the consideration that there is coming a more Christian feeling between the races.

A DRAMATIC SCENE.

Some years ago, in the State House of Georgia, at Atlanta, this scene occurred: A colored minister, standing in the State House said he was thirsty, and he was looking something to drink. A white gentleman staring by, said, "I'll get you a drink," and departed the room. As the white gentleman was coming back with a glass of water for this black clergyman some one said to the clergyman, "Do you know who that is who is bringing you a glass of water?" No, who is it?" "That is Governor Colquitt." Then the black man took the glass of water and said, "Thank you, Governor, but I cannot drink this under such circumstances," and he poured it out on the floor, saying: "I pour this out as a libation to the altar of Christian feeling between the races." Dramatic? Yes, but glorious Christian.

It is among the merriest of thoughts this morning, that this awful question that has been agitating politics and agitating religion North and South is coming to a Christian solution. Come now.

I WILL PROPHECY.

The land is full of prophets, and I have as much right to prophecy as any one. I prophecy that we are coming on toward the grandest temporal prosperity we have ever witnessed in this country. Mechanics are going to have larger wages capitalists are going to have larger dividends. The factories that are now closed are going to be open day and night to meet demands. Stores are going to be crowded with customers, jostling each other and impatient to get waited on. Amid the rapid strides of business, attorneys will be called in to interpret legalities, and merchants overworked will want medical attendance, and the churches are going to be abundant with men and women anxious to consecrate their gains to the Lord.

You prophecy midnight. I prophecy mid-noon. You pitch your tent toward universal bankruptcy. I pitch my tent toward national pulchre. "What are your reasons?" you say. Give you

ONE DOMINANT REASON, God's evident determination to shower prosperity on this nation. Five years of unexampled harvests. Five years of unprecedented health. Five years of unfeigned amity. Northern Pacific Railroad apocalypse, in one direction. New Orleans Exposition apocalypse in another direction.

When at New Orleans week before last, I saw dark-skinned Mexican flutist thrill fifteen thousand people into transport and ecstasy. I said to myself: "You are just in front of a great host of the southern republics and of the southern empires that are going to join us in a march of commercial prosperity which shall surpass anything that the most optimistic capitalist ever saw in his most enchanted midsummer night's dream. While I am fully sympathetic with the DEPRESSION ABROAD, and no man in this audience has a heart that throes thoroughly bleeds for the people of this country who are out of work and out of bread, I prophecy national rescue, and just as it is faithful to a man when he is depressed about himself just to walk about amid the destitution and the suffering and he will come back thankful to God for all the mercies He has, just as it would do this nation good if it would ask across the water and see how other nations are off. So many men in this country out of employ, and yet, there is not a land on earth where so many people have productive work as this country.

After wages have been cut down as they have been, to the lowest point of reduction, that lowest point is higher than the highest on the other side the seas. Eight cents a day for work in Ireland. One dollar in England good wages for a day. The laboring classes of this country have it ten per cent better than they have in any other country, twenty per cent, thirty per cent, fifty per cent, seventy-five per cent. The editor of an important paper in London, told me his salary was seven hundred and fifty dollars a year.

Stand in front of the factories on the other side the sea, observe the people coming out and follow them to their homes and see what they suffer. The stone-masons and the carpenters and the plumbers and the shoemakers in our land, and all styles of mechanics and artisans have finer residences than some of the professional men in England. We go into the house of a mechanic on this side the sea, and he has pictures and he has upholstery and he has an instrument of music. He has his children educated in the best schools of Brooklyn and New York. He has his life insured so that in case of his sudden death, his family will not be left homeless. While all my sympathies are roused in behalf of the laboring classes, to-day, I want all the men who toil to understand that America is the paradise of industry.

So also, these Christmas times in America find in a POLITICAL QUIET that characterizes no other nation. A gentleman in a railroad in England said to me "I don't understand how you endure a revolution every four years in America. You ought to have a queen as we have, or a king, and have things settled. Why, the administration changes very often on the other side the sea, and it changes just as radically. There is an advisory vote and Disraeli goes and Gladstone comes in, and then, after a while, there will be another advisory vote and Gladstone will go and somebody else will come in. A change perhaps will be effected in a year or six months while in our land the administration starting must go on for four years unless some great disaster happens. Political quiet. No outcry of hatred or contempt. No threat of assassination. Peace, complete peace all over the land.

I never remember such a time of peace in America as we have to-day. There are people who say: "Oh, there is so much stealing on the part of public men in this country," and they say it is so much better on the other side the sea. The reason is a few people on the other side the sea steal everything, and there is nothing left for the great masses to steal! After the government has paid the large of those lands there is nothing left upon which one can commit larceny. The Emperor of Russia eight million dollars salary a year. Emperor of Austria four million dollars salary a year. Queen of England two million two hundred thousand dollars salary a year. Master of the Buckhounds eight thousand a year. So on all down, and the expenses are made in this way. Do you not think it is really better that we be overtaxed, and then that money be divided up among the Congressmen and the legislators and the lobbyists, rather than that people should be overtaxed and the whole result of it piled up in a palace? I think in our land there is more probability that the money will get back again to its legitimate channels.

And then, while we have so many wrong things on this side the sea, and there is so much complaint about

MONOPOLISTIC OPPRESSION

—and it is bad enough—it is not half so bad here as it is in other lands. I know the air is full of fear about the great fortunes gathered by some individuals or great commercial houses. As a great protuberance on the neck means sickness to the whole body, so these disproportioned estates mean sickness to the body politic, and these enormous fortunes mean pinchedness of want somewhere. And yet, it is not half as bad here as it is in other lands. Ireland one vast

MONOPOLISTIC DEVASTATION.

Thirty-two million people in England, and yet thirty-two thousand own all the land. Duke of Devonshire owning ninety-two thousand acres of land at Derby. Duke of Richmond owning three hundred thousand acres at Gordon Castle. Marquis of Breadalbane riding one hundred miles in a straight line and all on his own property. Duke of Sutherland owning a farm—an estate as wide as Scotland, one side of the estate dipping into the sea on one side and the other side dipping into the sea on the opposite side. Great ecclesiastical monopolies. Cathedrals with stately and braided arch and walls covered with masterpieces of Rubens and Raphael and Michael Angelo; against all the sides of them the great seas of want and woe and filth and abomination dashing. It is bad enough here; it is worse elsewhere!

Beside that, on the other side the seas they are!

ALL CROWDED UP

—cities crowded together, the populations crowded together, institutions of learning crowded—packed, everything between the Pyrenees and the Alps—packed, everything between the Rhine and the Danube—packed, everything between the English Channel and the Adriatic. If the fortunes are to be gathered there they must be gathered out of somebody else's fortune, while in this land we have illimitable prairie, illimitable forest, inexhaustible mine. Eight million square miles in North America.

PLENTY OF ROOM.

The State of Texas larger than France, larger than Germany. Four great basins emptying into the Atlantic, the Pacific, the Arctic and the Mexican Gulf. We have only just begun to spread our Christmas table. We have only put on it the first silver fork and the first salt-cellar and the first loaf of bread and the first smoking dish. Wait until the fruits come in from all the orchards, and the vegetables from all the gardens, and the meats from all the markets, and the silver from all the mines. Then the great national bell will be rung, and it will call millions of people from between ocean and ocean, and it will say to all the millions between the Thousand Isles and the Gulf of Mexico, "Come and dine." While there are so many things in these holidays to depress us, there are a thousand things to rejoice us.

Then look at the

of this country. No war with foreign land. No war with ourselves. Fifteen million men belonging to the standing armies of Europe to-day. Since our war ended, over there the Zulu war, the Afghan war, the Egyptian war, the Russo-Turkish war, the Franco-German war. Peace not a certainty for another year. Nation watching nation suspiciously, lest it get the balance of power. Four nations month after month watching the Suez Canal as four cats might watch one rat. Royal marriages to keep the balance of Europe. Bright princess compelled to marry some disagreeable foreign dignitary, the ill-matched pair fighting out on a small scale what would have been international contest.

In this land all at peace. I cannot think of anything now that could possibly bring on a war. We have all had enough of that. Fort Sumpter, Fort Moultrie, Fort Pulaski, Fort Lafayette, Fort Warren, the lions of war sound asleep on their iron paws. Gunpowder out of fashion, only used to blast rocks, or for pyrotechnic display, or to shoot reed birds down on the flats. Inter-marriage between North and South—Northern men marrying Southern wives, Southern men marrying Northern wives. The consanguineal ties multiplying, the children half Mississippian and half New Englander, so if there should be an attempt to make war between North and South you would have to do as Solomon proposed to do with the child that was brought to him, cut it in twain by the sword, and give half to the North and half to the South. The hardest thing on earth to split is a cradle. "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good will to men."

I have seen this spirit of kindness and AMITY ALL THROUGH THE LAND. You and I in this respect never saw such a Christmas. While there are so many things we deplore, there are so many things about which to thank God. But while amid so many alleviating circumstances the nation keeps the holiday, I wish especial HAPPINESS FOR YOUR HOUSEHOLDS.

Let middle-aged men and the aged men during these seven or ten holidays rally all their sprightliest feeling and put themselves in accord with the young. Make this a bright memory. They will very soon have to put their shoulder under the burden of life and harness themselves for the world's battle. Father, mother, help them now to get a surplus of exuberance that will last them when life has become a serious thing to them, as it has become to us. When you and I have gone out of the struggle, and in the far distant holidays they think of us, as they will think of us, do not let them think of us as grumpy and dull, sitting around discoursing about our aches and pains when we ought to have been sympathetic with their merriment, and after all this gift bestowing has ceased, and all these family unions have ceased, and after we no more light the Christmas candles, and we no more on earth rejoice in the children's glee, may it be because we are all together in our Father's house keeping the eternal celebration. May we all be there, not one of our households absent, all there, saved and blessed through birth and death of Him who was the Son of Mary and the Son of God.

GATHERING STORM-CLOUDS IN GERMANY.

STUDENTS of prophecy have long realized that in the last days there will be an outbreak of socialist communism in its fiercest and most uncontrollable shape. Indications abound that the forces of this frog-like spirit are growing. The following report from a press correspondent in Germany, who is usually well informed, describes the ominous character of the situation there.

The language employed by Prince Bismarck, while opposing a bill for the payment of members of the Reichstag, clearly denotes the gravity with which he views the recent successes of the Social Democrats. This danger the Chancellor has never denied, and his personal dealings with the Socialists in former times, prove how anxious he has been to reconcile this element of the population. His efforts in this direction have, however, never proved successful; and the return of twenty-four Social Democrats at the last general elections implies even more than can be inferred by the figures given.

On referring to the map of Germany, it will be seen that the strength of the Socialists is concentrated principally in strategical positions. Should a popular revolution occur the revolutionary party would be best able to act precisely where the railways converge; and if successful in these various centres could easily paralyze the entire country. Such important stations on the main channels of communications as Frankfurt, Dresden, Berlin, Breslau, Magdeburg, Dusseldorf, and Hamburg, if seized by the leaders of a popular rising, would render them in a great measure masters of the situation. At Hamburg, for instance, the Socialists represent the absolute majority of voters, and, judging from past experience, their numbers will continue to increase. Sooner or later matters must come to a climax, for a compromise is almost out of the question.

Against the formidable growth of Socialism in 1876 Prince Bismarck declared himself powerless, unless the Socialists were outlawed. At this word Liberals and Catholics coalesced to pass the Socialist law, which was brought into operation in 1878. Yet this enactment, in spite of its Draconian character, served, at best, but as a temporary check, and now than ever. With twenty-four members in the Reichstag they can hope occasionally to hold the balance of power, and are legally qualified to introduce bills. This great success has been achieved without surrendering any part of the revolutionary programme, and of course puts the feasibility of compromise almost out of question.

The object steadily held in view is Communism—that is to say, the nationalization of the land, of the railways, mines, factories, ships, machinery—in fact, all the implements of production. Every one would thus be compelled to work; no rich classes, living in idleness, could be tolerated; money, if possible, might be abolished; and, in any case, the power of hoarding or capitalizing money rendered illegal. Every one would be called upon to work to the best of his ability, and be paid, not according to what he did, but whatever was judged necessary for his existence. It is only after the necessities for a healthy and rational life had been provided for every living person that society would be allowed to work to secure ease and then luxury. None but the producers themselves can be entrusted to realize such a scheme; and therefore, while this is held up as the ideal, all action for the present is restricted to acquiring that power without which the economical emancipation of the proletariat is impossible.

Thus, the principle proclaimed by the International in 1867 is re-echoed throughout Germany to-day by more than half a million electors. With so large a number of men advocating emphatically opinions of so subversive a nature, the prospect of a peaceful settlement is not very promising; and the fact, pointed out in the first instance, that Socialism is strongest in strategical centres of the Empire, is therefore of ominous import.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

The Ewe Following the Lamb.—An Evangelist, at a recent meeting, related the following incident: "A shepherd was once driving his flock over a stream. He got them all over but one. He tried in every possible way to get that one over, but it would not move. While he stood wondering how he should get it across, he noticed a lamb not far away, and going to it, he lifted the little creature in his arms, and carried it across the stream; and now the ewe ran after him. This is the way the Lord sometimes deals with His children. When they rebel, and are disobedient, perhaps He takes a little child from them, lifts it up in His arms, and carries it home to induce its parents to follow it 'across the stream into heaven.'"

Playing Cards in a Burning House.—"I read lately of a fire which took place in a large house in London. There were two young men in the house playing cards, when the cry arose, warning all in the house to escape. But the two players heeded it not. One of them looking said, 'Oh, we have time to play a little yet,' and they settled themselves again to their game. Again the warning cry was heard. One rose, opened the door, and looked out. This time the smoke was leaping up-stairs, but going back into the room, he said: 'We will have time to finish our game; three minutes will do it.' And they continued to play, and finished the game. Now they made haste to escape; but, alas! it was too late. The staircase had already given way, and there was no other means of escape. The flames reached the room in which they were standing, and they perished there. Oh, how can people from day to day shut their ears to the cry that is rising all around them to escape for their life!"

Light Found at Last.—A Christian Sister related: "I once knew a young girl who was very anxious about her soul. She went into a meeting one night, and the minister read out the text, 'He is able to save unto the uttermost, all that come unto God through Him.' I saw that the girl was weeping bitterly, and at the end of the service I spoke to her. She told me she had to be home at a certain hour, and therefore could not wait. She gave me her address, and I called upon her the following day. I found her still anxious. She said she could not find the light. I thought, 'I'll put myself in the girl's place and ask her to take mine.' I did so, and asked her to pray; but she said, 'If you will pray, I will repeat what you say.' We knelt down together, and she repeated each word as I prayed. I said: 'Lord, I believe,' and she repeated, 'Lord, I believe.' I shall never forget the scream of joy which she uttered when she received this unspeakable gift. She is now living a happy, earnest Christian life."

A Tragic Family Story.—The Rev. Mr. Pugh said: "A beautiful young lady married a handsome and wealthy young gentleman. Two years afterward they had to leave their fashionable house and go into small apartments. He had taken to drinking, and brought his young wife down lower and lower in the social scale. One night while she sat sewing to earn her bread, she thought, 'I wish I were dead; oh, if I were only lying in the church-yard beside my mother and father, and this miserable life ended!' While she was thinking, her husband entered the house and said, 'I have gained twenty pounds ($100) to-day, and I am going out again; who knows but I may gain as many more to-night, and make you comfortable once more.' 'O Willie,' she said, 'do not go out again, but stay in the house for one night!' But he went out, telling her not to give him any of her lectures. She sat there quietly sewing until past midnight. The hours went slowly by, and at half-past three she heard a great noise on the stairs; and rising hastily, she opened the door, when her husband rushed past her into the room, crying, 'I have murdered him! Oh, I have murdered a man for calling me a thief, and the policemen are in search of me!' While he thus spoke, two constables entered the room, and arrested him. On his trial he was found guilty and condemned to death. His wife, when she heard of it, became hopelessly insane, and had to be taken to a lunatic asylum, and their only child was taken to the almshouse. Thus ended what might have been a happy family circle but for the use of strong drink."

A Visit to City Slums.—Mr. Peden Says: "A Christian gentleman was once on a visit among the lowest slums of one of our great cities. Entering one of the houses he saw a man in a very dejected state of mind, and, after a little conversation, the gentleman opened to him the way of life through Jesus Christ. When he had finished, the man said: 'It is impossible that I can be a Christian in the midst of such surroundings.' But the gentleman assured him that it was possible to testify for Christ in the very lowest parts of the earth. The man replied, 'I believe you feel an interest in us at heart when you came to speak to us but would you come and live among us?' The gentleman at once shrank from that, and confessed that he could not. And then thought arose in his mind, 'I cannot have the spirit of Master; He did not shrink from living with the greatest sinners. I can go among them and speak to them, but I cannot live with them.' How very imperfect the very best of God's people are! Christ took His place among the lowest of the land, administering comfort and blessing to all around Him."

Saved from a Suicide's Doom.—A Christian worker related: "I knew of a woman who had a very cruel and ungodly husband. He was much given to strong drink, and often beat and ill-used his wife. One night coming home intoxicated, he beat her, and putting her out of the house, said if she dared to return to it he would take her life. She wandered she knew not whither. She did not know Jesus, and had not a single friend to whom she could go in her grief. It was a dark, stormy night, but no and again the soft moon shone out from behind the heavy cloud. The poor creature was weary of life, and resolved to put an end to it; and with these thoughts in her mind, she made her way to the water. Just as she was about to throw herself in, the moon shone out, and a piece of white paper fluttered at her feet. Scarcely noticing what she did, she bent down and picked it up. It was the leaf of a Bible, and looking at it, she read these words: 'Take heed what thou doest.' She rushed from that dark river and went home. Her husband was lying in a drunken stupor. She threw herself at the feet of Jesus, and asked, and received forgiveness of all her sins; and then she rested with childlike trust, upon Him. She now had a friend to whom she could tell all her trouble. He could sympathize, pity, and help her as no other one could."

THE MILLENNIAL AGE.

By Mr. C. Russell Hurditch.

THE Millennium is not a symbolical statement. How can men say so with the open Bible before them? "They lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years." These words describe a fact, not a symbol. Then it is not a symbolical reign of Christ, it is a personal reign of Christ over this earth, the scene of His rejection and suffering and death.

Again, it is a distinct dispensation, differing from all that have gone before. We are not under the dispensation of the Spirit. But though it is a distinct dispensation it will in some respects be like this, for the Gospel will be preached and the Holy Spirit will carry on His work more widely than ever before.

Another thought is that during the Millennium there will be communion interchanged between heaven and earth, such as cannot be in joyed now. There will be some such blessed fellowship between the heavenly and earthly Jerusalem as obtained in Eden before man's fall. Then the glorified people of God, the Bride, the Lamb's wife, shall reign with Him over the earth; "they live and reign with Him a thousand years." Then it will be the final dispensation. God has manifested Himself in divers ways, but in this final dispensation God's covenant with His people will be carried out.

IN ALL ITS LITERAL FULLNESS.

Now it is blessed to think that soon Christ shall be manifested and this Millennial day shall dawn. How it rejoices our hearts, cast down by the rising tide of infidelity and lawlessness, discouraged by the slow progress the Gospel is making. In view of all this we remember that Jesus Christ shall yet be welcomed and exalted, and His name held in reverence forever. Read Isa. 9 and Ps. 45, and see the glowing description given of that kingdom where the King shall reign in righteousness.

That age will be ushered in by the first resurrection and a widespread judgment on Christendom and Israel. The time of the tribulation is coming rapidly on us, the time when God's people will be driven together, if they will not draw together. These events will be accompanied by a multitude of conversions, the Spirit of God sending out His servants with marvellous power. I believe Jerusalem, not London, will then be the headquarters of the great missionary societies. Then love as well as power shall be manifested. Victor Hugo, the great Frenchman, said, at the time of the French collapse, after the German war, "The need of the day is a man of marvellous genius, able to take the reins of this world, and rightly lead and govern." These words are true; they shall be fulfilled in a sense we never thought of. Then Satan shall be bound, evil checked, and we shall see the development, during the thousand years, of everything that is good. No wonder, in view of these things, the Old Testament is full of glowing descriptions of the joy, peace, comfort, prosperity, and contentment of that blessed time, when creation itself shall share in the glorious liberty of the sons of God.

A FAITHFUL MINISTRY.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 11, Acts 20: 17-27. Golden Text, ver. 20. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Paul's Purposes—In the Spirit—Independent of Man—The Testimony of the Elders—A True Pastor's Life—Serving in Humility of Mind—The Teaching of a Pastor's Life—Paul's Service of Tears and Trials—Close Communication with Souls—Farewell Words.

PAUL in his journey toward Jerusalem did not touch at Ephesus, "because he would not spend the time in Asia." He knew full well how many hearts there would welcome him, and how almost impossible it would be for him to pass rapidly away from them. "He hastened, if it were possible for him, to be at Jerusalem the day of Pentecost." Nearly a year before, while he was still laboring at Ephesus, "Paul purposed in the Spirit, when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem, saying, After I have been there, I must also see Rome" (Acts 19: 21). No niere thought of what was most convenient led him to think thus. Paul's purpose was "in the Spirit." Consequently he did not take into account how many at Ephesus among his converts might be hurt and wounded in spirit that he should pass them by, although so near their city. Paul saw his responsibility to God, and referred to Him all which man expected from him. This made him what he was, while he still was free "from all men" (1 Cor. 9: 19). He was not playing a game of chance; and being by his very faith in God independent of circumstances, circumstances did not trouble him. He detected everywhere, and at all times, an overruling hand, and gloried in the fact that "all things work together for good to them that love God."

Arrived at Miletus, he sent for the elders of the Ephesian Church. Any messages which they may have brought him, any entreaties to visit their city, would be only met in one way, "The Lord does not permit." When the elders were come to him, Paul called on them to bear witness to his ministry among them. On another occasion, when speaking of himself, he said, "I speak foolishly," and "I speak as a fool" (II Cor. 11: 23). Paul had no other apostle of Christ to whom he could point as an example of what Christ could be and could do in an elder of His Church. Thus he speaks of himself: "Ye know, from the first day that I came into Asia, after what manner I have been

WITH YOU AT ALL SEASONS."

A pastor who lives his life among his people is always highly valued by them. Jesus lived our life in all things; in the home, in the workshop, at the marriage feast, by the grave of Lazarus, there was Jesus. Never in the midst of worldly pageants, but in every circumstance of domestic life. And a pastor of our own day in whom Christ lives out His life is just as full of interest for His people, just as forgetful of self; for where Jesus is He cannot be hid.

Paul says how he served the Lord "with all humility of mind, and with many tears and temptations [or trials] which befel me by the laying in wait of the Jews." Paul's humility of mind was the same as Peter speaks of when he says, "Humble yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God" (1 Pet. 5: 6); it was the constant acknowledgment of God in all which happened. True humbleness of mind is to know that God knows best, and does best. Paul saw God in all the annoying thwarting of his work by the unbelieving Jews, and he could rejoice in these "reproaches," "persecutions," and "distresses" for Christ's sake (II Cor. 12: 10), for only so could "the power of Christ rest upon him" to remain unmoved while under them, or to be delivered out of them. Nothing teaches a people so much as

THE LIFE OF THEIR PASTOR.

If they see that he sees the hand of God in all which occurs in his family, in all his relations with other men, then they can believe in all which he teaches them about trusting God. If they see that he takes to God all the troubles about which they tell him, and that he falls back upon God, it strikes them much more than any words could do which he might speak. If they see that God answers his prayers, they have an evidence that God is the Answerer of prayer. Then, if in anything he has wronged them, and he confesses and owns it to them, this teaches them the grace of confession as nothing else can. I remember when a girl at school, one day my music master saying to me, "I was out of temper with you when I gave you the last lesson; will you forgive me?" It is now thirty-five years since, but the respect, almost reverence, I have had for that man ever since I could not easily describe. I had never before heard any one own a fault to an inferior. A pastor who will do so serves the Lord with "all humility of mind." But Paul served the Lord with

TEARS AND TRIALS.

His heart was in his work—he was no machine—his whole soul was engaged in it; and thus, whether laughing with joy or weeping with sorrow, he did it unto the Lord; he was "sorrowful, yet always rejoicing" (II Cor. 6: 10). To serve the Lord with temptations [or trials], is to let Him accomplish His purpose through them. His purpose in permitting a trial is increased blessing to His tried child, and through him to others, as in the case of Abraham, Joseph, Moses, and many others. So, to serve God with trials, we cannot be in a hurry to get rid of them, but rather "count it all joy when [we] fall into divers temptations; knowing this, that the trial of [our] faith worketh patience" (James 1: 2).

Then Paul said, "I kept back NOTHING THAT WAS PROFITABLE unto you." "I dare not preach as you do," said a minister one day, "for if I did, I should lose half my salary." It was a poor reason for keeping back that which was profitable; surely, God was equal to the charge of caring for his salary! Paul's teaching was "publicly, and from house to house." Public preaching, without any close dealing with individual souls, always becomes more or less theoretical. Nothing makes a preacher so practical as a real knowledge of the spiritual needs of his people, and this he can only get as he becomes acquainted with them individually. It was this personal acquaintance with them which he mentions to the Thessalonians, "We exhorted and comforted, and charged every one of you, as a father doth his children" (I Thess. 2: 11).

What, then, was

THE BURDEN OF HIS TEACHING?

"Repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ." Repentance means "a change of mind or will; all which was turned against God now turned to Him; the stubborn, perverse will which refused His mercy, now bowed to Him in true submission. This is repentance toward God. The fool says, 'No God,' the repentant sinner says, 'I want God, I must have God, and at any cost.' Then 'faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ' comes in as the life power. Maintaining always the true position of repentance toward God—i.e., God first in everything—faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ makes all the life of holiness to which He calls us, possible and practical. 'I will serve God,' is the word of repentance; 'I can serve God' is the utterance of faith." Paul's preaching was not of one kind to the Jews and another kind to the Greeks; he had the same Gospel for all. And his Gospel was not a mere logical conclusion; he testified it as being himself a witness of it.

And having thus spoken, he broke to the Ephesian elders the fact that this was a farewell meeting. "And now, behold, I go bound in the Spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there; save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions abide me." Should Paul draw back? Should he doubt the leading of God? Could it really be God who guided him to go forward into imprisonment, and thus to be hindered from the preaching which, more than that of any other man, had been used to establish the kingdom of Christ on earth; could it be God's leading? Paul did not doubt it for a moment; God spoke to his soul, and wherever He led, there His servant was ready to follow. "But none of these things move me," he said; "neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus to testify the Gospel of the grace of God." "Joy," when only bonds and afflictions awaited him! Paul speaking ironically? No, no; far from it. Paul's joy, like our Lord's, was to do the will of God. He had had proof of the power of God in a prison from his experience at Philippi, and all the past dealings of God with him were only a strong encouragement to trust more for the future.

A LAST FAREWELL.

Paul had many sorrows, but he was always rejoicing; his joy was never suspended, because the Lord's own joy was in him (John 15: 11); and very truly the joy of the Lord was his strength. Paul never worried over plans upset, for he never made any; he had no trouble about funds for his work; the Lord was his banker, cashier, and treasurer, and it was impossible ever to have his account overdrawn. The things which vex most men could not touch Paul, because he saw God in everything, and so every step forward toward persecution and prison was just "joy." "And now, behold," he says, "I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see my face no more. Wherefore I take you to record this day, that I am pure from the blood of all men. For I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God." How many of God's working children can say the same?

per annum, payable in advance.

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A New Year's Greeting to all its Readers. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD cordially tenders on this new year's day, 1885. It wishes them, in the best sense of the words, a happy new year. To many of them it is becoming an old and valued friend. It is gratifying to learn that it has also been a useful friend as is proved by the large numbers of letters which during the past few weeks have been received from every State in the Union, every Territory, every Province of Canada, from the West Indies, China, Africa, Australia and other distant lands. Correspondents say that God has blessed the paper to the conversion of members of their own families or friends, sometimes under very remarkable circumstances, and many of God's people acknowledge with thankfulness their indebtedness to it for comfort and support in trial. These letters afford great encouragement to those engaged on the paper, and will stimulate them to new effort. May it be still more useful in the future to its old and to its new friends. The editor, personally, takes this opportunity of gratefully acknowledging the kindly words in which so many subscribers, in renewing their subscriptions, express their appreciation of his work. It is impossible to reply individually, but he here thanks them heartily for their commendation and good wishes. More than six years ago, he had the privilege of editorially introducing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the public, and he is humbly grateful to God for the blessings that since then have been so manifestly bestowed in answer to prayer. It is hoped that the readers of the paper will continue to pray that God will use the paper during this year, as in the past, for His glory and the public good.

Subscribers whose Terms expired with last week's number will receive their copy as usual this week. This is done because, during the holidays, renewals are often postponed, and many who intend to renew, do not send until after New Year's. At the end of this week, the list will be corrected and the names dropped of all whose subscriptions have expired and from whom we have not heard. A wrong date will appear on many labels this week. During the past few days, so many renewals have been received that it has been impossible in some cases to change the date in type to that covered by the renewal.

The Treaties Waiting for Ratification by the Senate were the most prominent subject of interest in political circles last week, apart from speculations about the new Cabinet and the New York Senatorship which were in the main idle ones. The Nicaraguan treaty is regarded with some favor, though there are many drawbacks which will cause some doubt and hesitation. These are chiefly that the cutting of a canal is likely to cost nearly one hundred and fifty millions and will in the hands of the Government be liable to lead to wasteful expenditure; also that the maintenance of a force to guard the canal will be a heavy burden. The treaty will probably involve anxious consideration and an exhaustive discussion before it is ratified. The Spanish Treaty has less favorable prospects. The New York Chamber of Commerce last week deliberated on its provisions and condemned it. The business men doubted whether the country would regain in future years the thirty million dollars it would lose to the Cuban sugar planters in the first year of the operation of the treaty. Opinion in Congress appears to be on the same side.

Another Attempt to have a Liquor Commission appointed was made by the Senate on December 22d. It passed for the fourth time the bill "to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic." It provides for the appointment of a commission of seven persons, not more than four of whom shall belong to the same political party nor be advocates of Prohibition. They are to serve without salary, but are to have their expenses paid. The work is not to occupy more than two years, and is to consist of an investigation of the relations of the liquor traffic "to revenue and taxation and its general economic, criminal, moral, and scientific aspects in connection with pauperism, crime, social vice, the public health, and general welfare of the people." They are also to inquire as to the practical results of license and prohibitory legislation in the several States. Ten thousand dollars is appropriated to cover the expenses of the commission.

A Civil Action in the Star Route Cases has been commenced. The suit was instituted in the United States Circuit Court in California, by the District Attorney against William Henry Forse, to recover sixty-one thousand, seven hundred and eighty-two cents. In the complaint it is alleged that Forse contracted to carry the United States mails between Cloverdale and Eureka, Humboldt County, for a term of four years, commencing July 1st, 1878. For carrying the mail six times a week he was to receive eleven thousand dollars a year. In October, 1879, the contract was so amended that Forse was allowed three thousand, five hundred and eighty-one dollars and fifty-five cents a year additional for increased expenses in hiring men and horses for carrying the mails seven times a week. It is claimed that for this service he was paid one hundred and nineteen thousand, four hundred and thirty-seven and one cent, which was sixty one thousand, seven hundred dollars and eighty-two cents more than he was entitled to, as he ran the mails through seven times a week with the same force of men and horses which he had employed in carrying them six times a week.

Gloomy Reports of the Number of Unemployed men are published by Bradstreet's. It gives information received from four thousand correspondents throughout Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri, and all States north of them. These twenty-two States employ nine tenths of the wage earners in mechanical pursuits reported in the census. Thirteen per cent three hundred and sixteen thousand, two hundred and forty-nine, are reported unemployed, and wages have been reduced from ten to thirty per cent. In detail, it appears that eighty thousand iron workers are idle, as are also thirty-five thousand makers of clothing, twenty thousand cotton operatives, and twenty four thousand woollen. There is no work for eighteen thousand makers of boots and shoes, nor for thirteen thousand cigar makers, four thousand seven hundred glass makers, and two thousand silk weavers.

A Wonderful Ice Palace is in Course of Erection in Montreal. The structure is round, tapering to a point, its base diameter measuring fifty feet. Its height, to which will be added a colossal statue, is seventy-five feet, built in a series of seven stories, finished up with a crown, and is intended to represent one of the old Egyptian castles, which were named condoras. In the construction of this cairn twelve thousand blocks of ice will be used. On the top-most block a colossal figure will be placed, about eleven feet in height, and holding in one hand a torch, the latter lighted at night by electricity. The electric light will also be used to illuminate the cairn from the inside. The structure is flanked with eight turrets bearing the flags of various nations.

A Gloomy Christmas in England and France is reported by the cable despatches. A depression of trade almost unprecedented is said to exist in both countries, and the poor and the lower middle classes are suffering severe distress. In England a popular clamor against the costly Egyptian war is being raised, and much resentment is expressed against the Government, which is charged with mismanagement of its foreign relations. The French people are protesting against the Chinese complication, from which they expect neither glory nor profit. The Communists have issued huge red placards demanding of the Government bread and lodgings. These proclamations end by casting the blame for what may some day happen upon the shoulders of the Ministers and Deputies, who refuse to listen to the voice of the hungry.

Spain was Shaken by an Earthquake on December 26th. In the capital the shock was felt but slightly, and only a few buildings were damaged. Some alarm was caused at the Opera House and in the populous quarters of the city. The shocks were felt at Gibraltar and were severe in the southern provinces. They caused great alarm among the people at Granada. Numerous towns are reported as having suffered. Several houses, including the telegraph station, at Velez Malaga, were badly injured and the terrified inhabitants encamped in the outskirts of the town during the night. Many persons were injured at Loja, Motril and Alhama, and the convent at Seville was partly destroyed. The people were greatly alarmed. An official in the Velez telegraph office was killed. It is reported that several other people were killed there. One person was killed and many were injured at Motril. The village of Albuñuelas in Granada was nearly destroyed. The provinces of Malaga and Granada were the scene of the severest disturbance. Several places were partially destroyed. The mayor reports that many parts of Albuñuelas are in ruins, and that as many as one hundred and fifty persons are believed to have perished. At Arenas del Rey forty persons were killed.

The American Plenipotentiaries at the Congo Conference have labored for the benefit of the inhabitants of the Congo region without regard to the jealousies of European nations. The result has been a bitter feeling against them on the part of France. A prominent French journal, commenting on the Conference, says: "The circle within which subjects are to be discussed by the Berlin Conference was strictly limited at the outset, but is now broken and is widening out and continues to embrace more and more ground until it is impossible to predict where the Conference may lead to. The American plenipotentiaries are principally responsible for this. We do not insist upon the answer why America was invited to take part in the Conference, but it seems that a nation which applies on its own side of the world the Monroe doctrine with such vigor should at least act with due reserve on our side of the water."

An Explosive Machine was sent to the American Tract Society's depot in New York on December 26th. A boy twelve years of age took a package into the store and gave it to a clerk. On being opened it was found to contain gunpowder and nitric acid, and an ingenious arrangement for driving a piece of emery paper across matches fixed in the box. The emery paper just missed the heads of the matches when the removal of the lid set the arrangement in motion, and no explosion occurred. No arrests have yet been made, and there is no clue to the motive of the miscreants who sent the package.

The Death of Dr. George W. Blagden, Pastor emeritus of the Old South Church in Boston, occurred December 17th. Dr. Blagden has been residing in this city during the past two years at the house of his son-in-law. He was born in Washington City, D. C., October 3d, 1802. He attended Yale College and graduated in 1823; he studied theology at Andover Seminary, completing his course in 1826. He was ordained and settled at Brighton, Mass., in 1827, and three years afterward was placed over the Salem Street Church in Boston. In 1836 he was called to Old South, in Boston, and there remained as pastor and pastor emeritus until his death. Dr. Blagden resigned the pastorate of Old South Church in 1872, on completing his seventieth year. His death was very sudden. Only two days before he departed he was in his accustomed health and attended a meeting. At his funeral in Boston, on December 20th, the clergymen of all denominations attended to show respect to his memory.

Miss Laurie McLatchie, the Scottish Evangelist, has found it necessary to return to England. Our readers who were looking forward to the pleasure of hearing her will naturally regret this sudden termination of her work here. Her departure was wholly unexpected, and was caused by circumstances over which she had no control, and which were unknown to her when she commenced her tour in this country. Her visit, brief as it was, will long be remembered with pleasure by all who were privileged to listen to her earnest sermons and eloquent lectures.

The Opening of the New Orleans Exposition on Sundays is a cause for deep regret to Christian people throughout the country. On December 21st it is reported that ten thousand persons visited the building, and that "the Mexican band gave a concert in the Music Hall. The work of preparing the exhibits went rapidly on; about fifty-six car-loads of freight were unloaded, though work was partly suspended. The weather was pleasant and warm, and the man who paid over $50,000 for the privilege of selling beer on the grounds did a good business."

Mr. Moody's Christian Convention in Milwaukee was one of the largest religious meetings ever held in that city. Mr. Moody thus defined the "Qualifications of Successful Work for the Lord." 1. Faith in God, an honest conviction that God will do as He says He will. 2. Courage to do what faith declares. God doesn't use cowards or faint-hearted men to do much for Him. He told Joshua to be of good courage. 3. Perseverance. Keep right on in the place God gives you to work for Him. Many men fail right on the eve of battle. The best silver mine in England was worked for a long time by a man who became discouraged just before it yielded the richest ingots of choicest silver, and he sold out for a song and lost a princely fortune. Keep on. Keep at it. Get others to help, and work and plod and win success. 4. Enthusiasm is a valuable element, and one that most men need. Too many are afraid of enthusiasm, but all of us need to put more fire and feeling in what we do for the Lord.

The Christian Churches of Denver, Col., have taken into consideration the question of the condition of the poor, in energetic Western fashion. They called a mass meeting of churches and benevolent societies at the Grand Opera House, to consider ways and means of providing for the city's poor during the coming winter. An admission fee of twenty-five cents was charged, and at half-past seven o'clock every seat in the house was taken, and every foot of standing room was occupied. Fully sixteen hundred people were in attendance. The receipts were four hundred dollars. A committee of prominent business men volunteered to solicit contributions for a fund for the poor. That committee raised six thousand dollars in one week.

A Sunday-Observing Lord Mayor is the one recently inaugurated in London. Mr. Nottage, whose portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 11th, in declining a clergyman's request to attend his church in state on a recent Sunday, declared his intention not only to avoid state attendances at church on the Lord's Day, but also to abandon the practice of "state luncheons" on that day. He added: "I cannot see why a Lord Mayor, who is admittedly one of the hardest worked men in London, should be deprived of a day of rest, and I shall certainly secure it throughout my year of office, both for my servants and myself."

The Theatre Comique in New York was Destroyed by fire on December 23d. Happily, the fire broke out in the morning when the theatre was empty, or there might have been many lives lost, as the building burned very rapidly and was wholly consumed. This is the fourth large theatre burned in this city within the short space of two years. The fire has aroused a discussion in the secular press about the best ways of making theatres fire-proof. One of the dailies observes: "Our places of public amusement, which are wont to be filled nightly with large audiences, seem to be mere tinder boxes, which are quickly reduced to ashes when attacked by flame. Is it possible to make a playhouse fireproof? Can these structures be made more secure against danger to life than they now are? These are timely questions of vital concern to the public." Those who are concerned about the morals of the people would add another question also of "vital concern to the public," "Can these places be so conducted that the young people who attend them will not have their minds corrupted by what they see and hear there? Experience so far, answers the question in the negative. (Job 21: 11-14).

The Success of a Boston Tailor's Motherly way is described in the Youth's Companion. The tailor gave out some work in the busy season to a smart Irish workman named Tim. He was usually punctual, but on this occasion, he was behind time. Tim had been on a spree, and when he had sobered off, he brought back the work. But his face and manner were hard as of one prepared to receive sullenly the scolding he merited. The tailor, however, received him kindly. Tim's face softened, and soon he burst into tears, sobbing out with comical pathos—"Ah, misther! ivery sowl of the ither's of them jawed me up hill and jawed me down dale, but you—ye've sich a kind, motherly way wid ye, I'll never dissapint ye agin—never!" During the years which have passed since that promise, Tim has never once failed to keep his plighted word. The tailor's kindness made a man of him. The incident is commended to those who for erring brothers and sisters have only harsh words. (Eph. 4: 32).

A Strange Instance of a Dog's Sagacity, which would be incredible were it not reported on unimpeachable evidence, is printed in the London Times. Mr. Arthur E. Reade, Secretary to the Charing Cross Hospital, writes to the Times to say that at 10.30 on the previous Sunday night a rough terrier barked outside the door of the hospital till he was let in. When admitted he limped in, squatted on the mat, and held up an injured forepaw. The house surgeon came, whereupon the dog followed him at once across the hall to the accident room, jumped at once, when invited to do so, on the chair, and again held out the injured paw. It was dressed, when the dog licked the hand of the surgeon and loudly barked its gratitude till it had to be turned out, showing great reluctance to leave. Mr. Bellamy, the house surgeon, confirms this statement, and adds that the next day the dog came, like any other out-patient, to have his paw dressed. It is not known to whom the dog belongs. The dog had evidently had some previous experience in some way through its owner or another person of the benefits to be derived from an hospital in cases of injury, and applied on its own account for the help given to others. It is strange that men have not sagacity equal to this dog. They see others made happy for time and eternity by faith in Christ, yet do not seek the blessing for themselves (John 9: 27, 28).

A Bride's Superstition Delayed a Wedding ceremony in New Jersey recently. While a couple were being united in Newark a pause occurred at the moment when the bridegroom was putting the wedding-ring on the bride's finger. The young man tried to get it on again and again and failed. Do what he would he could not succeed in passing the ring over the second joint of the finger. The ceremony was at length concluded, and the guests sympathized with the young bride upon the delay in the proceedings. With a merry twinkle in her eye and her face brightening up with smiles, she told the secret. She wanted to be "the boss," it appears. She explained that a married lady friend had told her not to permit the groom to pass the ring over the second joint, because if he succeeded he would then be the "boss," and she desired that distinction reserved to herself. The superstition was silly, but the motive was worse than silly. The desire to rule on the part of the bride argued ill for the future happiness of the pair. It is with a bride as with the Church, the bride of Christ; loving subjection is the virtue that is fitting (Eph. 5: 24).

A Fatal Epidemic in a Prison was Reported from Kansas a short time ago. A despatch to the New York Times, from Leavenworth, says that there is a terrible disease raging in the Kansas penitentiary, four miles south of that city, where eight hundred prisoners are confined. The disease is pronounced malignant typhoid fever by the physicians who have investigated it. Its prevalence has caused no little consternation among the people, between whom and the penitentiary constant communication is kept up by persons passing to and fro. Sixty convicts are sick and ten have already died. The penitentiary has been turned into a great hospital, all the attendants and some of the prisoners being employed as nurses and in burying the dead. The condition of the incarcerated sufferers may well excite our pity. Their misery is twofold. They are in need of pardon and healing. Their condition is a type of that of our race. It is the glory of Christ that He can supply all our need—pardon for past offences and remedy for the sin-sickness of the soul (Ps. 103: 3).

An Ingenious Contrivance which may Prevent accidents, was patented last week. It is designed to register at one end of an electric wire the temperature of the place where the other end is fixed. The inventor, explaining its uses, said: "Suppose that a man has an immense cold storage warehouse, like that in connection with Fulton Market. It is desirable and even necessary that he be able to sit in his office and tell at a glance just what the temperature is in each room and closet of that warehouse, and whether his refrigerating machinery is working evenly, for a rise of temperature at any one point might spoil thousands of dollars' worth of provisions stored there. Take the case of a ship with a cargo of fruit, grain or vegetables. Fermentation setting in at any one point would produce heat. Heat, reacting, would accelerate fermentation, and soon half the cargo is ruined." The invention will automatically register the exact temperature in any of these cases. If such an instrument could be applied to show the temperature of the spirituality of churches, what a variable record it would register! We are apt to forget that such a record is kept. (Rev. 3: 15, 16).

ALL JOY IN ALL TRIALS.

A Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.*

"My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations; knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience. But let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing."—JAMES 1: 2, 3, 4.

The Brotherhood of the Converted—Brotherly Sympathy in Trial—I. The Point Assailed by Temptation—Your Faith—Why Faith is Tried—How it is Tried—By Different Troubles—The Shapes They Take—Wrong Judgments of Others—II. The Blessing Gained by Trial—James's Ready Reckoner—How to Count—III. The Virtue Produced—Tests of Patience—Two Little Words—IV. Promotion of Spiritual Completeness—All-Round Men—Cautious and Humble—Grateful and Useful Men.

JAMES calls the converted among the twelve tribes his brethren. Christianity has a great uniting power; it both discovers and creates relationships among the sons of men. It reminds us of the ties of nature, and binds us with the bonds of grace. Every one that is born of the Spirit of God is brother to every other that is born of the same Spirit. Well may we be called brethren, for we are redeemed by one blood; we are partakers of the same life; we feed upon the same heavenly food; we are united to the same living head; we seek the same ends; we love the same Father; we are heirs of the same promises; and we shall dwell forever together in the same heaven. Wherefore, let brotherly love continue; let us love one another with a pure heart fervently, and manifest that love, not in word only, but in deed and in truth. Whatever brotherhood may be a sham, let the brotherhood of believers be the most real thing beneath the stars.

Beginning with this word "brethren," James shows a true

with believers in their trials, and this is a main part of Christian fellowship. "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ." If we are not tempted ourselves at this moment, others are; let us remember them in our prayers; for in due time our turn will come, and we shall be put into the crucible. As we would desire to receive sympathy and help in our hour of need, let us render it freely to those who are now enduring trial.

Remembering the trials of his brethren, James tries to cheer them, and therefore he says, "My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers trials." It is a part of our high calling to rise ourselves into confidence; and it is also our duty to see that none of our brethren despond, much less despair. The whole tendency of our holy faith is to elevate and to encourage. Grace breeds no sorrow, except the healthy sorrow which comes with saving repentance and leads to the joy of pardon; it comes not to make men miserable, but to wipe all tears from their eyes. Our dream is not of devils descending a dreary staircase to hell, but of angels ascending and descending upon a ladder, the top of which leads to the shining throne of God. We are able in sober earnest to speak with the afflicted, and bid them be patient under the chastening hand of God; yea, to count it all joy when they fall into divers trials because those trials will work out for them such signal, such lasting good. They may be well content to sow in tears since they are sure to reap in joy.

I. First, let us think a little upon the essential POINT WHICH IS ASSAILED by temptation or trial. It is your faith which is tried. It is supposed that you have that faith. You are not the people of God, you are not truly brethren unless you are believers. It is this faith of yours which is peculiarly obnoxious to Satan and to the world which lieth in the wicked one. The hand of faith is against all evil, and all evil is against faith. Faith is that blessed grace which is most pleasing to God, and hence it is most displeasing to the devil. By faith God is greatly glorified, and hence by faith Satan is greatly annoyed. He rages at faith because he sees therein his own defeat and the victory of grace.

It is by our faith that we are saved, justified, and brought near to God, and therefore it is no marvel that it is attacked. It is by our faith that we live; we began to live by it, and we continue to live by it, for "the just shall live by faith." Once let faith go and our life is gone; and hence it is that the powers which war against us make their main assault upon this royal castle, this key of the whole position. Faith is your jewel, your joy, your glory; and the thieves who haunt the pilgrim way are all in league to tear it from you. Hold fast, therefore, this your choice treasure. It is by faith, too, that Christians perform exploits. If men of old wrought daring and heroic deeds it was by faith. Faith is the fighting principle and the conquering principle; therefore it is Satan's policy to slay it even as Pharaoh sought to kill the male children when Israel dwelt in Egypt. Rob a Christian of his faith and he will be like Samson when his locks were cut away; the Philistines will be upon him and the Lord will have departed from him. Marvel not if the full force of the current shall beat upon your faith, for it is the foundation of your spiritual house.

Now, think of

HOW FAITH IS TRIED.

According to the text we are said to fall into "manifold temptations" or into "divers temptations"—that is to say, we may expect very many and very different troubles. In any case these trials will be most real. Our temptations are no inventions of nervousness nor hobgoblins of dreamy fear. Ye have heard of the patience of Job—his was real patience, for his afflictions were real. Could each tried believer among us tell his own story, I do not doubt we should convince all who heard us that the troubles and temptations which we have endured are no fictions of romance, but must be ranked among the stern realities of actual life.

Ay, and note too, that the trials of Christians are such as would in themselves lead us into sin, for I take it that our translators would not have placed the word "temptation" in the text, and the Revisionists would not have retained it, if they had not felt that there was a coloring of temptation in its meaning, and that "trial" was hardly the word. The natural tendency of trouble is not to sanctify, but to induce sin. Because our nature is depraved it makes occasions for sin, both out of our joys and our trials, but by grace we overcome the tendency of nature, and so derive benefit from tribulation. Do I not speak to many here who at times feel strong impulses toward evil, especially in the darkness hour when the spirit of evil walks abroad? Have you not been made to tremble for yourselves in seasons of fierce trial, for your feet were almost gone, your steps had well-nigh slipped? Is there any virtue that has not been weather-beaten? Is there any love that has not at times been so tried that it threatened to curdle into hate? Our way is up the river; we have to stem the current, and struggle against a flood which would readily bear us to destruction. Thus, not only trials, but black temptations assail the Christian's faith. As to we may say this much: the trial or temptation of each man is distinct from that of every other. When God did tempt Abraham he was bidden to take his son, his only son, and offer him upon a mountain for a sacrifice. Nobody here was ever tried in that way; nobody ever will be. We may have the trial of losing our child, but certainly not the trial of having a command to offer him in sacrifice. That was a trial peculiar to Abraham; necessary and useful to him, though never proposed to us. In the case of the young man in the gospels, our Lord Jesus tried him with, "If thou wouldst be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven." Some have dreamed that it must therefore be the duty of everybody to part with their possessions; but this is idle. It would not be the duty of any man to offer up his only son; and it is not the duty of every man to part with all his goods. These were tests to particular persons; and others equally special and searching have been applied in other cases.

We are not to try ourselves, nor to desire other men's trials; it will be well if we endure those which the Lord appoints for us, for they will be wisely chosen. That which would most severely test me would perhaps be no trial to you; and that which tries you might be no temptation to me. This is one reason so severely, because feeling ourselves to be strong in that particular point we argue that the fallen one must have been strong in that point too, and therefore must have wilfully and earnestly have determined to do wrong. This may be a cruel supposition. We hastily conclude that the temptation must have been as feeble in his case as it would have been in our own; which is a great mistake, for a temptation which to you or to me would be no temptation at all, may be to another individual, of a peculiar constitution and under singular circumstances, a most fierce and terrible blast from the adversary, before which he falls mournfully, but not with malice aforethought. "Divers trials," says the apostle, and he knew what he said.

At times temptation comes suddenly upon us, and so we fall into it. When we were at rest, and were quiet, suddenly the evil came, like a lion leaping from the thicket. When Job's children were eating and drinking in their elder brother's house, then suddenly a wind came from the wilderness, and the patriarch was bereaved; the cattle were ploughing, the sheep were grazing, the camels were at their service, and in a moment, by fire from heaven, and by robber bands, the whole of these possessions vanished. One messenger had not told his story before another followed at his heels; Job had no breathing time, the blows fell thick and fast. The trial of our faith is most severe when divers trials happen to us when we look not for them. Is it not strange in the light of these things that James should say, "Count it all joy when ye fall into divers trials"? You see, then, the main point of attack is our faith, and happy is the man whose shield can catch and quench all the fiery darts of the enemy.

II. That we may make the text more clear we shall next notice the invaluable blessing which is gained by the trial of our faith.

THE BLESSING GAINED

is this, that our faith is tried and proved. The way of trying whether you are a good soldier is to go down to the battle; the way to try whether a ship is well built is, not merely to order the surveyor to examine her, but to send her to sea; a storm will be the best test of her stanchness. They have built a new lighthouse upon the Eddystone; how do we know that it will stand? We judge by certain laws and principles, and feel tolerably safe about the structure; but, after all, we shall know best in after years when a thousand tempests have beaten upon the lighthouse in vain. We need trials as a test as much as we need divine truth as our food.

Now, when we are able to bear it without starting aside, the trial proves our sincerity. Coming out of a trouble the Christian says to himself, "Yes, I held fast mine integrity, and did not let it go. Blessed be God, I was not afraid of threatening; I was not crushed by losses; I was kept true to God under pressure. Now, I am sure that my religion is not a mere profession, but a real consecration to God. It has endured the fire, being kept by the power of God."

Next, it proves the truthfulness of our doctrinal belief. "Oh, yes," you may say, "I have heard Mr. Spurgeon expound the doc-

* The advance sheets of Mr. Spurgeon's latest sermon have not arrived this week, doubtless owing to the westerly gales and fog, which have delayed all European mails. We therefore publish in this number an excellent sermon which he preached a few months ago.—Ed.

trines, and I have believed them." This is poor work; but if you have been sick, and found a comfort in those doctrines, then you are assured of their truth. If you have been on the borders of the grave, and the Gospel has given you joy and gladness, then you know how true it is. Experimental knowledge is the best and surest. If you have seen others pass through death itself triumphantly you have said, "This is proof to me; my FAITH IS NO GUESS-WORK; I have seen for myself." Is not this assurance cheaply purchased at any price? May we not count it all joy when the Lord puts us in the way of getting it? It seems to me that doubt is worse than trial. I had sooner suffer any affliction than be left to question the Gospel or my own interest in it. Certainly it is a jewel worth purchasing even with our heart's blood.

Next, your own faith in God is proved when you can cling to Him under temptation. Not only your sincerity, but the divinity of your faith is proved; for a faith that is never tried, how can you depend upon it? But if in the darkest hour you have still said, "I cast my burden upon the Lord, and He will sustain me," and you find He does sustain you, then is your faith that of God's elect. If in temptation you cry to God in prayer that you may keep your garment unspotted, and He helps you to do so, then also are you sure that yours is the faith which the Spirit begets in the soul.

James says "Count it." He gives us and teaches us in our troubles how to count. He sets before us a different kind of measure from that which carnal reason would use; the shekel of the sanctuary was very different from the shekel in common commerce, and so is the counting of faith far other than that of human judgment. He bids us take our pen and sit down quickly and write at his correct dictation. You were going to write down, "Manifold temptations;" that would be so much on the wrong side; but instead thereof he bids you set down the proving of your faith, and this one asset transforms the transaction into a substantial gain. Trials are like a fire; they burn up nothing in us but the dross, and they make the gold all the purer. Put down the testing process as a clear gain, and, instead of being sorry about it, count it all joy when ye fall into divers trials, for this bestows upon you a proof of your faith. So far there is sufficient ground for counting all trials joy. Now, let us go a little further.

III. Let us think of the priceless

VIRTUE WHICH IS PRODUCED

by trial, namely, patience; for the proof of your "faith worketh patience." Patience! We all have a large stock of it—until we need it, and then we have none. The man who truly possesses patience is the man that has been tried. What kind of patience does he get by the grace of God? First, he obtains a patience that accepts the trial as from God without a murmur. Calm resignation does not come all at once; often long years of physical pain, or mental depression, or disappointment in business, or multiplied bereavements, are needed to bring the soul into full submission to the will of the Lord. The next kind of patience is when experience enables a man to bear ill-treatment, slander, and injury without resentment. He feels it keenly, but he bears it meekly. Like his Master, he opens not his mouth to reply, and refuses to return railing for railing. Contrariwise he gives blessing in return for cursing, like the sandalwood tree, which perfumes the axe which cuts it. Blessed is that holy charity which hopeth all things, endureth all things, and is not easily provoked. Ah, friend, if the grace of God by trial shall work in you the quiet patience which never grows angry, and never ceases to love, you may have lost a trifle of comfort, but you have gained a solid weight of character.

The patience which God works in us by tribulation also takes another form, namely, that of acting without undue haste. Before wisdom has balanced our zeal we are eager to serve God all in a hurry, with a rush and a spurt, as if everything must be done within the hour or nothing would ever be accomplished. In proportion as we grow like the Lord Jesus we shall cast aside disturbance of mind and fury of spirit. His was a grand life-work, but He never seemed to be confused, excited, worried, or hurried, as certain of His people are. He did not strive nor cry, nor cause His voice to be heard in the streets. He knew His hour was not yet come, and there were so many days in which He could work, and therefore He went steadily on till He had finished the work which His Father had given Him to do. That kind of patience is a jewel more to be desired than the gem which glitters on the imperial brow.

That is a grand kind of patience, too, when we can wait without unbelief.

TWO LITTLE WORDS

are good for every Christian to learn and to practise—pray and stay. Waiting on the Lord implies both praying and staying. What if the world is not converted this year! What if the Lord Jesus does not come to-morrow! What if still our tribulations are lengthened out! What if the conflict is continued! He that has been tried and by grace has obtained the true profit of his trials, both quietly waits and joyfully hopes for the salvation of God. Patience, brother! Is this high virtue scarce with thee? The Holy Spirit shall bestow it upon thee through suffering.

This patience also takes the shape of believing without wavering, in the very teeth of strange providences and singular statements, and perhaps inward misgivings. The established Christian says, "I believe my God, and therefore if the vision tarry I will wait for it. My time is not yet come. I am to wait for my worst things first and my best things afterward, and so I sit me down at Jesus' feet and tarry His leisure." When trial worketh patience we are incalculably enriched. The Lord give us more of this choice grace. As Peter's fish had the money in his mouth, so have sanctified trials spiritual riches for those who endure them graciously.

IV. Lastly, all this works something better still, and this is our fourth head: the promoted. "That ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing." Brethren, the most valuable thing a man can get in this world is that which has most to do with his truest self. A man gets a good house; well, that is something; but suppose he is in bad health, what is the good of his fine mansion? A man is well clothed and well fed; that is something; but suppose he shivers with ague, and has no appetite through indigestion. That spoils it all. If a man is in robust health this is a far more valuable boon. Health is far more to be prized than wealth, or honor, or learning; we all allow that; but then suppose that a man's innermost self is diseased while his body is healthy, so that he is disgraced by vice or fevered with passion, he is in a poor plight, notwithstanding that he has such a robust frame? The very best thing is that which will make the man himself a better man; make him right, and true, and pure, and holy. "When the man himself is better, he has made an unquestionable gain. So, if our afflictions tend, by trying our faith, to breed patience, and that patience tends to make us into perfect men in Christ Jesus, then we may be glad of trials.

Afflictions by God's grace make us all-round men, developing every spiritual faculty, and therefore they are our friends, our helpers, and should be welcomed with "all joy." Afflictions find out our weak points, and this makes us attend to them. Being tried, we discover our failures, and then going to God about those failures we are helped to be perfect and entire, wanting nothing.

Moreover, our trials, when blessed of God to make us patient, ripen us. I do not know how to explain what I mean by ripening, but there is a sort of mellowness about believers who have endured a great deal of affliction that you never meet in other people. It cannot be mistaken or imitated. You must have known such men and such women, and have said to yourselves, "I wish I could be like them, so calm, so quiet, so self-contained, so happy, and when not happy, yet so content not to be happy; so mature in judgment, so spiritual in conversation, so truly ripe." This only comes to those in whom the proof of their faith works experience, and then experience brings forth the fruits of the Spirit. Dear brothers and sisters, there is a certain all-roundness of spiritual manhood which never comes to us except by manifold temptations.

Sanctified trials produce a chastened spirit. Some of us by nature are rough and untender; but after awhile friends notice that the roughness is departing, and they are quite glad to be more gently handled. Ah, that sick chamber did the polishing; under God's grace, that depression of spirit, that loss, that cross, that bereavement—these softened the natural ruggedness, and made the man meek and lowly, like his Lord. Sanctified trouble has a great tendency to breed sympathy, and sympathy is to the church as oil to machinery. A man that has never suffered feels very awkward when he tries to sympathize with a tried child of God. He kindly does his best, but he does not know how to go to work at it; but those repeated blows from the rod make us feel for others who are smarting, and by degrees we are recognized as being the Lord's.

made meet by temptation to succor those who are tempted. Have you never noticed how tried men, when their trouble is thoroughly sanctified, become cautious and humble? They cannot speak quite so fast as they used to do; they do not talk of being absolutely perfect, though they are the very men who are Scripturally perfect; they say little about their own doings, and much about the tender mercy of the Lord. They recollect the whipping they had behind the door from their Father's hands, and they speak gently to other erring ones. Affliction is the stone which our Lord Jesus throws at the brow of our giant pride, and patience is the sword which cuts off its head.

Those, too, are the kind of people who are most grateful. I have known what it is to praise God for the power to move one leg in bed. It may not seem much to you, but it was a great blessing to me. They that are heavily afflicted come to bless God for everything. I am sure that woman who took a piece of bread and a cup of water for her breakfast, and said, "What, all this, and Christ too!" must have been a tried woman, or she would not have exhibited so much gratitude. And that old Puritan minister was surely a tried man, for when his family had only a herring and a few potatoes for dinner, he said, "Lord, we bless thee that Thou hast ransacked sea and land to find food for us this day." If he had not been a tried man, he might have turned up his nose at the meal, as many do at much more sumptuous fare. Troubled men get to be grateful men, and that is no small thing.

And these much-tempted ones are frequently the most spiritual men, and out of this spirituality comes usefulness. Mr. Greatheart, who led the pilgrims up to the celestial city, was or he would not have been fit to lead so many to their heavenly rest; and you, dear brother, if ever you are to be a leader and a helper, as you would wish to be, in the Church of God, it must be by such means as this that you must be prepared for it. Do you not wish to become a perfect man in Christ Jesus? If so, welcome with all joy divers trials and temptations; fly to God with them; bless Him for having sent them; ask Him to help you to bear them with patience, and then let that patience have its perfect work, and so by the Spirit of God you shall become "perfect and entire, lacking in nothing." May the Comforter bless this word to your hearts, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

A REMARKABLE FAITH CURE.

THE Rev. A. B. Simpson, pastor of the Twenty-third Street Tabernacle, New York, has received a narrative of a remarkable case of healing through faith and prayer, which he publishes in his magazine, Word, Work and World. The following is an abstract of the narrative: Mrs. M. E. Hall, of New Haven, Conn., was suffering from lung fever with diphtheritic symptoms. She was staying in the country at the time and was carried home in an easy carriage, being unable to bear the motion of the cars. On her arrival she lay for many days hovering between life and death, but eventually partially recovered, leaving her, however, suffering, in addition to her other ailments, with a severe spinal disorder. She had a relapse, and thus writes of her condition then:

"My physician remained with me several nights, thinking I could not live. I was given up twice by the doctors, who thought I should choke to death, but as warm weather came the ulcers did not break as often; I was worse in spring and fall (as is the case with consumption) one or two ulcers breaking daily, then I would have a nervous spasm and suffer most intensely. My spine was severely affected with two curvatures, which prevented me from sitting up or getting any better. My back was so sensitive that it touched it seemed as though it would take my life. Even a soft pillow, if dropped on the floor or near me, would cause severe pains like needles in the spine between my shoulder blades, opposite my lungs. I could only be bolstered up in an easy-chair, once a week or ten days, to have my bed made. I was not able to help myself at all or be placed upon my feet; and was exhausted when put back on my bed."

Mrs. Mix, of Torrington, Conn., visited the sufferer and prayed with her, urging her to trust Christ wholly for healing. A marked improvement followed, but it was not until nearly four months afterward that she was enabled to take firm hold of the promise and rejoice in perfect recovery. She says: "For the first time in over five years I arose and dressed myself, bathed, and combed my hair unassisted. I cannot begin to tell you the joy it gave me when I went out to the breakfast-table. My dear mother stood arranging my waiter for my sick room; she raised her hands in amazement and fixed the place at the table for me. I went down to the sea-shore without leaning on any one. Not long after I was able to take the cars alone with God and go to Miss Jennie Smith's home, about one hundred miles or more. I returned home to New Haven 'safe and sound,' to the surprise of my neighbors and friends."

THE GORDON-RELIEF EXPEDITION ON THE NILE.

(See Illustration.)

THE expedition under Lord Wolseley sent out by the British Government to relieve General Gordon, who is still in Khartoum surrounded by the Mahdi's troops, is not expected to reach its destination before next March. Lord Wolseley apparently finds this the most formidable task he has ever undertaken. It was his own choice to conduct it by the Nile instead of across the desert. It is evident, however, from the reports he sends home of his progress, and from the letters of newspaper correspondents that whatever the difficulties of the desert route might have been, those of the Nile route are enormous. They are increased by official mismanagement. The time of setting out was delayed until the Nile had subsided so low that it is only by great skill that the boats are prevented getting aground. Even after the troops arrived on the banks of the Nile they were delayed by the non-arrival of provisions, and day after day of valuable time slipped away.

Our illustration represents the starting of the Thirty-eighth Regiment of the army. The men are expected to row themselves, while a Canadian boatman stands at the bow and the stern of each boat to manage the steering and direct the rowers. As each rowboat carries only twelve men all told, it is easy to realize how slow must be the progress made. It is not, therefore, surprising that Lord Wolseley has decided, according to cable reports, to make a dash across the desert with the view of hastening to the relief of General Gordon. The cost of the expedition will, it is stated by competent authorities, be $75,000,000, and if to that is added the expenses of the bombardment of Alexandria, the total reaches the prodigious sum of $1,100,000,000.

PHIL ROBSON, THE SINGING CARPENTER.

THE following interesting story of the conversion of a village carpenter is related by a Christian minister, who heard it from the carpenter's own lips. The minister says: "Phil Robson was, better known as the 'Singing Carpenter.' Phil sang like the lark. 'It does me good, sir, to sing,' said Phil to me one day as I entered his shop and saw the plane going briskly, and Phil singing as he worked; 'it cheers me and makes life pleasant.' And then off started Phil with another of his songs.

"In a few moments Phil stopped work to have a talk with me, and sat down beside me in the sun.

"'You are a happy man, Phil,' I said; 'it makes one feel good to listen to you. You are a living proof that religion is not a depressing thing. Were you always as fond of singing?'

"'Yes, from a child,' Phil answered, 'but I have good reason to be fond of it now. You see, I was converted through singing.'

"'Indeed, Phil, how was that?' I asked.

"'I'll tell you, sir. As I said, I was always fond of singing. My mother—yonder she is in the garden, with my pet Lily—says I used to sing in my cradle. Anyhow, I remember singing as long as I remember anything at all. Well, sir, when I was younger I used to go to the saloon, and drink and sing for hours together.'

"'What did you sing then, Phil?'

"'Well, sir, I was fond of 'Hail Columbia,' 'Auld Lang Syne,' 'Home, Sweet Home,' and things of that kind. I never would sing a bad song. I always liked anything that touched the heart a bit.'

"'And what about the preacher, Phil?'

'Oh, he was called "Canaan." That wasn't his real name, you know. His proper name was John Wilson, and he used to go through the villages singing; and here Phil sang himself:

"Oh, what has Jesus done for me?

He came from the land of Canaan."

"Well, sir, as I was saying, I was sitting in the bar-parlor one summer night, a-singing and drinking with a lot more, when we suddenly heard some one outside in the road singing too. So we listened, and couldn't make it out. Then the voice came nearer and nearer, and one of them threw open the window, and we heard some one singing:

"Canaan, bright Canaan."

"Why," said Joe, the miller, "it's Canaan, sure."

"So I looked, and there he was. I think I see him now. A plain man with a coat like a Quaker's, a walking-stick over his shoulder, and a bag hanging at the end of it, and his broad-brimmed hat in his hand. When he saw us all at the window, he gave us a lively sort of look, and says he, 'I am going to preach on the green about happiness and heaven. Come and hear the good news, and we'll have some singing. Praise the Lord!' And then away he went, singing 'Canaan.'"

"This," Phil said, "was too much for me. I wasn't fond of preaching, but the way that man sung fetched me. He had the most wonderful voice I ever heard. I wanted to hear him some more. Up I got and started off after the preacher. I found him under the oak. That very tree over there," said Phil, pointing. "He was singing:

"Come, sinners, to Jesus, no longer delay,
A free, full salvation is offer'd to-day."

"When he had gone through two verses of the hymn, he said, 'Let us pray,' and down he went on his knees, and began to pray for us all. About a score of us—for people had followed him from the cottages—were beside him, and most of us knelt down. 'Lord,' he said, 'save all these sinners—save them, Lord—save them, Lord.' He was very earnest, but it was all for us begging the Lord to save us. Then he sang another hymn and we joined in the chorus. Then he opened his Bible to read. Just then it began to rain, when the preacher said: 'Will any of you good folks lend me your kitchen to preach in?' Nobody answered him. I remember Bob, the smith, laughed at him. As for me, his prayer made me feel good to him, but I was kinder shy; but I managed to say: 'You may preach in my shop,' pointing to this shed of mine."

"Thank you, friend," said he, "that will do very well," and he put his arm through mine, and marched me off across the green, singing as he went."

"Well, sir, we got into the shed, and the preacher began to preach. His text was: 'Be ye reconciled to God.' What a sermon it was! I have heard a good many since then, but I shall never forget that. I had been a careless fellow up to then; not worse than the rest, I suppose, but pretty bad, especially when I had drunk much. The preacher seemed as if he knew us and just how we felt. When he was nearly through he said: 'Jesus died for you—died for you, for you, and for you,' and then he pointed at us with his finger, so that he made us feel as though each of us had been the one the Saviour had in mind when He died. I stood beside him all the time listening for my life. So did others, ay, even Bob, the smith was broken-hearted, and when we knelt down to pray, Bob said, 'Oh, pray for me.' 'Praise the Lord,' said the preacher. He prayed for Bob, and then he suddenly began to pray for me. Then I prayed for myself, and as I prayed, oh, sir, light and joy came to me, and I cried out, 'Lord, I am saved!' and from that hour, sir, I have had my heart full of happiness. There have been dark times occasionally, but they never last long. I always feel like singing. When I think as it was through the singing I first came to know religion, then I love it most, and I guess I shall sing as long as there's any life in me."

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

Summary of the Story.

ITS object is to show how sin may bring consequences on the head of the sinner, which make him regret bitterly that he sinned, even if he does not regard God but is simply concerned with his own happiness or misery. In fact, that sin is folly as well as rebellion against God. Robert Waldron, the son of a wealthy aristocrat, returning to his home after an absence, finds a young lady (Rose) living in the same village, whom he knew when he was at college. She had married since then a pious and learned bookseller, John Morley, a widower, with one daughter, Hester. Mr. Morley, though loving her dearly, lamented that she was not a Christian, but overcame his scruples so far as to marry her. Rose found her home dull, though she loved her little step-daughter, Hester, deeply. Robert Waldron eventually persuades her to desert her husband for his sake. She did so, and John Morley and his daughter were stricken down with sorrow. After nine years the two sinners separated, and Robert Waldron returned home. While walking at night near John Morley's house he was attacked murder-ously, and being found by Grant, a physician, bleeding to death on the sidewalk, was carried into John Morley's house, that being the nearest shelter. There he was carefully nursed by Hester, who concealed his identity from her father lest it should agitate him. Both she and Robert Waldron supposed that John Morley had struck the almost fatal blow in a moment of uncontrolled anger. During the illness that followed, Robert Waldron becomes passionately attached to Hester, who returned his love, but was repelled from him by horror of the sin which he committed, and which ruined her father's life. They frequently met at the home of Madame Lawson, an aged Frenchwoman, whose son, a skilful but moody, eccentric man, was in the employ of John Morley and deeply attached to that injured man. Eventually Rose returns to the village, penniless and in rags, and entreats Hester to shelter her. Hester obtains her father's consent to allow a poor woman, whose name she does not disclose, to live in an unused building attached to the house, and Rose lives there in bitter repentance, unknown to her husband. Rose reveals to Carl Bramwell, a clergyman who visits her at Hester's request, that she has a child whom she keeps at school. Hearing that the child is ill, Hester goes to see her, and, while she is away, John Morley, wandering about the house, finds his sinful wife lying nearly murdered in one of the rooms. Realizing that he would be suspected of murdering her, he follows Hester, and they both fly to France, where they hide themselves in a village in Burgundy. Robert Waldron obtains a clue to their retreat, and follows them with the news that Rose is recovering. From this point the story proceeds.

The Cost of Sin.

Robert Waldron lingered a day or two, lounging about the dull little town, but not daring to force himself again into the presence of John Morley, unless he gave some sign that a second interview would be welcome. He had expected that they would have returned at once to England, but no places were taken in the diligence; and he could not make up his mind to leave them there with an uncertainty as to what they meant to do. He wished to see Hester alone, but now she was accompanied by her father everywhere she went.

The sultry heat of the summer was quite gone, and the clear bright autumn air breathed fresh exhilaration into veins which had grown languid through the fervor of the sunshine. Robert could see them from his window at the hotel whenever they quitted the house: John Morley, with a new vigor and strength, his white head held erect, his tread firm and steady; and Hester, herself again, yet more than her former self, hopeful, bright, and courageous, ready to face any future, now that the heavy pressure of exile was passing away. What could they be about to do? He was undergoing a sore travail of heart, crucifying his best and most cherished hope. The gulf between him and Hester was too wide now, even to his own eyes, for it ever to be bridged over; and he was striving to look across it, with a willingness to see her happy in an Eden to which he could find no entrance.

At last he bethought himself that he must go. The Hester who belonged to him was pining away in Little Aston, and he knew that she would soon be lost to him forever. Every hour that he wasted here, he lost some small tender trace of his child's character, which would be all that remained to him of her in a little while. Carl would be with her, he thought, bitterly, and Carl was loved more dearly than he was. Yet for his own sake he should be near her, to work out the whole of the heavy penance. But he could not leave without one effort to see Hester again, and to ask if he could render no help to her or her father. Fortunately, he saw John Morley start out alone, the third evening after his interview with him, and make his way toward the rock which overlooked the town; and in a few minutes afterward he presented himself at the Widow Limet's door.

The Widow Limet was giving Hester a lesson in spinning, in the dark cool room at the back of her shop, and the burr of the wheel made his step inaudible. He trod cautiously, and looked in through the half-open door for some time, glad to see Hester, while he remained unseen. Her face had caught a tinge of color, the rich bloom of a warm climate, and her eyes had brightened from their long period of gloom. She smiled more readily, and talked more gayly, but still with an air of gravity, as if laughter had been too long a stranger to her lips to play about them as about other girlish faces.

He fancied, but it could only have been fancy, that she had borrowed some of the coquettish graces of the countrywomen about her; her dress, the slight toss of her pretty head, the movement of her little foot upon the treadle, her whole attitude, had just the touch of careless consciousness of beauty which was the only charm she had needed. He knew now how well she would have played her part in his life of luxury and elegance; and he stood watching her, his heart contracting with a very bitter regret when the widow Limet caught sight of him, and betrayed his presence by a little vivacious shriek.

"I am about to return to England," he said, advancing with the pleasant graciousness of manner which he had at command; "and I called to inquire if mademoiselle or her father have any commission there. For mercy's sake, Hester," he added, addressing her in English, "let me speak to you once more before I go. I cannot leave you thus."

"You can speak to me here," she answered; "no one will understand you but me."

She had pushed aside her spinning-wheel, and risen to offer him her hand, which he had not touched for so long a time, and which he held in his like a treasure he would not willingly relinquish, though he was compelled to preserve an outward calmness.

"Come at least with me into yonder garden," he urged. "I cannot speak to you freely, and I dare not look at you while this woman is standing by."

The garden was a small square space, inclosed on every side, with the high wall of a convent at the end throwing one half of it into shadow; a little green secluded spot, left to the wild luxuriance of growth under those warm skies. Without a word Hester stepped out of the dark room into the glow of the evening sun, walking at his side with a measured step, and a grave set face, looking steadily forward, without a glance up into his eyes.

"You hate me, Hester," he said. It was his first and chief thought when he saw how quickly her sunny grace had fled at the sight of him.

"No," she answered, gently, but without raising her eyes to his as he hoped; "no, I could never hate you."

"Yet it is I who have brought all the sorrow into your life," he continued.

"Yes," she said.

"Then you must hate me," he persisted.

"If I had never lived, if I had died years ago, your life would have been as smooth as the life of other girls."

"Yes," said Hester.

"Yet you loved me once," he went on. "Do you remember how you sat on a footstool at my feet, holding my hand in yours, and slipped off my ring to try it on your own little fingers? It is this same ring, Hester."

He stretched out his hand to her, and she bent her eyes for a moment upon the diamonds flashing in the sunlight; but she looked away again steadily and sadly, her lips trembling, and a nervous quivering in her half-closed eyelids.

"Do you remember it?" he asked, thinking, not of the ring, but of the love she had borne for him.

"I remember it well," she murmured.

"O God!" he said, reverently, "what a miserable fool I have been! You loved me then, little Hetty?"

"Yes," she said; "dearly."

"Dearly!" he echoed; "she loved me dearly; and it might have been, it might possibly have been, that she would have grown up loving me with her true, tender, faithful heart. Would that have been possible?"

"Yes," she answered, her voice faltering, and the tears standing in her steadfast eyes. Robert Waldron's passion, and the pain born of it, had been poignant enough before; but now it had reached a point when all further pain is akin to rapture. His martyrdom was awakening within him a heroism which was stirring with sharp blissful pangs of life through his whole spirit. Hester fixed her searching yet tender gaze upon him, with no deepening color on her cheeks, or look of shyness in her eyes.

"Yes," she said, softly, "I loved you dearly, and I can never hate you. I will not pretend to misunderstand you. You wish to know if that little child's love would have grown with my growth, had no barrier of your own raising come between us. I think it would. If there be any consolation or strength to you in the thought, I know that I should have loved you. Let that suffice for you. Be sure that I can never, never hate you."

Was it any consolation to him? It was a pain so exquisite at the moment, that he could not have answered the question to himself. They strolled together along the grassy walk of the garden, he wondering what words from his lips or hers would next stir the quiet air which seemed listening to them. The convent-bell rang for vespers, and a little babble of women's voices in the convent-garden followed it.

"Hester," he said, dropping his voice to a whisper, "I will make myself worthy of the love that might have been. Give me but one token of that old, childish love of yours."

"What token can I give you?" she asked, her clear eyes meeting his, frankly.

"This ring," he answered, "which you have so often slipped on to your own finger, let me put it on your hand now, and wear it for the sake of what might have been. Nay, I do not wish to trouble or frighten you, my darling. Do not turn away from me."

"I am not afraid of you," she answered, giving him her hand, which he held in his own for a moment or two, as he tried the ring upon her fingers, wondering all the while if it could be true that he was shut in there, in the small, sunny, silent garden, with no one near to him but Hester, and yet that for his very life he dare not press to his lips the small hand on which he left his ring. Hester was looking at him, not at it.

"Now," he said, pushing back his disordered hair from his burning forehead, "let me tell you all that I have to say to you. Sit down here beside me, for I have very much to say."

She sat down at his side on a bank of turf under one of the walls, and he told her all that had befallen him from the moment when Lawson's mother summoned him and Grant to the help of Rose. He spoke very mournfully of his little child.

"I am very sorry for you," sobbed Hester, laying her hand, upon which glistened his ring, on his arm.

"I must go home to-morrow," he said; "and you, Hester, when shall you come?"

"I don't know," she answered; "my father and I have talked about it these three days, but he cannot resolve to return to the old life. You see how changed he is? How could he go back to his gloomy work, which is no real work at all, but a dreary idleness? Yet we must go back some time."

"You wish to come home," he said.

"Oh, with all my heart!" cried Hester, clasping her hands with girlish earnestness.

"Hester," he said, "I am much older than you. You may speak to me as you would speak to my father, or yours. Do you love Carl Bramwell?"

"Yes," she whispered, her face flushing into a deep crimson.

"God bless you both!" said Robert, after a moment's pause. "You will be very happy. Yes, you must come home again, and it must be soon. Leave it to me, Hester. Do not be troubled by your father staying here a while longer."

He loitered yet a few minutes, with Hester beside him, but neither of them said many words. Then she trod step by step with him down the soft grassy walk and through the house, standing at the door to look after him as he went his lonely way down the street. He turned to see her, and lifted his hat to her, with a forced smile which she was too far off to catch.

"It is very hard upon me!" he said to himself, with a groan.

John Morley had desired to be alone, that he might confront a thought which had been haunting him ever since he had learned that Rose was not dead. His mind was no longer warped and blinded. With the vigor which had returned to his frame, there had come a clearness of judgment to his reason. Yet the sudden news that Rose lived had probed the old wound to its depths. As long as he had believed her dead his pardon of her transgression against him had been simple. Now a serious complication came into it. She was alive, and dwelling in the home she had forsaken—the home to which he must soon return.

His duty to Hester required that he should not keep her in this exile, to which she resigned herself through devotion to him. That his daughter loved Carl was apparent to him, and he had but little doubt that Carl loved her. Even if Robert Waldron did not disclose the secret of their hiding-place, which need be kept as a secret no longer, it was his duty to return to his own town, and appear again among his townsmen.

But Rose was there! And there too was the dreary life which had fallen from him suddenly as a burden loosened from his weary shoulders. Must he stoop to pick it up again? Must he keep Rose in his house and upon his hearth? He could not do that. He felt that though he might forgive her—though he did forgive her with all his heart—though there was still in the depths of his nature a profound passion for his young wife who had been unfaithful to him, he could never suffer her again to be to him what Hester's mother had been. There was an awful sadness in this. Rose dead had not been to him the terrible grief which Rose living would be. If he returned, he must look upon her fair face again, listen to her sweet voice, be shaken like a reed before her, yet put her away inexorably, against all tears, all pleadings, all contrition.

He could not ask Hester what he must do. How could his daughter understand this? There was no alternative offered to him, except the selfish one of staying where he was in this pleasant retreat. But that would be unjust to Hester, whose home sickness was known to him. A sharp conflict, quickly ended, was fought in his spirit. When he returned to the house of the widow Limet, he told Hester that they would start for England in a few days.

A SONG OF CONSECRATION, FOR THE HAPPY NEW YEAR.

BY MRS. J. H. KNOWLES.

The bells of my heart are ringing,
Happy bells,
Ringing a shout of thanksgiving,
Ringing a psalm of praise;
Up to the skies doth the melody rise,
This happiest day of my days.

The bells of my heart are ringing,
Thankful bells,
For the Spirit reveals this truth to me,
That wholly unworthy though I may be,
A wonderful price has been paid for me,
And therefore, my Lord, I belong to thee.

The bells of my heart are ringing,
Grateful bells,
This is the song of their musical chime,
Lord, I am thine, entirely thine,
Thy name is written on all I call mine,
For all eternity and all I call mine.

Ring on, ring on, sweet spirit bells!
Blessed bells!
Ring on forever, and nevermore cease,
In my inmost being thy chimes of peace—
Ring joyful peals! for this day so blest,
Dawns on my soul her Sabbath of Rest.

The Only American Magazine Devoted to Floriculture for Amateurs

WHICH IS ENTIRELY DISASSOCIATED WITH ANY FLORIST'S, SEEDSMAN'S OR NURSERYMAN'S INTERESTS.

FOR thirteen years the "LADIES' FLORAL CABINET" has maintained a prominent position as "A Magazine of Floriculture and Domestic Arts,"—never with more credit to itself than now. Giving more space to the treatment of "Floriculture for AMATEURS" than any other publication, it accompanies its text in every number with illustrations showing the shape and general characteristics of Plants and Flowers described. During 1884 there appeared over one hundred and forty different articles and over forty accompanying illustrations.

While aiming to present information in popular language, it strives to have every statement scientifically accurate—useful for to-day's guidance; worth preservation for reference at any future time.

IF YOU LOVE FLOWERS,

And love to cultivate them in the window garden, in the conservatory or out-door garden,

DR. SAMUEL JOHNSON, THE LEXICOGRAPHER.—Scenes in his Life.

DR. SAMUEL JOHNSON,

"THE DICTIONARY MAKER."

A Violet Velvet Pall—Early Recollections—School and University Life—Religiously Impressed—His Poverty—Becomes a School Usher—Marriage—Opens an Academy—Becomes a Press Writer in London—Grub Street—His Literary Works—Letter to his Mother—A Life Pension Secured—An Interview with the King—Fondness for Tea—Corking Goldsmith's Wine-bottle—Charitable Deeds—Praying with a Dying Servant—Standing Bareheaded in a Market Place—Death and Interment.

On Sunday, December 14th, in the church of St. Clement Danes, London, a conspicuous object was a violet velvet pall, which completely covered one of the pews. If any of the congregation present did not understand its significance, the preacher's sermon enlightened them. The pall covered the pew in which, above a hundred years ago, the great scholar, Dr. Samuel Johnson, used to worship regularly, and the pall was placed there as a mark of respect to his memory, on the hundredth anniversary of his death. The preacher dwelt on some striking contrasts between the man whose memory was thus honored and philosophers of the present day, not very favorable to the latter. He commended him as a firm believer in Christianity in an age of unblushing scepticism; said that he attended the services of the old Church regularly, and was noted for his meek, quiet, devout behavior in the house of God; that his kindness to the poor led him to give away £1000 out of an income of not more than $1500 a year, and that the closer his character was considered the more it must be regarded with admiration and reverence.

Another eminent man, referring to the celebrations which were taking place in honor of the day, drew a graphic picture of Dr. Johnson's character. He said: "He was thoroughly true, thoroughly heroic in all that relates to his family and the circle of his friends. The penance to which he subjected himself on account of the one breach of filial duty which he could recall, is a proof that his general performance of home duties was exemplary. It would be difficult to name a man of genius whose affections were more home-bred and sincere. If he had too much of the insular contraction of his countrymen, he possessed also that sense of the importance of morality which is a characteristic of the English race. Throughout all his books Johnson never palter with moral truth. Indeed, we do him less than justice if we do not recognize more in them than this negative merit—namely, a positive enthusiasm for all that is true, honest, lovely, and of good report. His books are sound, also, in respect of literary workmanship. But it is when we accompany him into his home that we see what he really was. A regular menagerie of queer human creatures, whose only claim upon him was that he alone would help them, there shared his bounty. Rough and gruff as he was, his heart was of heaven's finest gold."

Samuel Johnson was born in Lichfield on September 18th, 1709, and died on December 13th, 1784, in the seventy-fifth year of his age. His father was Michael Johnson, a bookseller and stationer, who was highly respected by the cathedral clergy, and for a time sufficiently prosperous to be a magistrate of the city, and, in the year of his son's birth, sheriff of the county.

Johnson very early began to manifest both his peculiar prejudices, and his peculiar powers. For many years he associated with his childish days a faint but solemn recollection of a lady in diamonds and long black hood. The lady was Queen Anne, to whom, in compliance with a superstition, prevalent then and for more than fifty years afterward, he had been taken by his mother to be TOUCHED FOR THE KING'S EVIL.

This disease scarred his features and seriously impaired his sight.

He learned to read at the school of Dame Oliver, a widow, who thought him, as she well might, the best scholar she had ever had. He then passed into the hands of one Tom Brown, who once published a spelling-book and dedicated it "to the Universe." He began to learn Latin, first with a Mr. Hawkins, and then with a Mr. Hunter, head master of Lichfield Grammar School—a petty tyrant, although a good scholar. At the age of fifteen he was transferred to Stourbridge School, and to the care of a Mr. Wentworth, who "taught him a great deal." There he remained a year, at the close of which he returned home, and for two years lived in his father's house in comparative idleness, loitering in the fields, and reading much, but without any plan or purpose.

In 1728, being flattered with some promises of aid from a Shropshire gentleman named Corbet,

HE WENT TO OXFORD UNIVERSITY, and was entered as a commoner in Pembroke College. About this time the hypochondriac affection, which rendered Johnson's long life a long disease, began to manifest itself. In the vacation of 1729 he was seized with the darkest despondency, which he tried to alleviate by violent exercise and other means, but in vain. It continued to recur at frequent intervals till the close of his days.

While he was at Oxford he met with Law's "Serious Call," and the reading of this book produced the strongest religious impressions, which remained through life. When told in after years that he had been described as a "gay and frolicsome fellow," he replied, "Ah! sir, I was mad and violent." It was bitterness which they mistook for frolic. He had begun to feel the pressure of poverty. His father's affairs were getting into disorder. This fact rendered his stay at Oxford very difficult. It is related that and his feet appeared through them, to the scandal of the Christ Church men, when he occasionally visited their college. A compassionate individual laid a new pair at his door, but he tossed them away as an insult. At last, his debts increasing, his supplies diminishing, and his father becoming bankrupt, he was compelled, much against his will, to leave college without a degree. In December, 1731, his father died.

Perhaps there was not now in Britain a person apparently more helpless and hopeless than this tall, half-blind, half-mad, and wholly miserable lad with ragged shoes, and no degree, left suddenly fatherless in Lichfield. But he had some warm friends in his native place who would not suffer him to starve outright. He had learning and genius, and he had, moreover, under much natural indolence and strengthening melancholy, an indomitable resolution, which needed only to be roused to make all obstacles melt before it. At first, however, nothing offered save the post of at Market Bosworth, which he occupied long enough to learn to loathe the occupation, with all his heart and soul, but which he soon resigned, and was again idle.

He was invited next to spend some time with an old schoolfellow named Hector, practising as a surgeon in Birmingham. Here he became acquainted with a mercer, named Porter, who, with his wife, befriended young Johnson. The youth became deeply attached to them both, and when, three years later, Mr. Porter died Johnson married the widow. Her age at the time was forty-six, the bridegroom being not quite twenty-six. Johnson loved his wife devotedly during life, and clung to her memory during a widowhood of more than thirty years as fondly as if they had been hero and heroine of a romantic fiction.

In 1736 there appeared in the Gentleman's Magazine, to which Johnson afterward became a leading contributor, an advertisement as follows: "At Edial, near Lichfield, young gentlemen are boarded and taught the Latin and Greek languages by Samuel Johnson." It, as seems probable, Mrs. Johnson's fortune, worth £1000, supplied the money for the venture, it was lost in the speculation. He obtained only three pupils, and at the end of a year and a half, annoyed alike with the duties of the office and with his want of success in their discharge, Johnson left for London, and reached it, with coins worth just seven cents in his pocket.

The principal habit of needy, struggling authors in London, in Johnson's age, was Grub Street.

THE ORIGINAL GRUB STREET.

It is said, first became associated with authorship during the increase of pamphlet literature, produced by the civil wars. Fox, the martyr, was one of its original inhabitants. In fact, it was a region of holes and corners, calculated to illustrate that great advantage of London life, which has been described as a place where a man could be always "close to his burrow." It was of this Grub Street that Johnson became an inmate, and here, until he became famous, he is described as "attired in threadbare clothing, and working at translations for various booksellers, seated behind a screen at the back of a bookseller's shop" (see frontispiece).

Johnson formed a resolution soon after he went to London, that, whatever might be his weekly engagements, his oppressive toils in literature, or his relaxations, he would go to

in his own words, "that he might learn how to purify and fortify his soul and hold real communion with the Highest;" and St. Clement Danes was the church he attended, and where, fifty years later, he was seen at the age of seventy-five publicly returning thanks to God for his recovery from a long illness. His attendance there was as remarkable for its quiet modesty and humility as his frequent appearances among his friends were for the impression he gave as a rugged dogmatist.

In March, 1738, he began to contribute to the Gentleman's Magazine. Among the variety of his contributions, the most remarkable were his "Debates in the Senate of Lilliput,"* which it was unlawful to report, but which the members would carry away as much as they could remember, and Johnson would then clothe in the sonorous, powerful language of which he was a master. One day, at a dinner at Foote's, Francis (the father of "Junius") mentioned a speech of Pitt's as the best he had ever read, and superior to anything in Demosthenes. Hereupon, Johnson replied, "I wrote that speech in a garret in Exeter Street."

LITERARY BEGINNINGS.

In May of the same year appeared his noble imitation of Juvenal, entitled "London," which at once made him famous. After it had been rejected by several publishers, it was bought by Dodsley for ten guineas ($52.50). It came out the same morning as Pope's great satire, entitled "1738," and excited a much greater sensation. The buzzing question ran, "What great unknown genius can this be?" It reached a second edition in a week. But though the author had become famous he continued poor, and tired almost to death of slaving for the booksellers, he applied, through the influence of Pope and Lord Gower, to procure a degree from Dublin that it might aid him in his application for a school at Appleby, in Leicestershire. In this, however, he failed, and had to persevere for many years more in the

of authorship. In the year 1745 appeared the prospectus of his most laborious undertaking, the "English Dictionary." This continued his principal occupation for eight years. In 1749 he published his "Vanity of Human Wishes," for which magnificent composition he received the miserable sum of fifteen guineas ($76.75). The next year he commenced the publication of his famous periodical, the Rambler, and carried it on with but small success till 1752. It is from this work that he is chiefly remembered as a great practical moralist. While he was writing it he never spent a single day of which he could said that he was entirely well and free from pain; and his spirits were often so depressed that he was more than once seen on his knees, praying God to preserve his understanding.

In 1755 Johnson visited Oxford, and was presented by acclamation with that degree of M.A. which he had left twenty-four years before without receiving; he also issued his "Dictionary," the work of eight long years, and for which he obtained the sum of $7875; but as he drew this in small sums while the work was in progress, it was all spent before the book was printed, and Johnson was as poor as before. How poor that was may be inferred from the fact that he was shortly afterward for a debt of twenty-eight dollars. His friend Richardson kindly came to his rescue, and paid the debt. In 1758 he began the Idler, which reached the 103d number.

The following year his mother died at the age of ninety—an event which deeply affected him. Here is his last letter to her:

"DEAR, HONORED MOTHER: Neither your condition nor your character makes it fit for me to say much. You have been the best mother, and, I believe, the best woman in the world. I thank you for your indulgence to me, and beg forgiveness of all that I have done ill, and of all that I have omitted to do well. God grant you His Holy Spirit, and receive you to everlasting happiness, for Jesus Christ's sake, Amen. Lord Jesus receive your spirit. I am, dear, dear mother, your dutiful son,

"SAMUEL JOHNSON."

He managed to raise twelve guineas, six of them borrowed from his printer, to send to his dying mother. In order to gain money for her funeral expenses and some small debts, he wrote the brilliant story of "Rasselas."

A great change, however, was approaching in Johnson's circumstances. When George III. came to the throne in 1760, it struck some of his advisers that it would be well "to open a new and brighter prospect for men of literary merit." Consequently, in 1762, the Earl of Bute bestowed on Johnson a pension worth $1500 per annum for life. In 1765 he was created LL.D. by Trinity College, Dublin. In 1767 he had an

INTERVIEW WITH THE KING

(see frontispiece). "I find," said Johnson, afterward, "that it does a man good to be talked to by his sovereign." The King asked whether he was writing anything, and our author excused himself by saying that he had told the world what he knew for the present, and had "done his part as a writer." "I should have thought so too," said the King, "if you had not written so well." "No man," said Johnson, "could have paid a higher compliment; and it was fit for a king to pay—it was decisive." When asked if he had replied, he said, "No, sir. When the King had said it, it was to be. It was not for me to bandy civilities with my sovereign."

Johnson was fond of a liberally-supplied table, and liked coarse, satisfying dishes; and in regard to wine he seems to have accepted the doctrine of the critic of a certain fluid professing to be port, who asked, "What more can you want? It is black, and it is thick, and it makes you drunk." He could, however, refrain, though he could not be moderate, and for all the latter part of his life, from 1766, he was a total abstainer. Nor, it should be added, does he ever appear to have sought for more than exhilaration from wine. His consumption of tea, however, was prodigious, and beyond all precedent. "A hardened and shameless teadrinker," Johnson called himself, who "with tea amuses the evenings, with tea solaces the midnight, and with tea welcomes the mornings." One of his tea-pots contained two quarts, and he professed to have consumed five and twenty cups at a sitting. Mrs. Thrale, a lady in whose house he lived in Southwark, complained of the fatigue of making tea for him, which he would sit and drink by the hour together (see frontispiece).

Among the number of Dr. Johnson's friends must be mentioned

OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

He, like Johnson, had tasted the bitterness of an usher's life, and escaped into the scarcely more tolerable regions of Grub Street. After some years of trial he was becoming known to the booksellers as a serviceable hand, and had two works in his desk destined to lasting celebrity. His landlady, apparently in 1764, one day arrested him for debt. Johnson, summoned to his assistance, sent him a guinea ($5.25), and speedily followed. The guinea had already been changed, and Goldsmith was consoling himself with a bottle of Madeira. Johnson corked the bottle (see frontispiece), and a discussion of ways and means brought out the manuscript of the now well-known "Vicar of Wakefield." Johnson looked into it, took it to a bookseller, got $300 for it, and returned to Goldsmith, who paid his rent and administered a sound rating to his landlady. The great, uncouth doctor delighted in performing deeds of kindness to others. Often when going home at one or two in the morning, he saw poor children asleep on thresholds and stalls, the wretched "street Arabs" of that day, and he was fond of putting pennies into their hands that they might be able to buy something for their breakfast (see frontispiece). In 1773 he fulfilled a long-cherished purpose of visiting Scotland and the Hebrides, the story of which trip he told afterward in his usual rotund and massive style. Two years later the University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of LL.D.

Boswell, the biographer of Johnson, met the great man at the house of the publisher Strahan. Johnson was asking to see a country lad whom he had recommended to Strahan as an apprentice. He asked for five guineas on account, that he might give one to the boy. "If a man recommends a boy and does nothing for him, it is sad work." A "little, thick, short-legged boy" was accordingly brought into the courtyard, whither Johnson and Boswell descended, and the doctor, bending himself down, administered some good advice to the awestruck lad, with slow and sonorous solemnity, ending by the presentation of the guinea (see frontispiece).

PRAYER WITH THE DYING.

The following is a touching instance of Dr. Johnson's piety and tenderness. In his Diary he notes the fact that he took leave of his "dear old friend, Catherine Chambers," who had been for about forty-three years in the service of his family. "I desired all to withdraw," he says, "then told her that we were to part on earth, and, as Christians, we should part with prayer, and that I would, if she was willing, say a short prayer beside her. She expressed great desire to hear me, and held up her poor hands, as she lay in bed, with great fervor, while I prayed kneeling by her. She then told me that to part was the greatest pain that she had ever felt, and that she hoped we should meet again in heaven. I pressed, with great emotion of kindness, the same hopes. We parted—I humbly hope to meet again and part no more."

BENEVOLENCE.

Mrs. Thrale, in her reminiscences of Dr. Johnson, tells us that he loved the poor as she never saw any one else love them, with an earnest desire to make them happy; his charity was wonderful. She declares that of the $1500 he received every year as a pension he gave away all but $400, and sometimes he did not spend even so much as $400 on himself. He had numerous dependants, abroad as well as at home. Several instances are given of his judicious charity. When, for example, a Benedictine monk, whom he had seen in Paris, in 1775, became a Protestant, Johnson supported him for some months in London till he could get a living. Once coming home late at night, he found a poor woman lying in the street. He carried her to his house on his back, and found that she was reduced to the lowest stage of want and disease. He took care of her until she was restored to health.

A SINGULAR PENANCE.

Once while he was staying at Lichfield, where a few old friends survived, he was missed one morning at breakfast, and did not return till supper time, when he told how his time had been passed. On that day fifty years before, his father, confined by illness, had begged him to take his place to sell books at a stall in Uttoxeter. Pride made him refuse. "To do away with the sin of this disobedience I, this day, went in a post-chaise to Uttoxeter, and going into the market at the time of high business uncovered my head and stood with it bare for an hour before the stall which my father had formerly used, exposed to the sneers of the standers-by and the inclemency of the weather; a penance for my boyish contumacy of my father" (see frontispiece).

In 1783 he had a stroke of palsy, which deprived him for a time of speech. That returned to him, however, but a complication of complaints, including asthma, sciatica, and dropsy, undermined his frame. Death had all along been a great object of dread, and its fast approacher was regarded with terror. "Cut deeper!" he cried to the physicians who were operating on his limbs, "Cut deeper! I don't care for pain, but I fear death." He fixed all his dying hope upon the cross, and, at last, on December 13th, 1783, this great man, whose fears had now subsided, and who had become as a little child, fell asleep in Jesus. He was interred in Westminster Abbey on December 20th, and his funeral was attended by the most distinguished men of the day.

The Natives of British India are Taking a significant method of displaying their dislike of British rule. They are feting the English viceroy, the Marquis of Ripon, whose policy the English Government does not approve. On November 30th two monster meetings of natives were held in Bombay—one at the town hall, and an overflow meeting outside, attended by twenty thousand persons—at which resolutions were adopted to present an address to the Marquis of Ripon, and sixty thousand rupees ($30,000) were subscribed on the spot to found an industrial institution as a memorial to the Marquis. The speakers warmly praised his moral elevation, practical good sense, and statesmanship. No white man in India ever before had an ovation approaching this one in magnificence or fervor, all of which may well arouse English suspicions of Indian loyalty. There is a report that Lord Ripon will succeed Earl Spencer as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and already there is heard a vigorous protest on the ground that Lord Ripon is a Roman Catholic. The law prohibits the appointment of a Roman Catholic to the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland, so that it will be necessary to repeal the law.

The Impudence of Liquor Dealers in Europe has been illustrated in a singularly marked manner. The Lord High Chancellor appoints the judges in England instead of their being, as with us, elected by the people. The chairman of a brewers' association has written to the newspapers complaining of the Lord Chancellor's action in appointing to a vacancy in the magistracy of Lincoln a gentleman who holds pronounced views on the question of total abstinence. This apologist for the traffic thinks that on the question of licenses such a magistrature is incapable of acting impartially, and, therefore, it is unjust to the interests of his class for such an appointment to be made. The complainant seems wholly oblivious of the fact that drinking customs have long had a monopoly of protection, and undue representation in the magistracy, and that in granting or refusing to grant new licenses, which is an important part of their duties, they, being interested parties, are not likely to be impartial. Another difficulty which must render the position of a liquor dealer acting as a judge somewhat delicate, is that a prisoner might plead that the beer manufactured by his judge was the cause of his crime.

ACCELERATION.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, January 4, 1885.

"I have neither brought my sword nor my weapons with me, because the king's business required haste."
—1 SAM. 21: 8.

Every one on King's Business—A Universal Need—God's Leisurely Work—Christ the King—His Palace—His Army and Navy—His Business—Important and Urgent—A Curious Swiss Custom—A Reaper with only One Sheaf—Fatal Deliberation—A Ruinous Fall for Adjournments—Facilities may Fail—Why Pythagoras Tied his Hair—Remorse in an Asylum—God's Patience may be Exhausted—Earthly Stay is Uncertain—Dr. Schenck's Death—The Dead Line Final—Aaron Burr's Opportunity—The Fatal Opalette.

The cradle of 1885 rocked on the grave of 1884. All intelligent people, whether Christian or unchristian, thoughtful about the closing of one volume of time and the opening of another. The striking of a clock is always suggestive, but the most tremendous stroke of the clock is on the night of the 31st of December, striking twelve. All of us reminded of the fact that we ought to swifter our pace. Acceleration.

In my text David comes before Abimelech without sword or food, and he apologizes for his unseemly appearance by the fact that he is on imperial and and has had no time properly to equip or accoutre himself. "I have neither brought my sword nor my weapons with me, because the King's business required haste." My friends, we are all on some part of the King's business, and our great need is to have our step accelerated.

God seems to be a Being of infinite leisure. He takes sometimes twenty-five hundred years to do one thing, although He took only six days to put the finishing touch on this world in order to make it habitable for the human race; yet geologists tell us that millions of years passed between the laying of and its final completion. And all that unimaginable reach of time to do that which He might have done in three months or three minutes! The fact is, that God has plenty of time. Eternity behind Him, and eternity before Him. No haste, no flurry, no precipitation. But we are so short lived, and the years so soon get away, that what we do we must do in shortest time and in quickest way. Acceleration. "The King's business required haste." And while at this juncture I speak to you, it seems as if the past hovered. One of the ministers of a former century said that when he stood in the pulpit it seemed as if the spirits of other worlds were hovering about the altar rails; and standing here at this crisis of the years, it seems to me as if all the past years hovered over us, and as though along all these walls we might see the faces of the past—a great picture gallery of souls. And so with earnestness I present the thought of the text when I say that "the King's business requires haste."

CHRIST IS OUR KING.

King of Zion, King of glory, King of earth, King of heaven. He is a King that always lives. Where is Louis XIV.? Dead. Where is Richard III.? Dead. Where is Henry VIII.? Dead. Where is Peter the Great? Dead. There is a whole sheaf of sceptres at the door of the tomb. Death is an old monarch, and his palace is a sepulchre, and the kings of the earth are his cupbearers; and the old blind monarch, walking around in the palace of sepulchres, ever and anon stumbles over a newly-fallen coronet. Charlemagne after death was set on a throne, and a crown was put upon his pulseless temples and a sceptre was put in his lifeless hand; but these things did not bring back his kingdom. But our King always lives. He lived before the world was made. He will live after the world is buried up. King immortal!

France has had a great deal of pride in the number of her palaces—St. Cloud, Versailles, Tuileries, Palais Royal, Luxembourg; but our King has the whole earth for HIS PALACE.

The mountains the picture gallery. The sun the chandelier. The midnight heavens its candle-lab. The forests its illimitable park. All the upholstery of the sunrise and the sunset the tapestry of its windows. The storms the lightning-hoofed couriers dashing up and down the sky. The flowers of the field its conservatory. The fish of the sea its aquarium. The splendors of land and sea and sky its wardrobe. The birds of a spring morning its orchestra. But better than all, the souls of His children on earth and the souls of His saints in heaven are the palace in which He loves to dwell. King universal. Ay, our King has, like other kings, and His navy. The tempests, as when they whelmed the Spanish armada. The volcanoes, as when they buried infamous Herculaneum. The fires, as when they struck Sodom into conflagration. The rocks, as when they crashed their terrors about the crucifixion. David counted the artillery as they came rolling down the sky, and he said: "The chariots of God are twenty thousand." Elisha's servant caught a glimpse of them amid the mountains, and they were a cavalcade of flame. Cherubim on His side. Seraphim on His side. Archangel on His side. King omnipotent!

Yes, our King is merciful. The Sultan of Turkey arranged that whenever he rode out on horseback his subjects might come up to him and tell their sorrows and tell their wrongs; and when the Sultan rode the crowd came up, and after a while his progress was impossible. But more merciful is our King, for at any hour of the day or night we may come up to Him and tell all our wants and all our sorrows and get relief. To come to other courts we must have a court dress rightly cut and rightly adorned; but to come into the presence, into the court of our King, we need no such preparation, and the beggar may come with his rags, and the prodigal from the filth of the swine-trough, and be without introduction immediately ushered. Merciful King! Pardon King! Sympathetic King! Oh, Jesus, live forever!

It is on the business of such a King you and I have come. That is which calls us here. All other business compared with it is the sport of a holiday. If a man go into a business operation and he lose $100,000, and his house go down, and his estate perish, and this defalcation takes down another and another and another, until the whole land quails under the panic, the disaster is not so great as the ruin of that man who bankrupts his own soul, and the example takes down another and another and another, until all worlds feel the defalcation. William the Conqueror had forty-six churches torn down and swept away in order that he might have his park for game enlarged. There are men now who sweep away all their spiritual interests in order that they may enlarge their amusements and enlarge their worldly gains, but the day of eternity will reveal that the most important business on earth and the most important business in heaven is the King's business.

But, my friends, this business of the King is not only important, it is URGENT.

In other words, if not attended to right away, it may never be attended to at all. There are those, for instance, who propose—Christian people who propose—that after a while they will be consecrated, after a while they will be diligent students of the Scriptures, after a while they will be importunate in prayer. Oh, what good Christians you and I mean to be after a while! Meanwhile our day of grace is going. Meanwhile our opportunities are going. Out with your Bibles and begin to read! Down on your knees and begin to pray! The business of the store, the office, the shop, the street, is interfering with the King's business. Up, man, the King's business requires haste—haste!

In Berne, Switzerland, it was the custom for many years to have the clocks one hour ahead of the real time, and it came from this fact: many years before an army had besieged the city, and they had the stratagem that when the cathedral of that city struck twelve all the forces from all sides should advance. And so they waited for the hour to come. After a while the cathedral tower by mistake struck one instead of twelve, and the surrounding enemy thought they had lost their opportunity, they were an hour short the time. They felt it too late to start, they gave up the stratagem, and the city was saved. And then by public decree, and for many years, in remembrance of that deliverance, all the clocks of the city were kept one hour ahead of time, and they struck one when it was twelve, and they struck twelve when it was eleven. Oh, Christian men and women, set your clocks on, set your clocks on! Better come too early than come too late. "The King's business requires haste—haste!"

In the great day of eternity what will be the position of that Christian man who comes up to the gate, and he has

when he has spent his entire life in a golden harvest field? There is a work of comfort to be done. Go to-day with the balsam of the Gospel. To-morrow will not do as well. Now, O Christian man, is your time. It is now or never in that particular case. Yesterday you met a man upon whose soul you might have wrought graciously. You said: "Not now; I'll meet him next week, I'll meet him next year, or I'll meet him next summer at the seashore, and that particular opportunity went away never to come back. To-morrow you will meet some one with whom you will have an opportunity of usefulness. You will say: 'I had better wait until the next time.' It may be at ten o'clock, it may be at twelve o'clock, it may be at three o'clock, it may be at six o'clock, and deciding not to do the work for God at that moment, you will never do it at all. "The King's business requires haste."

We have—I am speaking of Christian people now—we have a FATAL DELIBERATION.

We sit in church wondering how the world is to be saved. We fold our hands in great and protracted thought. We really wonder how we and how the church of God had better go to work. Meanwhile we decide that after a while the millennium will start. If the millennium starts next year there will be six millions of people that it will not touch—six millions of people who will die this year. All the influence that you and I and Christian people have upon the six million people who will die this year, must be exerted within twelve months. The work with some of them must be within one month, within one week, within one day, within one hour. So that I feel flashing upon my soul this idea, that this opportunity never returns. We might attend together again in some other service, but it would not be just this opportunity. Then there are those to whom I come this morning to whom I will never come again. And this is the hour. I cannot say to-morrow, I cannot say to-night, I cannot say this afternoon.

NOW IS THE TIME.

Have you never heard that your neighbor was sick and afterward you said within yourself, "Now, that man has made no preparation for the eternal world, and we are good friends, and I must go over and talk to him about his soul?" But that day you were busy and could not go, you thought. The next day you were busy and could not go, and third day you went and you pulled the bell at the door, and the door was opened, and you said: "How is he to-day?" and the servant replied, "He is dead." "Oh," you say, "that can't be possible! How long has he been dead?" "Five minutes!" May God have mercy on that Christian man who comes five minutes too late.

But that is a very unfaithful sermon which has not something for all people present. I would never go to church, I would never enter any house of God if I did not think I could get help—help for my soul, help in the conflicts of life, help to get my sins conquered and my sins slain. And so I suppose we all feel here this morning, and I have been preaching up to this point exclusively to those who profess to be Christian; but if I could go through these aisles and through these galleries and ask you in a gentlemanly way, "What is your spiritual condition?" you would frankly, and in a gentlemanly way, answer, "I am not a Christian; although I regard these things, I am not yet a child of God." That would be your frank utterance. And so I could not let the opportunity, my brother, my sister, pass without speaking to you just as a brother talks to a brother—not perfunctorily, or as a man might formally preach because he is invested with authority, or because he has had Presbyterian hands upon his head, but as a brother talks to a brother. And I am your brother, and so I accost you, and I accost you with the interests of your soul.

Now, a case comes on in court, and sometimes the witnesses are not ready, and it is adjourned. The same case comes up again, and the plaintiff is not ready. The case is adjourned. The same case comes up again, and the defendant is not ready. The case is adjourned. The same case comes up again, and perhaps the judge is not ready. The case is adjourned, until after a while there is of costs to pay. Oh, how ruinous! And so, my brother, you have taken this case of the soul, your own soul, and you have adjourned it from youth to midlife, or you have adjourned it from health to sickness, or you have adjourned it from prosperity to adversity, until I fear there is going to be an infinite bill of costs to pay. Oh, deliberating, halting, procrastinating soul, "the King's business requires haste!"

Do you not realize—the thought sometimes comes upon me oppressively—that your mental FACULTIES MAY FAIL

after a while, before you had attended to the things that pertain to your soul's welfare? The ratio of ruined intellects in this country is increasing year by year. There is something in our climate that urges people to such extremes, and there is such a pressure upon our active business men, that sometimes mental disorders come and put an end to the man's prospects of repentance. He had plenty of time of illumined mental faculty to attend to the matter, but he procrastinated until his mental faculties fell from the throne. Pythagoras had such a morbid idea about the importance of studying philosophy, that he with a string tied the hair of his head to a beam, so that if at any time he began to slumber and his head nodded, the pain would awaken him. So there are now men who have such a morbid idea that they must be busy and attend to this, and attend to that, and the other thing, and the strain is too great for them, and the most brilliant men of business, and the most brilliant men of professional life, are finding their intellects giving way.

Now, suppose that while a man has the opportunity of attending to the great work for which his mind was given him, suppose he neglects that, and suppose his mind perishes—what then? A slip, a fall, a sudden stroke on the head, some affliction for which you are not ready may destroy the intellect. And do you really think if your intellect perished that you would have no responsibility in the fact that for many years, with an unclouded mind, you rejected God? Among the vast populations in the asylum, or carefully guarded in private abode, there are those who for twenty, thirty, forty, fifty years expected to be Christians, but after a while mental disorders fell upon them, and though now they are not responsible, and though they should not be brought into account for anything they do while under mental eclipse, do you not really think they will be brought into an account for the long years when they were not under mental eclipse? Oh, while you have your full reason, put it to the grandest use in weighing eternity against time! While you have your will, put it to the grandest use in coming to God. While you have your brilliant imagination, put it to the grandest use in bringing around you the realities of the eternal world. Do not let that brilliant torch go out until you find the road to heaven. "The King's business requires haste."

REMORSE IN AN ASYLUM.

In one of the asylums of Massachusetts there is a man who for many years was wrought upon by the Holy Spirit of God and refused to yield his soul to the divine service. His mental faculties failed after a while, and now, week after week, and month after month, and year after year, I am told, he says only one thing, and he says it day and night: "If I only had!"

Beside that, the text comes upon us with great force when we have the consideration that you all must admit, that after a while

GOD'S PATIENCE MIGHT BE EXHAUSTED.

It is indisputable that there are men in midlife, or in early life, or in old age who so aggravatingly reject the Gospel that God lets them alone. They slam the door of the soul in God's face, and tell Him to begone. Eternal affront is given, and in the book from which no erasures are made their name is recorded among the doomed. Let a man cross the line which separates God's mercy from His indignation—let a man cross that line one inch, and he is as badly off as though he had gone ten thousand furlongs beyond. Oh, before the door is shut, enter! Before the ship sails, get on board! "The King's business requires haste—haste!"

Beside that, my subject comes upon me with the greater force when I remember that our

EARTHLY STAY IS UNCERTAIN.

How I was thrilled when that little piece of paper (exhibiting a slip announcing the death of Rev. Dr. Schenck) was handed to me this morning, announcing the departure of one who only a little while ago had as much life and health as we have! We are all living on borrowed capital, and know not when it may be called in. There is no map of the great future into which we are travelling. No explorer has gone there and come back to tell us how it is. We feel our way along, knowing not when the lion may spring upon us from the jungle.

There are so many ways of getting out of life—by fall, by assassination, by overwork, by malaria, by insidious disease, by misplaced railroad switch, by rotten bridge, by fractious horse, by falling wall. Suddenly the curtain falls and the lights are put out, and we go so quickly. Our passage from this life to the next is quicker than I could drop my handkerchief from one hand to the next. The clock ticks one moment and we are here. The clock ticks the next moment and we are in eternity. And what if we die not prepared? Can there be any sorrow greater than that? Who can imagine the horror of that undoing? If I have had—for I make it a personal matter with myself—if I have had twenty, thirty, forty years of opportunity for repentance, and have not genuinely repented, what then? There can be no rectification of blunders beyond.

THE DEAD LINE.

There is no place in the grave to pray. The rider of the pale horse spurs on his steed, and we know not at what moment he may be pounding at the gate for admittance. "What thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might." "The King's business requires haste."

Do you know how near Aaron Burr came to being a Christian? While in Princeton College a revival of religion came, and Aaron Burr, powerfully wrought upon by his sense of sin, was about to fly to God for refuge and pardon, when he happened to meet one of those ministers of the Gospel who do not believe in revivals, and the minister said: "Oh, that is all fanaticism—that you get in the college there is all fanaticism!" And Aaron Burr shook off his religious impressions, and went that dreadful path of ruin and licentiousness and abomination that has been conspicuous to all the years since, and is as infamous as anything in American history. Almost in the kingdom of God, but not quite. One little push in the wrong way sent him down. There is a sea-flower called

THE OPALETTE.

It is very beautiful, it is exquisite in color and shape, it is as beautiful as anything that ever bloomed, but it is poisonous, and the little fish comes and touches it, and struggles and dies. And then there are other petals to the flower that sweep around and take the fish down into the dead bosom. Oh, sin is beautiful sometimes—exquisitely beautiful! Oh, how attractive sin is, how it puts forth an exquisite bloom! But it is poisonous, and if it touches a soul, the soul is poisoned. And those petals of sin reach out after my soul, and reach out after your soul, and only this glorious net of the Gospel sweeping around can take us out and take us up. Hear you not the music drop from the throne? "Come unto me all ye who are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Oh, that is what we want! Rest, rest!

"Art thou weary, art thou languid, art thou sore distressed?"

Come to me, saith one, and coming be at rest.

If I ask Him to receive me, will He say me nay?

Not till earth and not till heaven pass away.

Finding, following, struggling, keeping, is He sure to bless?

Saints, apostles, prophets, martyrs, answer, Yes."

The Island of Madagascar is to be Used by France as a penal settlement. The intelligence of this decision has awakened strong indignation in Europe, where it is regarded as an outrage without justification. The French claim upon the island has no basis in right, and now that it is decided to send there the dregs of French society the conduct of the Government is unanimously condemned. It will probably do the cause of missions there irretrievable injury.

The Superiority of the Shoeblocks and newsboys in Detroit, Mich., to those of other cities, caused inquiries to be made as to the reason. A prominent citizen said that the date of the improvement corresponded with a new regulation requiring each boy to wear a badge issued by the mayor, and which he would retain only during good behavior. He said: "We have found that the badges identify the boys, and give them a feeling of self-respect and accountability which they never possessed before. The badges have made the boys self-respecting and honest. They are little business men, and are as dignified as you please. Their names are in the Mayor's office and their numbers on their breasts, and they feel that the eyes of the city are upon them." A similar sense of individual responsibility, in a far higher degree, ought to influence the Christian in daily life. His name is written in heaven, and the eyes of his Father are constantly upon him (Luke 10:20).

What to Do with Old Tenement Houses was a subject discussed by the New York Commissioners, recently. A report was presented to them by their inspector. Among the representative houses which he described was a large house in Frankfort Street, where there is a constantly changing population, and the tenantry is composed of the lowest and most degraded order of society. The prevailing type is the "swamp angel." The janitor is forced to carry a revolver, and every spring it is necessary to build new stairways. In the winter all the woodwork is used for firewood. The only way in which that place could be made habitable, said the inspector, is to tear the old house down and build a new one. Those who have seen the building are likely to agree with the sensible advice. It is a pity that men who are trying to reform themselves by leaving off bad habits and are discouraged by their lack of success do not adopt the same principle. Only by the new birth is there hope of permanent reformation (II Cor. 5:17).

THE RETURN OF CHRIST.

By Mr. D. L. Moody.

The Quickening Influence of the Doctrine—Paul's Frequent References to it—The Promise of Change without Dying—Christ's Return will be Sudden and Unexpected—Exhorted to Watch—Our Hope—God's Chronology—A Stimulus to Holy Life and to Work.

I WANT to call your attention this morning to the return of our Lord. Now, there are two classes in the church at the present time. Some take the ground that He is to come before the Millennium, and others take the ground that He is to come after the Millennium. All agree that He will come—that point is not disputed, but the division of opinion arises whether He is coming before the Millennium or after it. We want to hold the truth as we see it in love, and not harshly insist on controverted points; but I say if ministers would only preach His coming either before or after the Millennium,

IT WOULD QUICKEN THE CHURCH.

Indeed, I don't know of anything that would take the Church out of the world quicker than this blessed doctrine of Christ's return. For my part, I believe the Scriptures teach that He is going to come before the Millennium—that is, from my standpoint—but I don't like to be dogmatic and blame other men that don't see exactly as I do, for I think harm is done by some taking up this doctrine and finding fault with others because they do not see as they do.

I know there is a class of people who say, "You ought not to bring this subject up before young converts, because it is so dark, and mysterious, and so prophetic that the young disciples cannot understand it." Now, in Paul's epistles—thirteen times in his different epistles—he refers to baptism, and fifty times he refers to our Lord's return. Now, there is no church but what makes a very great deal of baptism—it is one of the foundation stones; but so little is said about Christ's coming. It is said this doctrine will get the young converts into a fog; but why was it that Paul, writing to young converts, brings it in in nearly every epistle? There are two hundred and sixty chapters in the New Testament, and three hundred and eighteen different passages about our Lord's second coming. Now, what makes the fifteenth chapter of first Corinthians so sweet to the Church of God? What makes it one of the most precious chapters in the whole of the Bible? When we have lost our friends, how we turn to that chapter! What is it there that gives us such comfort? It not only speaks of His death and burial and resurrection, but it tells us He is going to come again, and with Him He is going to bring our friends. In the fifty-first verse it says, "Behold, I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed." Glorious thought! that we shall be

CHANGED EVEN WITHOUT DEATH

—there will be some that will never taste death. When He comes His people will be caught up and changed without death. As Enoch escaped death, and Elijah did, we shall do the same—those that are living when He returns.

Now, I have got the same authority that He is coming back as I have for His birth—angels announced His conception and birth—and for His resurrection. Angels also announced His return. When He went up those men stood there gazing up at Him as He went up through the clouds, and the clouds received Him out of their sight; and two angels, or two men—perhaps it was Enoch and Elijah—dropped down by their side and said, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus who is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." He went up unexpectedly; He is going to RETURN UNEXPECTEDLY.

He tells us we are to be ready. I know some people say that this means death; but if you will notice carefully, there is not a place, I believe, in the New Testament where a man is told to be watching for death. He is to be watching for his Lord. People say, what is the difference? There is a good deal of difference between watching for life—or translation—and watching for death. There is not much comfort in watching for death and the grave, but there is a good deal of comfort in watching for our blessed Master's return. Now, to see that death and the second coming of our Lord and Saviour are different, will you turn to the fourth chapter of the first Thessalonians, fourteenth and eighteenth verses; we read, "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him." They are going to accompany Him when He comes back.

The story of the Coming of the Bridegroom and of the Ten Virgins is told to bring out this very thing. The Bridegroom is going to come, and the bride shall be taken off into the bridal chamber. The early Christians not only believed this, but taught it, and urged the people to be

WATCHFUL FOR HIS COMING.

Now, if God tells us to watch, it is always safe to do what He says. If He tells us to run, run. If He tells us to stand still, stand still. If He tells us to leap, leap. Do just what He tells us. Now, over and over again the Master has left us word, Watch! Watch!! Watch!!! and if we do not watch, and He comes unexpectedly, and we are not ready, we shall not meet Him with joy and gladness—we shall not be glad to see Him.

And He HAS PROMISED TO COME.

His word has gone out. Did He ever break His word? Didn't He promise the Saviour, and didn't the Saviour come? Didn't devil and man try to prevent Him? But He came, and did the work God had for Him to do. Then, when He went away, He said He would send the Holy Spirit, and the Holy Spirit came some days afterward; and hasn't He been here ever since? Then He said, "I will come again." What makes the fourteenth chapter of John so precious? Is it because of those precious mansions He has gone to prepare? I will tell you what makes it so precious, "I will come again;" He is coming back. In Luke 21:34 the same promise is repeated with a warning. There again we are told to watch. He has to be up and watchful that sees the morning star. You won't see the morning star unless you are watching, and if we are watching we shall be ready when Jesus comes; and although He may come suddenly and unexpectedly, we shall meet Him with joy and gladness, like a wife who has had a husband off on a sea voyage. He has been gone a long time, and there has been no means of communicating with him; but the last communication she received said he was coming, and he might come unexpectedly. She would therefore be watching, and how gladly she would receive him. So our absent Lord has said, "Be watching, I will be back again." It but you know a thousand years is as one day in God's sight; and it is only the afternoon of the second day, after all, with the Lord. It may be very soon now; He may come suddenly at any time. The true attitude of the believer is to be looking, to be watching, to have our conversation in heaven. We are aliens down here. We ought to be like sentinels in an enemy's camp, on the alert all the while—watching. I can imagine some men saying, "What are you going to do with those people who have died during the past eighteen hundred years, that expected the Lord to come in their day?" I am going to say they died doing what the Master told them to do. He told them to watch. That was enough; and though death overtook them while they watched, they must have had a glorious end, because they were obeying the Master.

The true attitude for every child of God on this earth for six thousand years, except for thirty-three, has been to look for a Man from heaven. When Adam fell in Eden he was promised, "The seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent;" and for four thousand years the Promised One was expected; Eve's daughters were looking for the Man from heaven. Now, when Christ had been here for thirty-three years, He said, "I will come back," and He sent those angels to tell them that He was coming back. And from that day to this the true attitude of every child of God is to be watching—look for the Man from heaven; and I don't know of anything that will take a man out of the whirlpool of this world sooner than this doctrine. I will tell you, bonds and stocks will look very trifling compared with it; they will look like dust in the balance—the things of this world will be very small—it lifts a man outside of himself. You let a man get up in a balloon; the higher he goes the smaller the earth looks. So when our life is hid in Him, and when we are constantly thinking about Him, things will look pretty small down here, and heaven will be very near and will be very precious.

Some of the objectors to this doctrine say, if you teach it you discourage work, and these young converts won't work. For my part, I have done three times as much work since I saw this doctrine. I never met with anything before that so stimulated me to work. I look upon this world as an old, wrecked vessel, bound to go down, and God has given to me a lifeboat, and said to me, "Rescue every man you can; get them out of the perishing world." The world may say what it likes about this, but God is going to destroy it.

ANNIVERSARY OF MR. SPURGEON'S PASTORS' COLLEGE.

THE College Anniversary at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, always popular and attractive, was this year more so than ever; for not only was it the pleasant reunion yearly looked forward to, but it was also the occasion upon which farewell was taken of the pastor's son, Rev. Thomas Spurgeon, who is now on his way back to his New Zealand pastorate. The young minister must have found it no easy task to submit to all the hand-shaking, and to receive all the expressions of good-will which came upon him from every side. To be the son of a father so much beloved, and to be at the same time as much beloved for his own sake, must have proved for once rather a burdensome advantage.

Mr. Spurgeon, alluding to the arrangement that all the speeches of the evening except his son's were to be short, said they would all agree with that, for, as they would not be troubled by his son again for so long, they might bear with a double quantity now. In his usual strain he referred to the kindness shown by friends in their support of the College, Orphanage, and other institutions. In the matter of statistics he mentioned that during the twenty-eight years in which the College has been in existence, six hundred and eighty-eight men had been received, and had gone forth as pastors and missionaries, forty-seven had fallen asleep, and five hundred and seventy-two were still engaged in the work of the Lord. Fourteen had settled in pastorates since their last anniversary, and during the same period, those who had been trained in the College reported the baptism of fifty-eight thousand, one hundred and seventy-three persons, and an increase in church membership of fifty thousand nine hundred and twenty-four.

Mr. Spurgeon said that in religious work their reliance was upon the Eternal Arm, that would not fail them until the very end. Many preached, he said, for whom it would have been better if they had never preached at all. They were like the parson at Oxford, who preached a sermon which did not satisfy anybody, and when he had done some one said he did better last year. "What do you mean?" he asked. "You must be mistaken, I did not preach last year." "Ah," replied the first speaker, "that is what I mean!"

A MAN IN AN IRON SAE.

One more characteristic anecdote must be mentioned. Mr. Spurgeon said he could almost wish that he could escape from the position that he now occupied, with so many institutions hanging upon him. He certainly would if he could, for he felt very feeble now; but he was something like the man he spoke to last Monday. This man was a jute manufacturer in Dundee. He had made a great room in which to keep his iron safe, and one of his workmen went into the iron safe to dust it, and let the door go bang, and he had not got the key and was in there yet. According to the last report it would take three days to get him out. There was a grating through which they fed him through a tube, and he (Mr. Spurgeon) thought he had got into the "safe" condition very much, and it did not seem possible for him to get out.

The last speech of the evening was from the Rev. Thomas Spurgeon, who said he had no cause to regret that seven years ago he sailed to the Antipodes, or that five years ago he took his second voyage across the world. God had greatly blessed him, and friends in Tasmania had greatly assisted him. During his present visit to England he had received contributions to the extent of two thousand five hundred dollars. Besides financial help, he had received a present of a clock from his brother's congregations at Greenwich, and his beloved father had given him what he should prize more than anything else, and that was the Bible from which he used to preach in New Park Street Chapel. Friends of the Tabernacle had given him what he greatly prized: viz., a Communion service. There was, he said, a hearty welcome waiting him on the other side, and it was simply like sailing from one sunshine into another.

A REMARKABLE FAITH CURE.

IN Triumphs of Faith the following testimony is given by Miss Carrie B. Bates, who dates from 69 Second Avenue, New York:

"When in my third year, I fell from a carriage, and my mother always thought I must have received an internal injury, for very soon after I commenced having severe trouble in my back and left limb, which left me quite lame, and with spinal disease.

"I never knew what it was to feel entirely rested, and do not remember a day without pain, although at some periods in my life having considerable strength. I was never more than two thirds well and often much worse than that. Walking was always hard for me. I never, in my best days, could walk more than a quarter of a mile without feeling ill effects. I was very ambitious, and was constantly overtaxing myself. In the fall of 1875 I was completely prostrated. What I suffered none but the dear Father will ever know. I received benefit at a sanitarium, but could not be cured.

"For several years I had not improved, and during the winter of 1882 was more poorly than usual. Some days could work or read a little; other days not. Went out occasionally; could not visit much without injury. The last physician that examined me did not want to treat my case; said he felt sorry for any one in the condition I was in. I was considered a harder subject than many who were entirely confined to their beds. I had been thinking, reading and praying about faith-healing for nearly six years; but did not see it was my privilege to reach forth my hand and accept it of the Lord. The next March I went with my father to dear 'Faith Rest Cottage,' in Buffalo. I was suffering from a severe attack of dyspepsia at the time, and was so weak that it seemed a great undertaking for me to go.

"I believe my friends will bear me witness that I was not a gloomy, discouraged invalid, unwilling to exert myself; but that I was very apt to go beyond my strength. I had through suffering and trials of various kinds, been brought where I could put my trust in God and say, 'Thy will be done.'

"Soon after this, the thought came to me that I had obeyed all God's commands in reference to sickness. The prayer of faith had been offered for me, and if God's Word were true I would be healed. I said, 'Lord, I will believe, whether I feel it or not.' Just then God graciously gave me the positive assurance.

"I want to add that my back did not trouble me any after I was healed and has ever since been the strongest part of my body. I am not nearly so lame as formerly, and know I shall be 'every whit whole.' Am now by faith. I have led an extremely busy life since my healing. Am this year at Bethany Institute, in New York, a mission training school for ladies. I study part of the day and do city mission work in the afternoon. I do not mind climbing stairs, and have often walked two miles without resting. For years previous to my healing I did not have a day without headache."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

The Writing in the Prisoner's Cell.—At a recent meeting the Rev. Mr. Ross said: "I was speaking to a young man, and he told me that at one time he had been one of a gang of thieves in Glasgow, and was caught in their company, taken to prison, tried, and was found guilty, and got twelve months' imprisonment. One day while he was sitting in his cell he saw some writing scratched on the wall, and rising, he read, 'Oh, that thou wouldst trust in the Lord.' 'That is what I have never done yet,' thought the young man; but now he has accepted the Lord Jesus as his Saviour, and has lately been received back again into his mother's house."

An Ambassador's Trouble Removed.—The Rev. Mr. Ross said: "At one time Queen Elizabeth sent for one of her subjects, and desired that he would go as her ambassador in a matter that exposed him to great danger. On hearing the Queen's commands, the man, usually brave, faltered and looked very uncomfortable. 'What is the matter?' asked the Queen. 'Do you fear to go?' 'No, your Majesty,' he replied; 'but I fear for my wife and children. Who will care for them if I do not return?' 'I will take care of them,' replied the Queen; 'I never neglect the interests of those who serve me.' This is just what the Lord does. When He sends any of His children on a message for Him, we may rest assured that He will take care of all their interests, and assume all responsibility."

A Noble-hearted Bride.—A Christian Worker tells us that at the time of the civil war in America a young man was asked to join the ranks, but he thought of one whom he was soon to marry, and love made him hesitate; but at length he was persuaded, and went into battle. The girl wondered what kept him from writing to her, and grew very anxious about him. She went to the battle-fields in search of him, but failing to find him there, she went to the places of the wounded; and as she was passing through one of them she heard a deep moan, and, looking in the direction from which it came, she saw her lover. After the first greeting was over, he said: "My poor girl! I must part forever; I have lost both my arms, and I do not know how I shall be able to earn my bread." The young girl, uncovering her fine strong arms, said, "Do you see that? I will find bread for both of us; will you trust me?" Jesus is asking wounded and helpless sinners if they will trust Him; His arm is strong. Will you lean upon it?

A Self-Deceived Sister.—"I Went to Visit a woman of whose salvation I was doubtful. She had a brother who was away from home ill of a fever. After we had conversed for a little I tried to open the subject of religion, but it was rather difficult, for she did not seem inclined for such conversation. I tried to introduce it by asking how her brother was. She informed me that she was just going to meet him at the station. I then asked God to give me grace to ask her how it was with her soul, which He did. She grew very angry, and said: 'I am just as good as my neighbors; I do more than any of them; I am a Sabbath-school teacher, I go to church every Sunday, and I read my Bible, and what more can I do, I should like to know?' I told her all these things were very good in their way, but that nothing which she could do would ever save her. She would not stay to talk with me, but went away to meet her brother. I left the house with a very sad heart. When the woman returned home, she took the same fever as her brother had, and died suddenly and without hope in Christ as her Saviour. She refused to listen to the only means by which she could be saved, and went from the world to reap the terrible harvest."

A Stableman's Conversion.—Captain Hatfield related: "One Sunday morning, before seven o'clock, as I was walking along one of the streets of our city, I passed a young man standing at a stable door. Turning back I asked him if his soul was saved. He answered in the affirmative, and then I asked him how long it was since he had given himself to Christ. 'Last Tuesday night,' was his reply. 'I went into a meeting, and some one asked all those who wished to be saved to come to the front. I among many others went. We were then asked to kneel, which we did, and earnest prayers were offered on our behalf. While I was on my knees God changed my heart, and I gave myself to Christ as my Saviour.' 'Have you confessed Christ to your companions and at home?' You must witness for Him, I said. 'Yes,' the young man replied; 'I told my companions, but I did not tell mother until last night.' 'And what did she say?' 'She was very glad to hear it, and told me to keep in the narrow path which leadeth to everlasting life.' This convert's position in life is a humble one, but men take knowledge of Him that he has been with Jesus, and learned of Him."

A Wealthy Farmer's Folly.—The Rev. Mr. Puget related the following: "A well-to-do farmer went into an evangelistic meeting; he was a genial, hearty man, and he had a godly wife. At the end of the meeting he said to his wife, 'I have a good mind to return and surrender myself to God.' 'Oh, do!' urged his wife; but just then the devil met him, and the farmer said, 'No, I think I will not go to-night'; but his wife tried to persuade him to give himself to the Saviour. 'No, Mary, do not press me; some other time will do. I will not go to-night.' They went out, and got upon a dog cart which was waiting for them at the door. On their way home they came to a turn in the road where there was a precipice, and here the horse stumbled and fell, and the man was thrown over the precipice into the chasm beneath. Very much alarmed, his wife called to him, 'Are you very much hurt?' but there was no reply. Again she cried, 'Oh, speak to me; are you very much hurt?' No answer. A third time she called to him; 'Are you very much hurt?' 'Yes,' he said; 'I rejected salvation when I might have had it, and now it is too late.' With these words his soul passed away."

A Youthful Pickpocket.—Dr. Cameron remarked: "I like to think of the boy who, one Sunday, when coming out of church, tried to pick a gentleman's pocket; but he was just caught in the act, for the gentleman noticed him, and got hold of his hand. He did not call a policeman, but took the little fellow to the Sunday-school, and put him in his own class. One day the boy said to him: 'Sometimes I feel awfully wanting to steal again.' 'Well,' said the gentleman, 'if I took hold of your hand, and went all your messages with you, would you feel like wanting to steal?' 'Oh, no,' replied the lad, looking up into his face; 'I would never want to steal if you were with me.' 'I cannot always be with you, but one who is better than I am can always be with you, if you will let Him. Jesus will always be with you, my boy.' 'Will He?' inquired the boy; 'well, I will take Him.' And he did take Him, and as long as he was conscious that Jesus was by his side he never felt inclined to steal. It is just when we lose sight of the Saviour that the tempter comes to us and prevails; but Jesus makes the weakest strong to resist the most powerful temptation."

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Increase in the Public Debt is Recorded for the month of December. The announcement is so unusual as to have caused some excitement. The public have been accustomed to read, with unvarying regularity, the monthly statement of a large reduction, and now that an increase is reported, a general feeling of uneasiness has been produced. The Treasury statements show a decrease in the receipts for the month and an increase in the expenditure as compared with the corresponding month of 1883. The decrease in the public debt in December a year ago was less than $2,000,000 and the expenditures were $12,000,000. This year the increase is $500,000, but the expenditures are $22,000,000. In reply to inquiries on the subject, Secretary McCulloch said that the increase of the debt is due not so much to any unusual expenditures during the month as to the fact that there has been a great falling off in the receipts. For the past two months the Treasury, he says, has been feeling the effect of the general depression of business all over the country, and the revenues have generally decreased.

The President-Elect Defined his Attitude respecting the civil service in an important letter published last week. It was addressed to Mr. George William Curtis, President of the Civil Service Reform Association, and was written in reply to a letter from that gentleman. Governor Cleveland, in the course of his letter, referring to the Pendleton law, says: "I regard myself pledged to this because my conception of true Democratic faith and public duty requires that this and all other statutes should be in good faith and without evasion enforced, and because in many utterances made prior to my election as President, approved by the party to which I belong and which I have no disposition to disclaim, I have in effect promised the people that this should be done." As to the superior grades of the service, the Governor says: "There is a class of government positions which are not within the letter of the civil service statute, but which are so disconnected with the policy of an administration that the removal therefrom of present incumbents, in my opinion, should not be made during the terms for which they were appointed, solely on partisan grounds and for the purpose of putting in their places those who are in political accord with the appointing power." An exception, however, is likely to be made in the case of those employes who have taken a prominent part in politics, some of whom, the Governor thinks, "have forfeited all just claim to retention, because they have used their places for party purposes in disregard of their duty to the people; and because, instead of being decent public servants, they have proved themselves offensive partisans and unscrupulous manipulators of local party management." In conclusion, the Governor reminds his own party, though his administration is to be Democratic, a due regard of the people's interests does not permit faithful party work to be always rewarded by appointment to office. The publication of this letter has attracted wide attention, and has allayed apprehensions of a disturbance of public business as a consequence of wholesale removals.

The Danger of Cholera Visiting this Country next summer has stirred up the tenement-house commissioners in New York to a more thorough examination of the tenement-houses of the city. The report of the inspectors, published last week, shows the necessity for prompt and decisive measures. The report deals with 968 houses, occupied by 881 families, or 37,114 persons, representing all the conditions of tenement-house life. The report stated that forty-seven of the houses were so hopelessly bad that they should be condemned to destruction. There are about 26,000 tenement-houses in the city. Nearly twenty-five per cent of the cellars examined were in bad condition, and less than forty per cent were paved. Tidewater and filth soaked into many of them. Fire-escapes were found on forty-nine per cent of the houses. Many of the escapes were useless because the balconies were used as storage places.

The Enforcement of Prohibition in Iowa is said by the anti-temperance journals to be a failure. A very different report, however, is given by a correspondent of The Christian at Work, who writes from Postville, Iowa. He says: "In every town under ten thousand population the saloons are closed. The brewery in our town has closed up its business entirely. Four saloon-keepers out of five have gone into other business. The fifth one has ostensibly closed. In some of our neighboring towns the change is even more complete. Of course liquor is imported and liquor is sold in these towns, but it is done so cautiously that it is almost impossible to get evidence. Habitual drunkards seldom get a drink, and minors are not let into the secret, and the generous custom of treating is hardly known. A man who employs on his farm continually from twelve to fifteen men, mostly foreigners, tells me he can see a vast difference in his men since we have this law. These same men opposed bitterly its adoption, but now, as they see the benefit of it upon their homes, speak favorably of it. In other counties of the State the law is even more rigorously enforced."

Successive Earthquake Shocks Occurred in Spain nearly every day last week. They caused a large loss of life and heavy damage to property. It is estimated that since Christmas at least two thousand persons have perished through the earthquakes. At Nerja, a town of five thousand people, in the province of Malaga, the earthquake was followed by a hurricane. This finished the destruction of many houses which had already been brought to the brink of ruin by the previous shock. The inhabitants fled in terror from their houses and camped outside the town. At Priego, in the province of Cordova, the shocks came while the theatre was crowded with people. A terrible panic followed. Many persons jumped from the galleries and from the windows upon the crowd below. Two were killed outright, and forty were more or less seriously injured. In Alhama a thousand houses are in ruins. At Granada there were ten shocks in four days. There was a general panic, the people being afraid to remain in their houses,

Ten thousand quitted the city in one day. A correspondent of the New York Herald, who visited Alhambra on January 1st, describes it as presenting an appalling sight. He says: "Half of the town is completely ruined. The churches, the convent, and the Town Hall were thrown to the ground. The inhabitants are huddled together in carts and wagons. Sixty wounded persons are in a temporary ambulance. One hundred and ninety-two corpses have been taken from the ruins, and active efforts are being made to recover the others. The mayor and several wealthy residents are among the victims. The mayor's wife remained buried waist deep in the ruins for eighteen hours. Many persons were rescued alive after being partly buried with fright. Piteous cries were heard in the ruins for twenty-four hours, but it was impossible to render any assistance."

Another Dynamite Outrage was Perpetrated in London on January 2d. The underground railway was the scene of the crime. About half past nine in the evening a train was passing through the tunnel near Gower Street, when there was a terrific explosion. The windows of the train were broken and the lights extinguished. A few passengers were cut by the broken glass, but otherwise no personal injury was inflicted. The shock overthrew several persons walking on the street above. It was with great difficulty that horses on the road were restrained from running away. The ticket collector in the station was thrown from his box and the engineer working the incandescent electric light machinery was thrown from his seat a distance of three or four feet, landing on his face. The lights in other trains in the tunnel were extinguished by the explosion. The passengers were greatly alarmed, and many ladies fainted. The Gower Street platform was literally strewn with forms of persons prostrated by the shock. An examination of the masonry of the tunnel showed that a piece about four feet square and six inches thick had been blown out. The agent used was dynamite or gun-cotton. It is, of course, supposed that the plot was contrived and executed by Irishmen from America. No clue to the perpetrators was discovered.

One Division of the Egyptian Expedition, under General Sir Herbert Stewart, commenced its march across the desert on December 30th on its way to Khartoum. It consists of one thousand one hundred men and one thousand eight hundred camels. Each man carries seven gallons of water and provisions for seven days. There is much anxiety about this small force, which expects to encounter the Mahdi on its way. But for General Wolseley's uniform success in all he has yet undertaken, this plan of the campaign would be condemned. It is considered bold to the verge of recklessness.

Four Large Steamers have been Engaged by the French Government to convey troops to China. They are expected to sail on January 15th, and arrive early in March. It is intended to attack Canton and to occupy Pakoi. The French newspapers indicate that the war is unpopular in France, and that the people are dissatisfied with the government. M. Rochefort, who was the most implacable critic of the Emperor Napoleon III., writes in his journal: "This year has cost us as much money and greater loss of life and more shame than the year of the German war. These twelve months have been traversed by all kinds of plagues, by the cholera, by the Congress of Versailles, by massacres in Tonquin, by defeats in Formosa, and by financial ruin. Never at any time, under any government and in any country, have such masses of crimes, impostures, piracy, and assassinations taken place between January 1st, 1884, and Saint Sylvester's; but no nation, unless on its death-bed, can consent any longer to breathe an air so reeking with putrefaction; and if 1884 ended in mud, there are heavy odds that 1885 will end in blood."

Princess Beatrice, the Youngest Daughter of Queen Victoria, is to be married to Prince Henry of Battenberg, whose brother recently married the niece of the princess. He will consequently become the uncle of his sister-in-law. The proposed marriage is not regarded with favor in England, as the prince is poor and the Parliament will be expected to provide an income for the couple, and they will live in England. The princess is twenty-eight years old, and the prince two years younger.

Mr Gladstone Celebrated his Seventy-fifth birthday on December 29th. He declined a public ovation, and spent the day quietly at home with his family. The newspapers, however, devoted long editorials to congratulations, and a large number of presents were sent to his residence at Hawarden Castle. One report says the Prime Minister received no less than one hundred and fifty telegrams from all points of the compass, from the Cape of Good Hope to the Rocky Mountains. His congratulations came from all conditions of mankind, from the Prince of Wales to the dock laborers at Holyhead. The greater part came from the political clubs and reform organizations of all kinds. A noteworthy exception was that of the Queen, who sent no word. He had his rooms littered with birthday gifts of every description from some two hundred and twenty correspondents, from a pen-wiper to a silver axe. Every country of the world seemed to have chosen a representative article as a tribute to his genius and courage.

The Terrible Fate of a Blaspheming Infidel is described in a brief despatch from Toronto. It states that on December 24th a Frenchman named Paquet, a professed infidel, while denying the doctrine of eternal punishment in a discussion with his fellow-boarders, was stricken with paralysis, the whole of one side, from head to foot, including the tongue, losing vitality. He was taken to the hospital, where he died on December 27th.

Further Trouble in Connection with the Mormons is apprehended in the South. A despatch from Raleigh, N. C., states that three Mormon elders are preaching in Rutherford County, near the South Carolina line. They brought with them twenty-three converts from Rock Hill, South Carolina. They are holding meetings, and are preparing to build a church. Their accessions are mostly from the Baptists, and they have nearly exhausted the membership and congregation of the New Pleasant Baptist Church. There is considerable excitement in the community, and a number of citizens are preparing to prosecute the elders for violation of the Seventh Commandment if they don't leave the county.

An Earthquake Shock was Felt in Frederick, Md., on the night of January 2d. It was also felt in Washington to a slight extent. In Frederick City it was so severe as to break the windows in the houses and public buildings. The residents, recalling the terrible loss of life by the recent earthquakes in Spain, ran around the streets in excitement and terror. The shock was of only half a minute's duration, but during that time the earth rocked perceptibly, and there was a faint rumbling sound. At Frederick Junction, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, the shock was so great that the engineer of one of the trains passing at the time put on the air-brakes and stopped, thinking that an accident had occurred.

Three Answers to Prayer in One Day were received recently by a faithful Christian worker in Brooklyn, who is able to furnish large numbers of such incidents, which have occurred in his own experience. Money was needed to pay the rent of a house occupied by an elderly Christian lady, whose circumstances of late years have been straitened. A boy in need of clothes had appealed to the missionary for help, and money was urgently needed to provide a Christmas dinner for some poor people who seldom enjoy a really good meal. All three matters were carried by the missionary to the Lord. He has for many years so dealt with his difficulties, finding that help always comes. It was not until December 24th, and when every one else who knew of the difficulties had given up hope, that the money was received. In each case the need was supplied, and that without a single application having been made to any human being.

The Cooper Union Meetings now Being Conducted in the Annex Hall at Fourth Avenue and Seventh Street, by Rev. E. W. Oakes, are growing marvelously in interest and spirituality. Mr. Oakes has again proved his wonderful adaptation for work of this character, and God is blessing his efforts in a signal manner. Large meetings are held three times in the week, and on Sunday the building is crowded to overflowing. Lively spirited singing and the heartiness and friendliness of Mr. Oakes' preaching render a visit to the Annex Hall a pleasant and profitable experience.

An Interesting Ancient Document was Discovered in Connecticut recently. It was found by some workmen who were engaged in remodeling an old house between Millville and Plattville. The document is written in a good hand, and has but little appearance of age. It appears to have been intended to serve as a pass or certificate of good character. It is signed by one Major Chris. French, and is dated "Darby, December 29th, 1776." The following is a true copy of the document: "The Bearer hereof Mr. Timothy Cande is a Man of intrinsic Worth as Such I take the Liberty to recommend him to the protection of any of His Majesties Officers into whose Hands he may happen to fall." We may hope that the certificate proved useful, if there arose need for its presentation, especially as, according to the major's avowal, Mr. Timothy Cande was "a man of intrinsic worth." Earnest Christians who are working for the salvation of the most degraded specimens of humanity regard all men as of intrinsic worth, even those who have sunk to the level of beasts. In this they show that they are disciples of Christ, who came to save the lost (Luke 15 : 10).

Why the Stars and Stripes were Hung on a school-room wall was revealed in the course of an examination of the pupils at a certain reception. The examination was conducted by a clergyman, who endeavored to impress the children with the importance of being patriotic citizens when they grew up. "Boys," he said, pointing to the national banner which decorated the wall, "why is that flag hung there?" The reply, which was disconcerting, was given by a lad who had assisted in decorating the school-room. He said, "Please, sir, to hide the dirt." The beauty and moral significance of the decoration, it appeared, had no effect on that boy's mind. He saw in it only a means of hiding dirt. Recent events have tended to give the world the same view of religious profession. Defaulting cashiers and other unfaithful officials have used it so frequently to conceal their moral corruption that unthinking men are apt to forget how often the best things are put to ignoble uses (Matt. 23 : 14).

An Unexpected Meeting in a Police Court occurred in New York last week. An intelligent, refined lady, poorly dressed, entered the court, leading a child about four years of age. She wanted the judge to commit the child to some charitable institution. Her husband had deserted her, and she found it impossible to support herself and the child too. The mother was evidently much distressed at the approaching parting. She took a seat on the benches set aside for the spectators, and had been there only a few minutes when she fainted. The child cried, "Mamma! mamma!" and hugged her mother in a manner that drew sympathy even from the hardened habitués of the court room. The rough court officers handled the poor woman as they would a babe, and in a few minutes restored her to consciousness. She thanked them for their trouble, and said it was only a weak spell. Just as the woman fell in the faint a tall, well-dressed man, with gray hair, entered the court-room. He took no notice of the woman until she spoke, thanking the officers for their kindness, when he looked her straight in the face and said: "That must be my daughter!" The woman looked up. She sprang to her feet and cried, "Father!" The old man clasped her in his arms and took her and her child to his home. She had married in opposition to her father's wishes, and did not think he would receive her in her trouble. The providential meeting proved that she had undergone torture she might have been spared if she had gone to her father earlier. So sinners who repent and go to God for pardon always wish they had not delayed so long (Luke 15 : 20).

A Town is Being Sued for the Loss of a Son in New York State. The plaintiff, whose son was drowned recently in the Hudson River, alleges that the fatality was due to the negligence of the town of Catskill. The boy was walking on the ice, and he went close to the sunken piers of an old bridge which had not been in use for several years. The boy broke through the ice, and getting into the current, he was drowned. The plaintiff claims that the town of Catskill has no right to allow the old bridge foundations to remain in their present position, and that owing to their existence the ice was rendered much thinner in that particular spot than elsewhere. The boy thus broke through and lost his life without any fault on his part. The damages claimed amount to $5000. What the defence of the town authorities will be has not been made known. It will probably be ingenious, and may be successful. So much cannot be said, however, of the answer that will be required from certain officials in the day of final judgment. There are in all our cities treacherous places, where young men are led to eternal death; officials who have the power to close them and do not use it incur a fearful responsibility (11 Sam. 23 : 3).

A Holiday's Fun was Spoiled Last Week in a very happy way. A young man travelled three hundred miles to spend New Year's in New York. He came, as he said, to have "a good time." The very first night he was in the city he wandered into the Annex Hall, where Rev. E. W. Oakes conducts evangelistic meetings while Cooper Union is undergoing repairs. There he was converted, and in giving his testimony, he said: "I am going back home on the first train to-morrow morning. My fun is spoiled, thank God." He is not the first man who was glad to relinquish fun in exchange for enduring happiness (Eccles. 7 : 6).

Eighteen Days in a Snow-Drift had been spent, at the close of last week, by a number of railroad passengers. A despatch to the New York Sun from Portland, Oregon, says: "On December 16th a passenger train left here over the P. & O. road. It has got as far east as Bonnaville, about forty miles. It has been there packed in the snow for eighteen days. Doubts are expressed whether the train will get out from the thirty-foot drifts before spring, for at present there has been no progress made in the work of extricating it. A hundred and fifty men from the Puget Sound division of the Northern Pacific are now at work behind the blockaded train. A hundred of them shovel and operate the machinery and the rest cut wood for the engines and for the open fires that are necessary to protect the men while they work. But the snow-drifts back behind the men, and the work has to be done over again in the most hopeless fashion. Happily, the number of people on the train is not large, only about twenty-five. Food has been regularly and abundantly sent to them. They have also been supplied with fuel cut from the surrounding forests. The blockade is considered unprecedented in the history of American railroading." It would seem as though the men trying to rescue the passengers might themselves need rescue, if there come no change in the weather. Such a hopeless situation is a type of the still more hopeless spiritual condition our race would have been in if God had not rescued it. The strongest men, like the weakest, needed deliverance (Isa. 59 : 16).

A WONDER EXPLAINED BY GREATER WONDERS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Thou dwrest near in the day that I called upon Thee: Thou saidst, Fear not."—LAMENTATIONS 3: 57.

Misapprehensions Corrected—Records of Mercy Should be Made—Jeremiah's Mission and Persecution—The Time when the Lord Draws Near—A Great Wonder—I, an Explanation of it—Men Have Ever Been in God's Thoughts—He Took Their Nature—The Most Cosmopolitan Man—Near to Man in His Life—Nearer in Death—Nearer Still in Heaven—The Mystical Union—II. The Wonder Itself—Not Contrary to Expectation—How God Draws Near—By Support—By Sympathy—By Deliverance.

How different are our experiences from our fears! This man of God had said, "When I cry and shout He shutteth out my prayer." He had said again, "Thou hast covered Thyself with a cloud, that our prayer should not pass through." He had added even to that, "Surely against me is He turned." But now he corrects his misapprehensions. Neither was prayer shut out, nor had God turned against him; for he joyfully confesses, "Thou dwrest near in the day that I called upon Thee: thou saidst, Fear not." As much as to say, "Not only didst Thou hear me, but Thou didst come to me; not only didst Thou hear me speak, but Thou didst speak Thyself, and I heard Thee say, Fear not." Not only wast Thou not turned against me as an enemy, but Thou didst prove Thyself my friend by my loving and tender Comforter.

Brethren, if our experiences have so far exceeded our expectations and belied our doubts, let us take care that we record them. Do not let us suffer our lamentations to be written in a book and our thanksgivings to be spoken to the wind. Write not your complaints in marble and your praises upon the sand. Let the record of mercy received be carefully made, accurately measured, distinctly worded, correctly dated, and so preserved that in years to come you may turn for your encouragement to it. Maybe your children and your children's children may read for their learning, and nothing can be more fitting than that the fathers should thus lay up for their children. Even though that record should contradict yourself and bring the blush of shame to your cheek to think you should have so calumniated your God, yet write it clearly, and let it stand to the Lord's praise and glory, and your own comfort in some future hour of need.

Jeremiah seems to record this fact with a considerable amount of surprise. He marvels that God should have drawn near to him, for his condition was a very pitiful one. He was so low that life seemed ebbing out, and he groaned, "He hath set me in dark places, as they that be dead of old." In my own estimation I give one of the chief places among mortal men to the prophet Jeremiah. He was sent of God to do a most painful duty, which could not bring any honor to him, nor win for him the love of those to whom he ministered. He was sent to prophesy among a wilful and disobedient people, who would reject his admonitions. Like Cassandra, he spake true tidings and sad tidings, but he was not believed. He pleaded with erring Israel—oh, how he pleaded! No prophet is more pathetic than he. I sometimes read the book right through, and it is a good thing to do that with the books of Scripture, so as to get the run of them; and if you will do this with Jeremiah you will be borne away with the torrents of grief which swept over the prophet's soul. He was that Jeremiah. He was as a mountain torrent, familiar at once with great heights and profound abysses, deriving force from his deep descents of woe. When he penned the words of our text his sorrow had come to a climax. They had put him into an underground cistern—I was about to say into a dry well, only it was not dry.

He sank in the mire up to the armpits. Reservoirs which at one season of the year were filled with water were frequently used at other seasons as dungeons, and poor prisoners were let down, far beyond all reach of light or fresh air, into such horrible pits, which were often knee-deep in miry clay.

The prophet's case was deplorable; he was cut off from all sound of human voice, and let him cry as he might there was none to have any pity upon him; he was alone, forgotten, forsaken, refused by the many and abhorred by the few who were in power. Doubtless his spirit sank, and we cannot wonder at it. A strong-minded, passionate patriot, who would have saved his country, saw himself put aside even from the opportunity to rebuke and to exhort; in the crisis of national calamity, when he felt most useful to his people, he was put away. Then it was that to him. When he was most reproached, and most persecuted of men, he had the sweetest sense of the nearness of the Lord whom he served. Beloved, I think we have read enough of the history of God's dealings with His people to understand that this is the way of Him—that if He ever is absent from His people, it is not in their time of direst need; and if ever He does reveal Himself to them as He does not unto the world, it is when they are bereaven of all outward consolation, and for His sake are made to bear tribulation. The tortured martyr, the banished Puritan, the hunted Covenanter, could each say, "Thou dwrest near in the day that I called upon Thee; Thou saidst, Fear not."

Whatever wonder there was in the heart of Jeremiah that God should draw near to him, you and I must have felt even greater wonder whenever God has drawn near to us. We have cried out, like David, "What is man, that Thou art mindful of him? and the son of man that Thou visitest him?" It is to us that the great and glorious and thrice holy God should ever come and reveal Himself in a way of love to us, insignificant, dishonored, guilty sons of men.

I. Let us set forth some sort of an explanation of this wonder. God doth draw near to men. He that filleth all things communes with those who are less than nothing and vanity. The Eternal converses with the creatures of a day. He who is inconceivable in the majesty of His nature nevertheless permits us, who are but dust and ashes, to speak with Him as a man speaketh with his friend. Why is this? I shall not abate the wonder if I somewhat explain it by mentioning other facts equally wonderful—great things, and unsearchable, drawn from the vast depths of the divine working.

The first thought I would suggest to you is, that men have ever been in the thoughts of God. As we are taught by the Word of God, God has always had a very singular regard to man. In the formation of man God widened His communion with His creatures; He began for the first time to hold intercourse with a being who is only in part spiritual, and as to a part of his nature is linked with materialism. God communed with Adam, and thereby placed him in an honor, in which, alas! he continued not. It was a wonderful thing that creation of man—I shall have to tell you a little more about it before I have done—but in the very fact that man was made in so special a manner there was a drawing near of God to man.

But, secondly, remember that God hath drawn nearer to us than we have as yet hinted at, in becoming tenderly

NEAR IN NATURE.

There was a day, in the fulness of time, in the which the Son of God took our nature upon Himself. Marvel of marvels! He that made all things became a babe at Bethlehem, bore all the weakness and infirmity of infancy, passed through all the growth of boyhood, arrived at a toilsome manhood, and then finished His life-course. Jesus did not wear a nature like to ours, but He bore our actual nature—our flesh and blood. Sin is not of the essence of manhood, and Jesus had no sin; but all that is really manhood belongs to the Son of man, who is also "over all, God blessed forever."

If I were in trouble in a foreign land, it would be pleasant to hear the voice of an Englishman; it would be even more encouraging to spy out a neighbor, a fellow-citizen of the same town; but most of all would it be cheering to perceive that a dear friend, a brother, a husband was to the front on our behalf. Such a friend is Jesus to each one of these the Father hath given Him. See, here is your brother, O believer, a brother of such tender sensibilities, and of such quick sympathies, that in every pang that rends the heart He takes His share! Do you wonder, therefore, that when you call upon Him He draws near to you?

Nor is this all. The Lord Jesus was specially near to His people in the days of His life on earth. He was no mere observer of men, passing through our midst, as an English traveller might pass through China or Tartary, seeing everything, but sharing nothing. It is very beautiful to my mind to reflect upon the nearness of Christ as man to men; for there are certain men who by temper, spirit, and behavior are a long way off from the rest of mankind. Look at your princes and your autocrats; they are scarcely to be seen with a telescope; they do not appear to be persons of like feelings with ourselves. Look at your exquisites, your men of pride, your men of pretended culture, who bear their heads above the clouds. But Jesus was the most manlike of all men.

I could propound to you to-day the theory that Jesus was an Englishman, and prove it from many points of His character, if I did not know that He was of the seed of Abraham. Jesus of Nazareth is a Jew, but there is no Jewish peculiarity about Him. He is a man in the broadest, truest sense. It matters not to you or me what nationality He actually came from, for was the Christ of God. I know several excellent men whom I love and revere, but I despair of imitating them; the color of their virtue has a tint in it peculiar to themselves; I am not made of such stuff as would ever work up into their fashion, admirable though it be. But I never thought thus concerning the Lord Jesus; I always feel that by His grace I can become like Him. He is infinitely superior to those admirable friends of whom I have spoken, and yet He is more imitable. The hill is higher, but in His case there are ways and steps which invite; whereas in the other case there are crags which warn us off. I have known good men with whom I shall never be thoroughly at home until we meet in heaven; at least, we shall agree best on earth when they go their way and I go mine. One never feels so with regard to the all-glorious Lord Jesus. There our cry is, "Nearer, my Lord, to Thee, Nearer to Thee." He draws us to Himself, and the nearer we come the more fully we appreciate Him. If Jesus came thus near to men in His life on earth, do you wonder that He draws near to them now?

Carefully notice that this was a nearness to sinful men. For, being here on earth, He did not select for persons of high religious repute, men who practised austerities, or severed themselves from common life. He went down among the fishermen of Galilee, He associated with poor people, uncultured and simple-minded. Ay, He dwelt among the sinful people; "Then drew near unto Him all the publicans and sinners for to hear Him." You and I are sinners too, and our Redeemer's nearness to the sinners of Judea meant nearness to us. Do you think it wonderful that to-day Jesus should draw near unto His own people when they are in their time of sorrow? I do not.

Further, dear friends, Jesus Christ came still nearer to us in His death. How wonderfully near Jesus came to sinful men when He was delivered up to His enemies to suffer death! Just think of it. Would you have supposed that Christ would come so near to us that He would be found in the felon's dock? Yet there He stood. Do you seek Him? Would you speak with Him? Will you go to the palace of the king, asking for Him? If you do, you must enter the judgment-hall, for there He stands bound, accused, and tried. They charge Him with sedition and blasphemy! "He was numbered with the transgressors!" In the end of His life He draws so near us that He dies among the transgressors: "He made His grave with the wicked." When they took down the carcasses of the thieves they removed His body also, and His remains were given up to His friends as the remains of one who had paid the last penalty of the law. This is coming

WONDERFULLY NEAR TO US.

He is now in heaven; turn your thoughts up to Him there. In heaven He is still perpetually near us. Beloved, He has carried our nature into heaven. The body of the Lord Jesus in glory is the same as that which was laid in the tomb. And what is He in heaven? He is there as our Representative. He is member of heaven's high Parliament for the sons of men, and He holds His seat as such. What is He doing in heaven? He is not only representing us, but He is preparing a place for us; making a niche in heaven for you, a place in heaven for me; and all the while He is continually offering intercession for His people. Ever bearing our names upon His breastplate, ever beholding us as graven upon His hands, He is constantly so near to us that He cannot be nearer.

I have thus shown you, I think, why Jesus so readily draws near to us at the voice of our cry; but there is one more matter of which I would speak, and that is so deep and mysterious that I would specially seek the guidance of the Spirit of God before I speak upon it. Far be it from me to set forth mere imaginings. I would only speak as the Scripture warrants me. Jesus may well come near to His people, for there is a mystical union which insures it. A divine doctrine this, of which Paul saith, "This is a great mystery, but I speak concerning Christ and the church," and this in relation to union. There is a union between Christ and His church which can only be shadowed out by the union between a husband and his bride; I scarcely dare speak of it in words, it is so holy and divine. Who shall separate what God hath joined together? Now, do you wonder that Jesus draweth nigh unto His people? I should marvel if He did not; for would any of us wish to be away when our dear spouse is suffering? When her heart is heavy is not ours heavy too? In a true, conjugal love, such as I trust many of you feel, there is a degree not merely of similarity and of communion, but even of identity between the twin that have become one. Now, we that are joined unto the Lord are one spirit, one by eternal union, and He must, therefore, draw near to us in a way of sympathy and fellowship.

If I have tried to set forth this mystery as best I can; now I ask your attention for the few minutes that remain to the wonder itself. What I have said makes it less surprising, and yet fills us with greater surprise. In one respect it makes it not wonderful, but in others it makes it more wonderful than ever, that God Himself in Christ should draw near to us.

In desiring you to notice the wonder itself I would remind you, first, that by no means is this wonder at all contrary to expectation, when expectation is founded upon an enlightened understanding. It is natural, it is necessary, that Christ should come near to a people whom He loves so well. Love is attractive. It may be that absence makes the heart grow fonder, but a fond heart hates absence as it hates the fiend; and so the heart of Christ brooks not the absence of the beloved, and will not have it either; for the blood of Christ gives access to Christ, and the heart of Christ out of which that blood comes is never content until there is constant, intimate, unbroken fellowship between the redeemed and the Redeemer. Do you not hear Him say, "Father, I will that they also, whom Thou hast given me, be with me where I am"? I say it is a great wonder that God should dwell with men; but it is a wonder

NOT CONTRARY TO EXPECTATION.

But, dear friends, if you have ever enjoyed this communion, let me help you to describe it, that you may wonder at it. What is the manner in which God draws near to His people in their time of trouble? At times He draws near to us by a secret strengthening of us to bear up when we are under pressure. We may have no marked joys, nor special transports; but quiet, calm, subdued joy rules the spirit. To my mind, the best of states is the deep calm which comes of the peace of God which passeth all understanding. I care not so much for your brilliant and gaudy-colored joys; your neutral tints of quiet joy suit my soul's eye far better. I will not ask to see the sun above me, but I will be content to feel that "underneath are the everlasting arms."

Do you not remember that when the burden came you feared it, but did not feel it? For the shoulder had grown stronger; when the need came which you dreaded so terribly, it turned out to be no need at all; for He who refused the meal also removed the hunger, He who denied the garment took away the cold. The secret sustenance of the soul by God is very precious. It is not observed of men, but therein the saints are made to magnify their God. That unseen casting on of oil upon the fire, behind the wall, is what we need, and it is a very charming way of the Lord's drawing near to us in the time of trouble.

Furthermore, the good Lord often vouchsafes to His people in their time of great pain and weakness and weariness a doubly vivid sense of His love. It is not merely that they believe in that love as they find it recorded, though that is a very delightful matter; but they feel this love in the delight of it. They know beyond all doubt, and they feel beyond all question—"He loved me, and gave Himself for me." The alabaster box which they were accustomed to hold firmly in the hand of faith is now broken by love, and poured out by enjoyment, so that the smell which was aforesaid latent now perfumes all the soul.

At such times the Lord grants us a sensible assurance of

with us. We feel that every stroke of the rod comes distinctly from a Father's hand, who doth not afflict willingly. We look up into His face, and feel that like as a father pitieth his children so doth He pity us. We enter into the sorrow of our Father's heart while He is causing us grief, with greater grief to Himself. We come to feel what it is to be bound up in the bundle of life with the Lord Himself. Extraordinary expression, is it not? where one said, "The soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life with the Lord thy God." We are joined unto the Lord, and know it by feeling His heart beat with our heart. It is a high degree of grace to be so in sympathy with God in His afflicting us that we would not have Him cease for our crying; let Him continue to do His will even though He cross our wills.

The Lord draws near to His people's souls sometimes by a very speedy and remarkable deliverance out of the trouble under which they groan. He can draw near to you when you are plunged in poverty, and He can suddenly lift you to competence. When everything goes against you He can in a moment raise up a friend; when it appears that no chance nor change can set you free He can Himself be your deliverer. Did He not bring up Joseph out of the prison-house and set him on the throne of Pharaoh? He can do the like with you if He wills, ere your sun has gone down. Nothing is impossible with God. The deliverances which

He has vouchsafed to His people, not only in ancient times, but in modern times, are such as to make us feel we dare not doubt, much less despair. "Trust ye in the Lord forever; for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength."

There seems to me to be

here, a kind of hand in the margin to point out the promptness of God. "Thou dwrest near in the day that I called upon Thee"—the very day he called God came; no sooner the prayer than the answer. Oh, the blessed quickness of God! When David cried to Him he says, "He rode upon a cherub, and did fly, yea, He did fly upon the wings of the wind." No pace is too swift for God to come to the deliverance of His people. He is slow to anger, but He is swift in mercy. Try it, ye downcast, and broken-hearted ones, try it to-day, and then come and tell us if it is not so.

One thing more; observe the extreme tenderness of all this. "Thou dwrest near in the day that I called upon Thee, and saidst, Fear not." You remember that text, "He giveth liberally, and upbraideth not." Here is an illustration of it. Why, I should have thought that when God came near to Jeremiah He would have said to him, "O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" It would have been a very gentle rebuke, but I should have expected as much as that. And if the Lord had come to Jeremiah and said, "You neglected to call upon me, and therefore you fell into this trouble," who would have wondered? But no; the Lord's whole thoughts were about His dear child, and He said nothing to him to wound him, but everything to comfort him. Tenderly he cried,

"FEAR NOT!"

You mothers leave your children for a little to play together when you are at work in the house, and presently you hear a crash and a cry. One of the children has met with a heavy fall. He was climbing where he ought not to have gone and he has had a serious tumble. One child cries, "Mother, Johnny is killed!" Well, you know if you inquired into the matter you would find that Johnny deserved blame; but you do not inquire. You rush to pick him up; you notice that bruise on his forehead; you are fearful for his legs and arms, you are ready to faint as you notice that he is bleeding. Do you scold him? Ah, no; you fall to kissing the poor child; his fault is passed by, you only think of his pain, your only concern is about himself. And so with our gracious God. He comes to His poor, suffering, downcast people, and what He says to them is not—"You should not have done so and so; this is very wrong of you; I must terribly correct you." No; but He says, "Fear not, I have forgiven thee; and I will deliver thee."

Remember the father in the parable when the prodigal came back. Did he lecture him upon his immoralities? Did he say a word about his ingratitude and folly? He did not notice his pimpled face, and point to his blotches as the result of his excess in wine with his riotous companions. He did not point to his rags and tell him that these came of his profligate expenditure. No, he said not a word of upbraiding; but only, "Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; put a ring on his hands, and shoes on his feet." That is just what the Heavenly Father will do and say if we call upon Him; therefore let us call upon Him in truth from this moment, ere we leave the pew, and may the Lord cause us ere long to say, "Thou dwrest near in the day that I called upon Thee, and Thou saidst unto me, Fear not." God bless you, dear friends, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

DR. TALMAGE'S BIRTHDAY.

DR. TALMAGE's fifty-third birthday was celebrated yesterday (January 7th). Among the methods adopted to cheer the eminent pastor of the Tabernacle, was the publication of a special birthday number of the Brooklyn Magazine, containing letters of congratulation from his brethren in the ministry and prominent public men. The following are a few extracts from the letters:

The Hon. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, Secretary of State, writes: "It is with no little pleasure that I join the many friends of the Rev. Dr. Talmage in wishing him, upon the fifty-third anniversary of his birthday, long-continued health and happiness. Dr. Talmage and I were born in the same State and county, and I have known him personally and through his writings for many years. It is an acquaintance from which I have derived much satisfaction, and knowing as I do the great good which he has done and is now doing in the extended field to which his talents have called him, I earnestly hope that his useful life may be spared for many years to come."

General Hancock, the Democratic candidate for the Presidency in 1880, writes: "I feel kindly to Dr. Talmage, whom I personally know, and I beg you will convey to him my warmest congratulations on the occasion of his fifty-third birthday, and my best wishes for a continuance of his health and usefulness."

Senator John Sherman says: "I have been so much engaged with my public duties that I have not before been able to give my attention to the proposed tribute to Dr. Talmage, and to join in congratulating him. He is a man of remarkable powers, and is worthy of any mark of respect that his friends can show him."

General W. T. Sherman sends this characteristically laconic note: "My best compliments to Dr. and Mrs. Talmage, wishing them all honor and happiness in this vale of tears."

Ex-Governor Blackburn, of Kentucky, wrote: "I sympathize most heartily with the friends and admirers of Dr. Talmage, in their desire to make his fifty-third anniversary an occasion for congratulation, and I gladly embrace the opportunity of extending to him my most cordial greeting. . . . I pray that his life may long be spared as an ornament to his profession and a blessing and an honor to his race."

From the Vice-President-elect, the Hon. Thomas A. Hendricks, the following tribute was received: "I am gratified to learn that the admirers of the Rev. Dr. DeWitt Talmage propose to observe the fifty-third anniversary of his birthday by suitable expressions of congratulation and friendship, and I beg to join them in such expressions."

Mr. John B. Gough writes: "With all my heart I send cordial congratulations to Dr. Talmage. I honor him for his long and faithful service for God and humanity; for his bold and fearless advocacy of righteousness; for his hearty co-operation with all moral reforms; for his many years of usefulness as a minister of Christ; not only in his own pulpit, but on all occasions he has borne faithful testimony for the truth. . . . That he may live yet many years to win souls, to lift up the down-trodden, strengthen the weak, encourage the despondent, and fulfil his mission to the end of life, and eternally reap his reward, is my sincere desire."

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher writes: "I congratulate you most heartily on attaining to the ripe age of fifty-three! From the summit of these years nay you, like Moses, look over into fifty more, but, unlike Moses, be spared to go over and possess them. May labor sit light upon you! May your audiences grow larger and your cares grow less, until Heaven calls you home, and there, largest of all, may you find a great multitude whom you have helped on their heavenly way."

Mr. Ira D. Sankey writes: "Learning, as I have, that on the 7th of January you pass the fifty-third mile-stone of your life, allow me to send my sincere congratulations, and to express the hope that you may long be spared to preach the glorious Gospel to tens of thousands in this land, and through the medium of the press to tens of thousands in the lands beyond the sea."

Letters of congratulation, too long for insertion here, were also received from Dr. S. Irenaeus Prime, Dr. Charles H. Hall, Dr. R. S. Storrs, Bishops Fowler and Warren of the M. E. Church, Dr. C. A. Bartol, Dr. S. T. Spear, Dr. W. Ormiston, Mr. E. P. Roe, Mr. Philip Phillips, Mr. John G. Whittier, the Quaker Poet, the Hon. S. S. Cox, M.C., and many others. From across the Atlantic come characteristic letters from Edmund Yates, Esq., the novelist and editor of the London World, and from Martin F. Tupper, author of "Proverbial Philosophy."

HOME MISSION WORK IN THE WEST.

(See Illustration.)

It is gratifying to learn from the annual reports of the American Home Mission Society, recently issued, that the year now closed was the most prosperous as well as the most useful the Society has ever known. It is difficult to realize the hardships which the devoted men and women have to undergo in preaching the gospel and doing pastoral work in the sparsely settled districts, where the means of locomotion are few and the climate is often inclement.

In a recently published book of reminiscences of pastoral work in the north-west, many interesting incidents are related. Among them is one of a meeting interrupted by Indians. The missionary and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Ellburn, were holding a meeting, at which a large number of the inhabitants of the settlement were present. The hymn, "Jesus Christ is passing by," had been sung, the singing being led by one Horace Wilmer, when some seven or eight Indians stalked in. All apprehensions of their hostile intentions were quickly dissipated by the chief walking forward and extending his hand to the missionary.

"Me too Christian," he said, warmly grasping the missionary's hand.

"You are a Christian? I am glad to hear it. What made you a Christian? Did anybody tell you about Jesus?"

"Singing man tell poor Indian," the chief answered, pointing to Horace Wilmer. "Then something say inside of me, 'Indian no steal, no kill, no get drunk; Jesus know. Do well, Jesus love poor Indian.' " Then, looking over his shoulder in the direction of his friends, who had squatted on the floor by the stove, he continued. "Christians too. Singing man say, 'Squaw, love Jesus! Indian, love Jesus!'"

"Our Indian friend speaks truly," said Mr. Ellburn; "consciousness of the love of Jesus produces love to him, and sin then becomes hateful. It is the same with Indians as with white men; thank God. Let us pray now."

A MISSIONARY CAPTURED.

Among those who had rendered good Christian service in that locality was a missionary whose earnest endeavor was to carry the work farther and farther into districts not yet reached. Sometimes he commenced his journeys at night, and would be gone a week.

On one occasion, having gone farther than usual, he was taken captive by one of a disaffected band of Indians, and carried off to their camp. (See Illustration.) His captors, not being actually on the war-path, concluded to let him live; and he, seeing no way to regain his freedom just then, set about learning their language and adapting himself to their ways, for the purpose, if possible, of being useful to them.

About a month after his capture the chief's youngest son, a bright little fellow, became ill. He had been very kind to the missionary, and in his illness he begged that his white friend might be with him. The missionary was glad to attend him, and having some little medical knowledge, he devoted himself to the boy through several days and nights of feverish pain and restlessness. When the boy recovered he spoke to his father about Jesus, the Great Spirit's wonderful Son, whose love for little children the pale-faced prisoner had described when he was well enough to listen. This excited the chief's interest, and he called for the missionary, and listened to the story of salvation that had been wrought for the red man as well as the white by the Great Spirit. The chief's heart was touched, and he ordered the missionary's release, sending him home under the guidance of three of his young braves. These young men returned subsequently to their own people, carrying with them rewards and invitations to others to come to the mission, which were accepted with blessed results.

PRAYER IN A SALOON.

A thrilling episode in the earlier stages of Christian work is depicted in the third illustration. The organization of a temperance society was among the efforts made, and the keeper of the principal tavern in the place was much annoyed at the success which crowned the attempt.

One night, the missionary passing the tavern, saw the place lighted up and full of people; he therefore entered. A few of the men who were congregated, spoke to him respectfully, and made a place for him near the fire.

The missionary was hearty in his response, entering at once into pleasant conversation.

"I heard singing; I am sure some one was singing when I came in," he remarked, after a time.

"Bre'es was singing," was said, with a laugh. "We'll hear you if you'll oblige."

"I will do the best I can," was the reply.

In a voice of great melody and richness, that commanded the attention of the listeners, the missionary commenced:

"One more day's work for Jesus;
One less of life for me!
But heaven is nearer,
And Christ is dearer,
Than yesterday to me;
His love and light
Fill all my soul to-night."

As he rendered verse after verse, there was an unmistakable change in the faces of the men, and their hands lay listless across the knees.

"Let us kneel and ask God to help each one of us to work for Jesus," said Wilmer, in the simplest and most natural way. There was a moment of hesitation, and glances from one to another; but at last every man was on his knees, with his face to the back of his chair. Then some eyes even in that room grew misty, as all listened to the pleading of a man with his Friend and for his friends, for the sake of One who had laid down his life for them all. "I never felt so in all my life," one of the men said, as he described the scene afterward. "It just seemed as if the great God was there, looking into my heart, and seeing everything that I had ever done and said in my whole life."

An Inward Struggle with the Tempter.

A BEREAVED MAN'S STRUGGLE.

(See Illustration.)

How many of the fiercest battles of spiritual warfare have been fought out in utter loneliness! Mazzini said, "When the evil one wanted to tempt Jesus, he led Him out into solitude." So he attacks Christ's followers. Seldom does a crushing calamity fall upon a child of God but Satan is at his side, tempting him to doubt the love of his Father in heaven.

Such a battle was going on one night in a little kitchen in an old-fashioned house, where a middle-aged man sat solitary. Sam Evans, a sturdy carpenter, was the hero of that fight. He wore his apron, and was in his shirt-sleeves, just as he quitted work for the day. It was not his usual habit so to sit down for the evening. But to-night he has no heart to "clean himself." His thoughts are away in the cemetery on the hill, where two days ago he laid the remains of his wife to await the resurrection morn. To-morrow he is to go to the next city to follow his only daughter, a dearly loved girl only eighteen years old, to her grave. In one week he was bereft of the two beings who were dearest to him on earth. His face swollen with weeping, he flings himself down on his chair, and wonders why such a cup has to be drained.

The problem with which Job wrestled centuries ago presented itself to him for solution. No one was there to offer him, as Job's friends did, the cold consolations of orthodox belief, or to point the lessons which it was his duty to learn from his trouble; but his own quivering heart, bleeding from the wounds he had suffered, did the work for him. Was God the good, kind, loving Father he had thought Him? That was the question which troubled poor Evans as he sat by his solitary fireside.

Instinctively he had reached down his old Bible, intending to seek consolation there; but it had not been opened. Many a time, in sorrow and bereavement, the old Book had given relief; but then his pious wife was at his side to weep with him and encourage his faith. Now it was so utterly different.

How long he sat there, thinking his sad thoughts, doubting, questioning, he never knew. Struggle as he would, he could not say, "Thy will be done." Why had this double affliction fallen upon him? That was the question with which his untutored mind was exercised. And he gave it up. He did not know. Was it all true, that which he had heard and believed, that God really loved him and all men? That was the devil, suggesting the doubt. Evans was not conscious of the fact, but he took the very best means to conquer which he could have taken had he recognized his assailant. There is no weapon like the sword of the Spirit.

With a deep-drawn sigh he opened his Bible, and without looking for any particular passage, he read just where the leaves fell apart. It was the story of the Crucifixion, as related by the Evangelist Mark, that he read. He read on until he came to the most piteous cry that has ever risen to the ears of God, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" Evans closed the book, and leaning his head on his arms resting on the table, he cried, "God forgive me for doubting. And that suffering was for me and men like me. God have compassion on my hard heart." As he told the story afterward, his doubts fled like startled birds, and he saw them no more. He went about his daily occupations after that night a chastened, but never more a doubting, man.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

Too Late.

DURING the three past days Hester and her father had had many confidential conversations. The mystery of the attack made upon Robert, and the similar one by which Rose had well-nigh perished, had been fully discussed between them. It had not been any mystery to Hester until now. She had been as fully convinced as Grant and Robert that her father had been the stealthy assailant in the first instance; and there had been scarcely a doubt upon her mind that he had also attacked Rose in a paroxysm of madness and despair which had made him unconscious of his own deed. But now that he emphatically maintained his innocence, and narrated circumstantially the details of his finding of Rose already dead, as he supposed, she could not withhold her credence.

By repeated and strenuous efforts of his memory, the recollection came back to him of having heard Lawson closing the door, and this he told to Hester. He had not been alone in the house, then. Lawson had been there; and it must have been he who had been the secret and vindictive foe. No one knew as she did the profound hatred Rose had aroused in him, even before her marriage with his master.

To no one else had he displayed it. There came back to her mind his wild, half-crazy denunciations of her; his superstitious visions of her own mother's presence, which had ceased when Rose usurped her place in the household. The criminal could be no other than Lawson.

But Robert, on his part, was speeding away for England, with his conviction in no way shaken that it was John Morley's hand which had been lifted up against himself and Rose. His denial of the crime seemed perfectly natural, and almost justifiable, to him; it had been quiet and brief, a mere parenthesis in a conversation. Besides, he was convinced he had no other enemy, not merely in Little Aston, but in all England itself. He still considered himself as having been placed more on a level with John Morley by this double attempt at revenge.

He did not see any reason why, there was so much mutually to forgive, John Morley could not be fully reconciled to his penitent wife. They must leave Little Aston, of course; but London would afford them a residence, where their former life would be altogether unknown. It was in his father's power to procure a post as secretary or librarian for John Morley; and they could live somewhere near Carl and Hester, and be very happy after all. It seemed as if he were doomed to pay the heaviest penalty himself.

That seemed hard to him. But had he reflected, as he would have done had his repentance been the work of the Holy Spirit instead of merely the outburst of vexation and self-reproach that he should have done "a stupid thing," he would have seen the justice of the heaviest penalty being required of him. He had been the one to tempt Rose Morley astray. He had taken her away, heedless of her ruin, careless of the shame and sorrow that she must bear to the end of her days, and thinking nothing of the curse upon her soul. Little recked he of the sorrow of her husband or of little Hester's years of misery. Now he realized something of all this, but not sufficient to admit that he was righteously punished.

He reached Little Aston toward the close of the second day, having stopped nowhere on his journey. Grant's house was on his way to Aston Court, and he turned in to see his little Hester for a minute. It was a week since he had left her, and consumption takes rapid strides sometimes. He was afraid to inquire from the servant how the child was, but passed on quickly to the room where he had seen her last. It was empty. Even the cushions and pillows, which had been piled upon the sofa to make it solter for her feeble little frame, had been removed, as if she no longer occupied this place. His heart contracted with a terrible dread. The fatherly instinct, so strong in Mr. Waldron, had been quickly and strongly developed in himself. How dear the child had been to him, how firm and close a hold she had laid upon his affection, he had scarcely known till this moment. He turned sharply round and demanded where Mrs. Grant was. She was upstairs in the room which had formerly been Carl's study. Robert hastened there, and entered it abruptly.

Annie was not in the room, but Carl was there, looking pale and suffering, his eyes wearing an expression of a continual anxiety. He was standing at the window, which faced westward, watching the sun set, but not really seeing it; for his troubled thoughts were far away from any object his gaze rested upon. He turned as Robert entered, and came forward to greet him.

"Where is Hester?" asked Robert, in a broken voice.

"Hester!" cried Carl. "How can I tell? Would to God I knew."

"But my little Hetty," said Robert; "you know where she is, Carl. She is not dead!"

"No," answered Carl, with a look of profound sympathy; "your little girl is not dead. She is living still; but we have taken her to her mother. She pined to go to her, as soon as she knew she was in this neighborhood; and Rose entreated to have her. She is gone to die in John Morley's house."

"Alas!" exclaimed Robert; "then I cannot see her, I cannot nurse her again."

He felt that it would be utterly impossible for him to visit John Morley's house with Rose in it; to watch with her the child's coming death. How could he bear to face Rose in the presence of their dying child? No; he had lost the little creature, so lately found, whose life had been cold and desolate through his sin. He felt a momentary anger that they should have stolen her away from him, during his absence; but it died away as Carl spoke again.

"I thought of that," he said; "but what else could we do? The mother's claim is the strongest. She has been a living child for Rose these many years; you have known her only a few months. Besides, Hetty pined and grieved about it. She would not have been living now if we had not yielded. You were gone, and we did not know when you might return."

It was done, and could not be undone, even if he had wished it. She was as surely separated from him, for the short period that still remained of her life, as if the grave had closed over her. Yet Carl had acted well; had done precisely what a true and tender nature dictated. He could not blame him. No reproval could fall upon any one except himself.

"Carl," he said, after a long silence, "I have found Hester."

"Hester?" he cried again, starting violently, and grasping Robert's arm. "What did you say? You have found Hester?"

"Yes, Hester and John Morley," he answered, almost reluctantly.

Carl could not articulate a syllable, but gazed with mingled incredulity and beseeching into Robert's face. He could not believe his own ears; yet there came a chilly recollection across him of Lawson's words, "I have a notion that Robert Waldron knows where she is." Now he said that he had found them! He had been absent for a week, and had seen Hester!

Carl scarcely knew whether to seize him by the throat, or cast himself upon his knees before him, to extort this precious knowledge from him. He knew where Hester was; she who as truly belonged to him as if he had secured her troth. For did she not belong to him? What right had this rich, prosperous man, the favorite of the world and of fortune, to come between him and her? Was not every principle of justice and fitness opposed to the possibility of his possessing Hester? Hardly a moment had passed since Robert had uttered his reluctant tidings, and these thoughts had only flashed through Carl's brain, when he spoke again.

"I discovered where they were from a hint dropped by Lawson's mother, who knew nothing herself of their place of concealment. They fled to her native place, a little town in Burgundy. I went there to make sure that my guess was correct, and found myself right. Of course they had never heard any news from England, and heaven knows how long they might have hidden there, for John Morley had no idea but that Rose was dead. He denies the crime, and he denies ever striking me; but then why did he flee? He is not quite sane yet. He is unwilling to return to England, though Hester suffers from her long trouble. She is homesick; you can see it plainly, and she is longing to come back."

"I must go to them," interrupted Carl, taking a stride toward the door, as if he would set off the same instant.

"I knew you would," said Robert, in an accent of relief and regret. "Yes; go. You will prevail with him, and take care of her. But stay; I must give you fuller directions as to how you are to find them; and you cannot leave here before the first train in the morning. What a happy fellow you are!"

He uttered the last words with a smile, sadder than many tears are. Carl was arrested and quitted by it. He descended from the height of his own unexpected joy to enter into the desolation and loneliness of Robert Waldron. They talked together until long after the sun had gone down; and then parted with a friendship between them which would last their lifetime.

None could feel more deeply than Carl how heinous was the sin Robert Waldron had committed. His nature was singularly delicate, and it shrank in unmitigated disgust from vice. But the very studies of Christ's life and teaching which had led him to higher and still higher attainments in spiritual life, filled his heart with loving pity for the sinner. He saw more truly than Robert did how vile was the sin which had brought misery both on the guilty and the innocent. But Robert regarded it as folly, as a despicable blunder, a thing that had turned out ill, which had cost him more than it had ever given him. Misery had resulted from it to himself and others, and how poor was all the pleasure it had given him throughout! But Carl, while seeing all that, saw too, a more serious aspect of it. It was in his eyes a sin against God. Even if it had brought no evil in its train, it would still have been a hateful, a wicked thing, to be mourned over and humbly repented. Therefore, while Robert wept as a child weeps whose fault is being punished, Carl hoped yet to lead him to a better sorrow, which would issue in hope of pardon. This had formed the burden of his talk on the night before his departure, and the next morning, as he set out to bring Hester back, he prayed earnestly that the stricken sinner might be led of the Holy Spirit into the light.

With Robert's very minute directions, and with the certainty of finding Hester at the end of his journey, Carl felt no sort of hesitation or embarrassment at the idea of passing through a country, the language of which was altogether unfamiliar to him. He knew two or three dead languages, but he had no practical knowledge of French, and could not comprehend a word addressed to him by any of his fellow-passengers, or the railway officials; but as far as Paris his ignorance did not prove inconvenient. He crossed the Channel and sped up to Paris as swiftly as steamers and railways could take him; but it appeared the slowest mode of transit it had ever been his lot to experience.

An interpreter accompanied the train and expedited his passage through Paris to the Lyons Railway Station, from which was the line running through Burgundy. He knew how long it would be before he could reach the small station, which Robert had described to him, and where he would find a diligence plainly inscribed with the word "Ecqueville." He would have nothing to do but seat himself in it, put six francs into the hand of the driver; and there would be no longer any difficulty to surmount in fulfilling his mission. After that Hester would be his interpreter. But if there had been a thousand difficulties, multiplied by a thousand dangers, he was ready to confront them all to find her at the end of them.

The country through which he was passing received but small attention from him; though now and then he started, as if aroused from a slight slumber, to give a brief glance at the long valleys, and broad table-lands he was traversing. He promised himself to survey them more carefully on his return, when Hester and her father were with him. One question agitated him very greatly. Was it true that John Morley was innocent of any attempt to avenge himself either upon Rose or Robert Waldron? So far as his liability to earthly judgment and punishment was concerned, he ran no risk of being called upon to expiate his crime. Circumstances had singularly favored the criminal. But Carl longed to believe that the hand of Hester's father was free from every stain. His mind was tossed from one thought to another in a tumult of hope and apprehension, until he found that the train began to slacken speed at the time when they should be approaching the station where he was to alight.

The train had been shunted into a siding to wait until another, bound for Paris, had started from the little station. It was passing them slowly, and his glance, now on the alert, fell upon the last compartment of a second-class carriage, as it glided by. There sat—he could not by any chance be mistaken—John Morley, but erect, vigorous, and sunburnt, with an unwonted energy in his face, and beside him was Hester, whose full face he could not see, as it was turned toward her father, but whose delicate profile was too familiar to him ever to be forgotten. An instant only did this vision of her last, for the train was getting up its speed, and almost as he saw her she was lost to his sight again.

Carl's first impulse was to thrust himself half out of the window, and to shout after the receding train; but he restrained himself, and waited until his carriage-door was unlocked. Without doubt this was the station he had booked for; the ticket was taken from him, and he alighted mechanically. He stood motionless, gazing down the long straight line of railway, narrowing to a vanishing point at a great distance off, along which he could yet see the film of smoke fading away into the blue air. A few other travellers had descended from the train, but they did not disperse hastily as in England. They lingered instead, staring hard at this handsome young foreigner, who stood immovable in an attitude of dismay. When Carl awoke to his ludicrous position, he found himself surrounded by a group of country-people, whose eyes and mouths were wide open, and seemed little likely to close again.

He lifted his hat from his beating temples, to let the cool air play about them; and the Frenchmen, not to be outdone in politeness, removed theirs, standing round him bareheaded in the glowing sunshine. Carl was half beside himself with disappointment and embarrassment.

PAUL'S FAREWELL.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 18, Acts 20 : 28-38. Golden Text, ver. 31. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Paul's Recognition of the Spirit's Power—The Ordaining Power—Ordination Following Usefulness—How to Feed a Church—Pastors who Impress Themselves on the People—Wolves Predicted—Warning Enjoined—Commended to God—Paul's Waived Rights—No Trace of Mercenary Motives—Contrast with Heathen Priests—Friends Given up.

PAUL'S farewell charge to the elders of the Ephesian church gathered at Miletus was truly in the power of the Holy Ghost. Paul understood the Holy Ghost, knew the language of the Spirit, was "led by the Spirit" (Rom. 8 : 14), lived in the Spirit, walked in the Spirit (Gal. 5 : 25), and prayed in the Holy Ghost (Jude 20). Consequently, we see him recognizing the Spirit in his own call to missionary life (Acts 13 : 2), in the way of guidance for his work (Acts 16 : 6, 7; 19 : 21), and as the power for preaching (Acts 19 : 6). Now, we see he recognizes the Holy Ghost as He who has the power to ordain ministers in the church. "Take heed, therefore, to yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which

THE HOLY GHOST HATH MADE you overseers." Oh, that this were recognized by the Church of God, that neither man nor church, neither learning nor university degree can make a man an overseer of the church of God! it takes the Holy Ghost to do it. God's eldership is in the Holy Ghost, whether that of apostles, prophets, teachers (1 Cor. 12 : 28), evangelists, pastors (Eph. 4 : 11), or simple elders, men (1 Tim. 5 : 1) or women (1 Tim. 5 : 2, see Gr.). In the early church a man did not choose the ministers as his profession, he was chosen of the Holy Ghost, and only ordained by man after being manifestly used by the Spirit. In those days a man proved himself the minister of God "in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distress, in stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults, in labors, in watchings, in fastings; by pureness, by knowledge, by long-suffering, by kindness, by the Holy Ghost, by love unfeigned, by the word of truth, by the power of God, by the armor of righteousness on the right hand and on the left, by honor and dishonor, by evil report and good report; as deceivers, and yet true; as unknown, and yet well known; as dying, and behold we live; as having nothing, and yet possessing all things." In all this we see that the life even more than the knowledge is the proof of a faithful minister—a life which is divine, under all circumstances. Such a life is a Christ life, lived by the Holy Ghost in us.

"Take heed, therefore, unto YOURSELVES."

If the life of a pastor is not deepening in God, his flock will fare badly. He may give eloquent, fervent discourses, the result of much talent, research, and learning. But while the minds of his hearers are interested, informed, and delighted their souls will not be brought into the presence of God; the preacher will have impressed himself, and not his God, upon his people. This is not to feed the flock of God. The less a teacher is perceptible the better. When God's people have really been fed, they do not come away from the service or meeting talking about the preacher, but about the Lord. His remarks are forgotten, it is the Word itself which stands out in new light and power; Jesus seems more present, more real to them. Paul says, "Feed the church of God, which He hath purchased with His own blood;" God's property is to be tended for God.

The old apostle spoke prophetically, "For I know this, that after my departing shall GRIEVOUS WOLVES enter in among you, not sparing the flock. Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them." How could God permit such things to come upon a church for which Paul prayed so wonderfully (Eph. 3 : 14-19)? God showed him "There must also be heresies (schisms or factions) among you, that they which are approved may be made manifest among you." (1 Cor. 11 : 19). And even these were among the things that Paul could glory in, that the power of Christ might rest upon him. These were among the "all things [that] work together for good to them that love God." Paul saw above and beyond all the malice of Satan, all the perversity of man—an overruling Hand, bringing good out of evil. He then gives them one counsel: "Therefore WATCH."

It was but a repetition of the Master's own. Paul did not mean to encourage suspiciousness. True watchfulness does not consist in suspecting persons or in forestalling unpropitious circumstances, but in having the eye open to see God in all things, watching Him. "And remember," continues Paul, "that by the space of three years I ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears." Paul had no tears to shed over his own trials; he could rejoice in the prison at Philippi, and sing praises to God; he could rejoice in the prison in Rome and cheer on his disciples (Phil. 1 : 4, 18; 2 : 2, 17, 18; 3 : 1; 4 : 4). But it went to his heart to think of what his spiritual children must suffer; he had tears to weep for them.

But his was no morbid, sentimental grief. He knew what to do with his own troubles, and what to do with theirs. "And now, brethren, I commend you to God, and to the Word of His grace, which is able to build you up, and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified." "I commend you to God," was really the same as though he had said, "I put you into the hands of God." Paul expected nothing from their faithfulness; in leaving them, all his expectation was from God's faithfulness in keeping them. "I commend you to God, and to the Word of His grace." How many copies of the Scriptures he left among them we know not. Certainly, only a part of those we now have; and if there were five copies in Ephesus of the then known Scriptures, it would be much. Some may have made copies for themselves of some portions. But Paul counted these fragmentary Scriptures, dwelling in them richly in all wisdom (Col. 3 : 16), enough to build them up, and to give them an inheritance among all them which are sanctified. The Word of God, received and appropriated, increases the life of God within us. It is not enough to get an idea into our heads from the Word of God, our hearts must rest upon it, so that we have no hesitation to put it to the proof, leaving all the consequences with God.

Paul thought it necessary to remind the Ephesian elders that had influenced him in his labors among them. "I have coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel. Yea, ye yourselves know that these hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me." No doubt in those days, as in these, there were many ready to say to those who preached the Gospel, "You make a good thing of it," "You find it pays well," "You get an easy time of it." All of which sneers were silenced by the fact that Paul never asked money for his own need or his own work, and never had a collection, except for the poor saints at Jerusalem. Although he taught most strongly the duty of the church to support those who labored in the Gospel, he says, "But I have used none of these things."

What is my reward, then? Verily that, when I preach the Gospel, I may make the Gospel of Christ without charge, that I abuse not my power in the Gospel." (1 Cor. 9 : 14-18). Who could accuse such a man of mercenary motives? When once a man of God takes his position as a loved child of God, and learns to know the Holy Spirit's guidance, the cares of this world—how to make both ends meet—naturally fall off. With a will renounced, he is ready to take a higher or a lower place as God shall provide, to do work or not, as God shall order. Like Paul, he knows how to "be full and to be hungry, how to abound and to suffer need."

Much of the care and suffering which comes on many of the Lord's children is from having false ideas of what is due to their position, and that which is expected of them. God allows them to be pressed by poverty until these ideas are broken up, and they have given up position, reputation, and all else to Him. The apostle brought this forward, not only as an unanswerable proof of his own disinterestedness, but as an example to his converts. The heathen priests made money out of the superstitions of the people. Paul supported himself, his disciples, and also the poor. "I have showed you all things, how that so laboring ye ought to support the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how He said, It is

than to receive." Paul was not quoting here from any recorded words of Jesus, but it was the burden of our Lord's life as well as of His teaching. To God Himself it is a joy to give, and He is in a sense kept in giving. Truly of all which we give to God we must say with David, "Of Thine own have we given Thee" (1 Chron. 29 : 14), even when it is ourselves we give. We must first receive of God in order to give, and then we may know the precious truth practically, that it is more blessed to give than to receive.

When Paul had thus spoken, "he kneeled down, and prayed with them all. And they all wept sore, and fell on Paul's neck, and kissed him, sorrowing most of all for the words which he spake, that they should see his face no more. And they accompanied him unto the ship." God does not call us to be stones, but it is our privilege, as no doubt Paul felt it to be his at this time, to see God's hand in all things, and even in the matter of a farewell to prove how much more blessed it is to give up our own will than to receive and retain our dearest earthly friends at the expense of the will of God.

EXPOSITION BUILDING—The World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition at New Orleans.

THE NEW ORLEANS EXPOSITION.

The Three Leaders—The Origin of the Project—Its Development—Prompt Responses—The Largest Building Ever Erected—The Opening Ceremonies—Arrangement of Exhibits.

ON the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week is a picture of the main building of the Great Exposition at New Orleans. With it are portraits of the three men to whom, with their colleagues on the executive committee, is due in no small degree the triumphant success of this vast enterprise. To Mr. Edmund Richardson, the wealthy cotton planter, who is President of the Exposition; to Mr. Albert Baldwin, First Vice-President, and to Major E. A. Burke, the accomplished editor of the Times-Democrat, who is Director-General, this Exposition has been the chief business of many months. They have had the active and efficient co-operation of a band of able men whose enthusiasm was equal to their own, and the results of their arduous labors are now before the world, astonishing all beholders by their gigantic extent, and by the proof they furnish of unsurpassed administrative ability and forethought.

THE PROJECT

took rise in a desire to celebrate the centennial anniversary of the exportation of the first bale of cotton to England. On the appointment of Major Burke to the Director-Generalship, the first idea developed into colossal proportions. It was determined to make it an international exposition. The general government appropriated $1,300,000; the city of New Orleans and the State of Louisiana, each $1,000,000; the citizens of New Orleans contributed $500,000; Mexico appropriated $200,000, and various foreign countries and many States, counties, parishes, cities, towns, corporations, and individuals appropriated and contributed amounts aggregating hundreds of thousands of dollars. It was evident to all that if the Exposition could really be made worthy of our national character an immense impetus might be given to our trade with Mexico and the Spanish and Portuguese nationalities of Central and South America. American ministers and consuls abroad officially invited foreign governments to participate in the grand international display, while the managers of the exposition advertised the project as no other undertaking had ever been advertised in the same space of time. In many instances advertising business was transacted by telegraph, and almost every foreign journal in the world shared in the work of notification. Oriental governments, such as Persia, Siam, Japan, and China, soon manifested their interest in the enterprise, Europe promised even more than had been expected, and some twenty-four thousand applications for space were made.

It was resolved to construct

THE LARGEST BUILDING IN THE WORLD.

A most graphic letter by Lafcadio Hearn, published in Harper's Weekly, gives a bird's-eye view of the progress of the enterprise. He says that a remarkable Swedish architect named Torgerson undertook to construct the largest exposition building that had ever been built. Under the efforts of three thousand laborers the prodigious skeleton of the edifice rose into shape and day by day the fabric grew into solid beauty, like a creation of magic. Skeptics vowed that no human architect could complete it with the materials at hand, and it was triumphantly finished before their eyes, the largest single building constructed in modern times. Fancy thirty-three acres under one roof—a million six hundred and fifty-six thousand and thirty square feet under ceiling—without partitions! The Music Hall alone can seat eleven thousand people, yet the visitor who enters the gates has to ask his way thither.

THE SECTIONS.

But the Main Building is only one of many extraordinary edifices devoted to the international exhibit. That erected by the United States Government is also of uncommon magnitude (eight hundred and eighty-five feet long by five hundred and sixty-five feet wide). The architect was the same wonderful Swede, and the style is similar to that of the Main Building, but more harmonious in its proportions. A structure intended to endure, and yielding to none in beauty, is Horticultural Hall, a vast conservatory devoted especially to the display of tropical flora, and destined, it is hoped, to form the nucleus of a New Orleans Jardin des Plantes. It has a length of six hundred feet, a width of one hundred and ninety-four, and its central part is lofty enough to shelter the tallest tropical palms. The buildings erected by the Mexican Government, under the supervision of Señor De Ybarrola, also deserve special mention in this necessarily general review. One is a Moresque octagonal building of light and fantastic style, decorated with much elegant tracery, and with strong, bright coloring in the Arabesque manner. This will be devoted to mineralogy. The other is constructed on the plan of an elegant hacienda, with a broad court beautified with Mexican flora and with fountains.

The vast space thus placed at the world's disposal seemed to many critics far too large. It was predicted that it would never be filled. Instead of that it proved inadequate. Even now, with seven large buildings and several smaller ones, covering in the aggregate more than the management has been compelled to restrict many of the States as to space. So popular has it become that Director-General Burke informed the Board of Management that if time and means were available to erect buildings sufficiently large to cover the entire Exposition Park of two hundred and thirty-seven acres, exhibits enough would be offered to fill them. He was compelled to reject hundreds of applications every day because there was absolutely no place for the exhibits offered.

THE OPENING CEREMONIES

took place on December 16th. It was a day never to be forgotten in New Orleans. Fully twenty thousand persons were present when the official procession reached the building. At one o'clock precisely Major-General Behan introduced Dr. Talmage, who had travelled to New Orleans expressly to offer the dedicatory prayer.

This was

DR. TALMAGE'S PRAYER:

"Lord God of Nations, hear our opening prayer. Gathered from all parts of this land, and from both sides of the sea, and from under all skies, we ask for thy blessing. Let it come upon the officers, and the directors, and the managers of this World's Exposition. May this day be the beginning of a new dispensation of national prosperity and brotherhood. May a potent influence go forth from these palaces of industry which shall result in the world's having more complete apparel, and better food, more comfortable shelter, and more thorough education. We pray Thee that this Exposition may result in spreading out the folded sails of our paralyzed shipping, in putting bands on all the silent factory wheels, and in starting the plough in longer and deeper and richer furrow; in opening the door to all the hidden treasures of coal and iron and precious metal, and in making more demand for printer's type, and painter's pencil, and sculptor's chisel, and carpenter's rule, and mason's trowel, and author's pen, and in commencing for all the land a process of Edenization. By this great gathering, day after day, and month after month, may the last feeling of sectional discord be gone, and North and South, East and West, carry the four parts of one great national harmony. May it be the unification of North and South America!"

"Gracious God! we pray Thee, by means of this Exposition, solve for us the agonizing question of supply and demand. Alas! that there should be so many hungry in a land of so much wheat, so many cold in a land of so much cotton, wool, and flax. We ask of Thee, O God, to come to the rescue of this nation. Rouse and accelerate all our financial, commercial, political, and educational interests, and as Thou hast made of one blood all the nations of the earth, we pray that this gathering of all nationalities may impress upon us a true sense of our consanguinity. 'Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace and good will toward men.' May the clock strike 'one' upon a new day of prosperity and righteousness and plenty. Quicken all our slumbering industries, and let the hammers sound 'the anvil chorus' from sea to sea. Under thy guidance may capital and labor be crowned side by side under these arches. Give one clear command from the heavens to this nation, and say unto the agricultural and manufacturing, educational and religious interests of this country, 'Go forward!'

"Lord God of Joshua! we do not ask that the sun may stand still for a few hours in order to give our best interests an opportunity of winning the day; but we do ask that the sun may never go down on the prosperity of this people. God be merciful unto us, and bless us, and make thy face to shine upon us, so that thy name may be known upon earth and thy saving help among all nations, and as we have heard that the wealth and prosperity of nations have sometimes hastened their overthrow, and as we know that while the banqueting went on the finger of doom came out of the black sleeve of the darkness and wrote upon the wall, 'Weighed in the balance and found wanting,' we pray Thee that as our prosperity goes onward, our schools and our colleges, and our churches, and our reformatory organizations may prosper and triumph. And may our institutions thus perfected and exalted remain unmolested from internal strife and from foreign attack until that day when the angel, with one foot on the land, and the other on the sea, shall swear by Him that liveth forever and ever that time shall be no longer. And so may the world's doom and the nation's overthrow be simultaneous, and to God the only wise, the only good, the only great, be glory now and forever. Amen."

the Director General, whose exertions to bring the enterprise to a successful issue had been extended over many months, and had left traces on his vigorous frame, which excited the deepest sympathy. He seemed to be worn out by his protracted labors, and to be on the verge of physical prostration. The joy of the triumph achieved, however, sustained him, and his words lacked none of the enthusiasm which has animated him throughout his arduous labors, though only those near him could hear the words his enfeebled voice pronounced. This is what he said, when the protracted cheers, renewed again and again, subsided, and the handkerchiefs the ladies were waving were returned to their places: "Mr. President. Standing, as I do, under the flags of all nations, looking into the faces of the people of every clime, surrounded by the evidences of industry, gathered from every quarter of the earth, within sight of this magnificent gathering of the resources of my own country, with the duty devolving upon me of surrendering into the hands of the management an account of the stewardship of those in whom the trust has been reposed of preparing for this great national and international Exhibition, I have no word of apology or regret to express. I have only profound gratification, profound satisfaction that the people representing the industries of the world—those representing the government of my own country, and those representing the States and Territories of the Union—have held up my hands and have held up the hands of the workers in this cause with such unanimity and spontaneity as the world has never seen before."

An address, from which the following is an extract, was then read by the chief of the exposition committee,

PRESIDENT EDMUND RICHARDSON,

"In this building to-day are the representatives of all the world, side by side with the representatives of our national government and of Territory of the Union. All have contributed examples of their resources and of their progress in this wonderful collection of industrial, commercial, educational, and artistic objects now open to the inspection of the world.

"How much of good shall result from the means of instruction here furnished is beyond mortal power to measure. But certainly not the least benefit to be derived from the Exposition will be the closer and more friendly intercourse of our own people with those of other countries, the development of common interests, and the firmer establishment of peace. In our own country it will be a monument of the era of unity of interests, of harmony and good feeling, destined, it is believed, to endure as long as the continent itself shall exist on which these now perfectly united States are established.

"I now present to you this Exposition—ready as our best efforts with the brief period of time at our command have been able to make; and for the degree of success attained we appeal to a generous judgment."

At the conclusion of Mr. Richardson's speech there was a slight delay, during which the band rendered some excellent music. In the interval Mr. Richardson's words were telegraphed to President Arthur, who was sitting in the Executive Mansion at Washington with his Cabinet, the members of the Supreme Court of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and a committee of each House of Congress. President Arthur telegraphed a graceful address of congratulation, which was read to the vast assemblage in the exposition. As the last words were uttered, the powerful Corliss engine, which operates all the machinery in the building, was seen slowly moving, in obedience to the electric current which President Arthur sent over the fifteen hundred miles of intervening space by simply pressing a button on the table before him. The cannon boomed around the building, and the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition was inaugurated.

On December 30th a special commissioner from the New York Times visited the Exposition and wrote a long and exhaustive description, to which we are indebted for the following summary of the exhibits:

is near the centre of the ground, facing to the eastward, and about it are grouped the other structures. It is the largest, but by no means the most costly, building ever constructed for such a purpose. The main entrance is in the middle of the eastern front, surmounted by a bell tower containing a set of chimes. The top of the tower may be reached by an elevator, and affords a fine view of the city, the river, and the surrounding country. Over the entrance on the outside is an allegorical group in bronze in which the American bison is the most conspicuous figure. On either side in a lofty niche is a bronze statue—one of Columbus and one of Washington. Directly opposite the door as one enters, and in the very centre of the building, is the Music Hall, with a stage for six hundred musicians, backed by a large organ. The entire rear of the building back of the Music Hall and three hundred feet wide is devoted to the Machinery Department, and at the southern end of this is an extension one hundred and twenty feet wide and five hundred and seventy feet long for the mills and factories, with a long L to be devoted to saw-mills.

All the long front of the Main Building and the ends to the machinery section, a space three hundred feet or so in width, is given up to

GENERAL EXHIBITS.

These are the displays of the works of skill and industrial art and of the materials used in them which are contributed by individual exhibitors, firms, and corporations. There is the usual display of stoves and hardware, carpets and fabrics of all kinds, silks and laces, watches and jewelry, guns and pistols, marbles, porcelain and glass, organs, musical instruments, drugs and chemicals, soaps, oils, and artists' materials, and the vast variety of articles useful and ornamental which skill and industry produce. By far the largest proportion of these are from the North, and such well-known concerns are conspicuously represented as the Pacific Mills, the Waltham Watch Company, the Remington Firearms Company, the Seth Thomas Clock Company, and so on. Many of these exhibits are tastefully and even artistically arranged.

The entire Northern cross section is occupied by multifarious appliances of machinery and implements for farming. Everything used in cultivating the soil and harvesting the crops is presented in profusion—ploughs, harrows, cultivators, sowers, planters, reapers, mowers, thrashers, etc., propelled by hand, horse power, or steam. These are calculated to open the eyes of backward cultivators of the soil, at home and abroad, to the appliances contrived by American ingenuity to save labor.

The Japanese is the most advanced of all the foreign sections, and has an attractive display of the somewhat familiar potteries, bronzes, lacquer work, silks, embroideries, fans, and gimcracks characteristic of Japanese art and taste. The Chinese section is in part occupied and is rapidly taking shape, while those inevitable bazaars for the sale of inexhaustible olive wood trinkets from Jerusalem are in full operation.

THE GOVERNMENT BUILDING

stands to the northward of the Main Building in such a position that its western side, in which is the main entrance, is nearly in line with the eastern side of the larger structure. It is eight hundred and eighty-five feet long by five hundred and sixty-five wide. The United States Government occupies a broad section across the middle of this building from east to west with the displays of the different departments. From the eastern gallery a collection of mounted animals, including the shaggy Siberian mammoth of old days, look down in solemn silence and grandeur on the multitudinous geological, ethnological, zoological, and other original specimens of the Smithsonian Institute. The Patent Office has many cases of its models here; the Agricultural Department and the Bureau of Statistics undertake to show by specimens, pictorial representations, and graphic and statistical charts something of the extent and variety of our natural resources; the State Department furnishes illustrations of the possibilities of foreign interchange, as well as portraits of official personages; the War Department sends a cheerful assortment of hospital and surgical appliances, lighthouse contrivances, and so on, and the Navy Department exhibits the outfit for rescuing starving and freezing mortals in the Arctic regions, cheerful to look upon. Mr. Hatton's department is building a Post Office at the end of the section opposite the mammoth, where business is to be transacted when it is completed.

On either side of the Government section are grouped those of the several and here will be found one of the chief sources of interest and instruction when the displays are completed. To the north of the United States exhibits are those of most of the Northern States. Beginning at Government section, on the east side of the building, and running to the north-east corner, in the order mentioned, are Iowa, Minnesota, Dakota, Idaho, and Washington, and alongside of these in the second row Nebraska, Kansas, Wyoming, Montana, and Oregon, with the cognate displays of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul and Northern Pacific Railroad companies adjacent. Here, then, is the great grain-growing Northwest, and a most opulent display does it make, not only of the grains, grasses, and vegetable products of the region, but of birds, animals, and minerals. Each section has some characteristic feature.

In the middle of the northern end of the building and extending to the north-west corner are the spaces of New Mexico, Colorado, Arizona, and Nevada, and in these ores and minerals come to the front with great boldness. Products of the soil are not overlooked, but they are eclipsed by the deeper products of the earth. Coal, iron, silver, gold, stones more or less precious are strikingly arranged amid representations of wild mountain scenery near the great divide. Turning from the corner, in which Nevada displays its mineral wealth, along the west side of the building, we come to California, no longer displaying ores as her most precious possession, but taking pride rather in her great trees and valuable timber, her luxuriant vegetation, her cereals and vegetable products, and her inexhaustible variety of fruits. Stones and minerals she shows in abundance, but they are thrown in the shade by the luxuriant display of more valued products.

Southward from California to the Government section on the west side of the building are ranged in succession Illinois, Wisconsin, Indiana, Michigan, and Ohio, with specimens of their well-known natural products, and with many indications of the later results of industry in articles of manufacture. Illinois shows specimens of the handwork of students in the Industrial University of the State, and Indiana exhibits some fine samples of tile work. The most highly developed industries of the country are presented in the group of New England States, occupying the central part of the northern area of the building and surrounded with the profuse display of nature's productions in the West. The cotton fabrics of New England are well represented, and also the varied works of skill in textile and metallic wares. Massachusetts gives special prominence to industrial art and educational appliances.

On the south side of the Government section we find the exhibits of though New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland occupy a large area at the south-eastern corner. The Maryland section is one of the most complete in the building. It exhibits systematically and with excellent arrangement specimens of its stones and minerals, its animals, birds, and fishes finely mounted, its agricultural products and manufactured articles, and the appliances and facilities for educating its people. Along the eastern side of this part of the building, between New York in the south-east corner and the Government section, are the States of West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Florida, in the order named.

Delaware is near the middle of the south end of the building, and continuing from there to the corner we pass Arkansas, Missouri, Alabama, and Kentucky, this last in the south-west corner, and turning along the west side we come in succession to Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas. In Tennessee building stone and variegated marbles are the most conspicuous feature. Mississippi is miscellaneous, like Arkansas, and shows a great variety of natural products, with fruits and wines in the foreground and cotton asserting itself prominently. Louisiana is rather a State of specialties, in which cotton and sugar are overwhelmingly prominent, but there are salt and rice and goodly variety of woods and semi-tropical vegetation. The big Lone Star State comes forward in burly fashion. It illustrates its bigness on a chart and in statistics painted on a neat but spacious pagoda, and it has a portable house, tastefully constructed of native woods for a headquarters.

So wonderful a display impresses the Christian spectator with the vast extent and power of this great country. While uniting with the South in prayer that the Exposition may by God's blessing lead to the development of trade and increased prosperity, he will also pray—and there is sore need that he should do so—that this great nation may live as becomes a people to whom God has given the choicest spot of the earth's surface. That a nation so blessed should abhor selfishness, should seek after righteousness, and always strive to live as in God's sight an example to all people, ought to be our unceasing prayer.

MIGHTY AWAKENING.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, January 11, 1885.

SOMETIMES a minister's subject is suggested by his artistic tastes, sometimes by the events of the previous week, sometimes by the question of a parishioner. My subject this morning comes in no such way, but straight from the throne of God into my own heart. Give me your prayerful and intense listening. I will show you, if the Lord shall help me, that of the church and of the world at this time is a mighty spiritual awakening. An ox feeding in a pasture might conclude that the whole world is a clover field, and we, standing in the midst of great religious advantages, might think that all the world is evangelized; but if this platform were the world, so much of it as I cover with my right foot would represent the amount evangelized; or if this whole church were the world, then one pew would represent so much of it as is Gospelized.

While I am just as certain as that there is a God that the whole world is finally to be saved, and that as the world began with a garden so it is going to close with a garden, I am just as certainly impressed with the fact that there needs to be a radical change, and that the Church of God needs to get on some other tack. In the present mode and by the present way the thing can never be accomplished. I will show you this morning, as God may help me, that nothing will ever achieve this result but mighty and universal awakening. This is

NOT AN ABSTRACTION.

The first chapter of the Christian Church opens with the account of a revival in which three thousand people joined the church in one day. The day of Pentecost was nothing but a revival. And so the last chapter of the world's history is to be the history of a revival. Not ten thousand people converted, or a million people converted, but a nation born in a day. The millennium is only another name for a revival. So in later ages of the Church, a great awakening came when Robert McChesney preached at Dundee and Scotland was shaken; and when Richard Baxter preached at Kidderminster, and England was shaken; and George Whitefield crossed the ocean, and America was shaken.

There are those of you who can

REMEMBER 1831.

It was a great time of commercial depression in this country, and the shops were closed, and the banking institutions failed, and the whole land was in sadness, and two men appeared at the door of Chatham Street Theatre—one of the worst and most blasphemous theatres of those days—and asked the privilege of purchasing the building for a church, and the lessee said, "For what?" "For a church." He said, "You can have it, and I will give a thousand dollars toward it myself." It was opened, and at the first prayer-meeting eight hundred people were present, and the bar-room was turned into a prayer-room. Mr. Finney preached seventy consecutive nights in that place, and the whole land was shaken. Ay, more of us can

REMEMBER 1857.

All the banks of New York, or nearly all of them, closed, the commercial houses going down with a terrible crash, a time of anxiety such as I have never seen in this country. Then the engine-houses and the theatres were opened for religious service, and James Hall prayer-meeting at noonday, Philadelphia, telegraphed greeting to the noonday prayer-meeting at New York, and the answer went back, and in my village home I waited for the morning newspapers with great and profound interest, wondering what had been done the day before in religious circles. Four hundred thousand entered the kingdom of God, and some say seven hundred thousand. Those times are coming again, my brethren. We have the same forerunner, commercial depression. We have the same anxiety on the part of Christian people who realize that something needs to be done, that this world can never be brought to God by this slow process, and that there must be great awakening.

DULNESS IN THE PULPIT.

I. I argue the need of a great awakening, in the first place, because of the lack of enthusiasm and zeal on the part of those of us who preach the Gospel. You see, this is a gun that kicks. Let the pulpit first preach to itself, and then preach to the pew. Twenty-eight years ago, in the village church, I knelt, and ten or twelve excellent ministers of religion put their hands on my head and set me apart for the holy ministry; and I declare to you to-day, as I look back, I have two emotions—one of gratitude to God, and the other of the deepest dissatisfaction with myself. The field has been so wide, the opportunity has been so magnificent. I have done so little compared with the work I ought to have done. And then I remember I had such

A GLORIOUS STARTING.

Those of you who have read the congratulatory letters of this last week * remember that Dr. Chambers, of New York, who was her pastor, says in that letter that my mother was the godliest woman he had ever known. Though my early home was very plain, and my father and mother were plain people, they lived close up to God, and nobody ever doubted where they went when they died. Oh, I had a glorious starting, and when I think of the opportunities I have had for usefulness I am amazed that I have done so little! It is in no feeling of cant that I express it, but with deep and unfeigned emotion before God. Oh, it is a tremendous thing to stand in a pulpit and know that a great many people will be influenced by what you say concerning God, or the soul, or the great future!

Suppose a man asks of you the direction to a certain place, and you, through carelessness, thoughtlessly tell him the way, and you hear after a while that he got lost on the mountains, and went over the rocks and perished. "Oh," you will say, "I never forgive myself that I didn't take more time with that man! It is my fault. If I had given him the right direction, he would have gone the right way." And oh, the greater responsibility of standing in a pulpit, and telling people which is the road to heaven! Alas! if we tell them wrong. The

in this day that no layman can understand it—the temptation is so mighty in this day to smooth down the truth, and hush up the alarms of the Gospel, and pat men on the shoulder, and sing them on down toward the last plunge, and tell them they are all right. Or, as the poet has put it:

"Smooth down the stubborn text to ears polite,
And snugly keep damnation out of sight."

What is the use of telling men they are all right when they know they are not all right? O brothers in the ministry—for there are many in our audiences—brothers in the ministry, we cannot afford to hold back any of the truth, and we cannot afford to lack in earnestness!

IF YOU FAIL

in this, my brethren, you had better stand away from them in the last day—you had better stand away from that soul, that you have neglected lest he tear you to pieces. He will say to you, "I admired your philosophic disquisitions, and your beautiful gestures and your finely-formed sentences, multiform, and stelliform, and curvilinear, but you never helped prepare me for this judgment day. Cursed be your rhetoric. I am going down now, and I am going to take you with me. Witness, all ye hosts of light and all ye hosts of darkness, it is his fault!" And many worlds come up in chorus, saying, "His fault, his fault!"

Oh, that God with a torch would set all the pulpits of England, Scotland, Ireland and America on fire! If God will forgive me for the past, I will do better for the future.

"Tis not a cause of small import

The pastor's care demands,
But what might fill an angel's heart;

It filled a Saviour's hands.

They watch for souls for which the Lord

Did heavenly bliss forego.

For souls that must forever live

In raptures or in woe."

Oh, what pulpits we will have, and what prayer-meeting circles we will have, and what fields of usefulness we will have, what Sunday-school classes we will have when we get our message

DIRECT FROM THE THRONE!

Rev Samuel Kennedy, an eminent minister of Christ, preached at Baskingridge, New Jersey—I have often heard my father tell the story—and that minister of Christ mourned over the coldness in his church, and he resolved to give one whole week to prayer and to prepare the most powerful discourse he could possibly prepare. So the whole week was employed, and he went into the church, as he thought, thoroughly prepared. While they were singing the hymn before the sermon, he turned to the Bible to find his text, but he had forgotten the text, and he had forgotten the subject, and when the hymn closed he said: "My dear people, a strange mental accident has happened me, and I cannot preach now. You will sing another hymn." And while they were singing another hymn he took his Bible, glancing his eye from page to page, hoping he might strike upon the text and all would come back to him; but ever and anon his eye would strike upon the passage—"The wicked shall be turned into hell and all the nations that forget God." He said: "I cannot preach on that text: it is a dreadful text," and he turned over more leaves, and kept on looking, and again his eye fell upon the same passage. "Oh," he said, "I cannot preach on that text!" The hymn was finished, and he arose and announced the aforesaid text, and the place was filled with God, and a great revival of religion was started. My grandfather and my grandmother were brought in under that awakening, a line of influence coming down through our family which has blessed my soul.

II. I feel there is a need of a great awakening in the fact that the majority of religions

PROFESSORS ARE VERY COLD.

If a church have a thousand members, eight hundred are asleep. If a church have five hundred members, four hundred are asleep. A great multitude of Christians perfectly satisfied if they can only keep from dropping the wine cup on communion day, gracefully passing it along to somebody else. If there be an important religious meeting on a certain night, and that night there be an operatic entertainment of great interest, or there be a literary club, or there be a social circle, or there be an odd-fellows' lodge, or a freemasons' lodge, and the question be between this and between that, who gets it, Christ or the world?

You know, whether you are a professor of religion or not, that the dividing line between the church and the world of to-day is like the equator, or the Arctic or Antarctic circle—a mere imaginary line—and thousands of professed Christians stand discussing the infinitesimal questions, Shall we dance? Shall we play cards? Shall we go to the theatre? Shall we go to the opera? and all those questions, and there are five hundred million of the ing on toward judgment without any warning. Oh, what a thinning out the judgment will make among professors of religion! Thousands going on just touching religion with the tips of the fingers, sauntering on and sauntering on lazily, until after a while they will come in front of the swiftly-revolving mill, and find themselves the chaff which the wind driveth away.

Thousands of people who have their names on church books going on thoughtless of what shall become of the human race, and regardless of the betterment of the world's condition, until after awhile they fall off as Judas did, and as Achan did, and all those who will do not make religion the primordial thing of life.

THE FIRST AND THE LAST.

Oh, how many there are who do not realize the fact that though they are professors of religion, if they die as they are, all the communion tables at which they ever sat will, with uplifted hands of blood, cry for their condemnation, and their neglected Bible and prayerless pillows will say, "Go down, go down; you broke that sacramental oath; out of the seven days of the week you did not give five hours to God! Go down, go down!"

Oh, worldly professor of religion, compromising professor of religion, if you realized your true condition this morning you would bite your lip until the blood came, and you would wring your hands until the bones cracked, and you would utter a cry that would start this whole audience to their feet with horror! Oh, worldly professor of religion, wake up before you wake up in the barred and flaming dungeon you are to undergo eternally. Look off upon the Church to-day, and see how much somnolence, and tell me if I am not right when I say that all the bugles and cymbals and drums and trumpets of the Church need to be sounded, saying: "Awake, thou that sleepest, and Christ shall give thee life." Do I not need arousal? Do you not need it? If my heart condemns me, does not your heart condemn you, my brother?

SLOW PROGRESS.

III. I see also the need of a great awakening in the fact that the cause of God advances so slowly comparatively. I know there are more Christians to-day than there ever were, and yet the world can never come to God in this way. It is a mathematical impossibility. There are more people born into this world than are born into the kingdom of God. Now, how long would it take to bring this world to God at that ratio? Where there is one man converted to God, ten drop in dissipation. Fifty grog-shops built to one new church established. There are journals, literary journals, full of scum and dandruff and slag, controlled by the very scullions of society who pollute everything they put their hands on. Three hundred journals, magazines, newspapers in the city of New York—three hundred—and I undertake to say two hundred of them are hostile to the Christian religion and to all good morals. Churches surrendering to spiritualism and humanitarianism and to

NOTHINGNESS AND DEVILISM.

If a man stand in a pulpit and say that unless you are born again you cannot see the kingdom of God, kid gloves, diamonds bursting through, put up to the face in shame and humiliation. It is not elegant. Men in all churches who do not believe in the Bible in and out and out, from the first word of the first verse of the first chapter of Genesis down to the last word of the last verse of the last chapter of Revelation. Mighty Gospel machinery. Sixty thousand ministers of religion in America, costly music, great Sunday-schools, and yet I declare it that while the cause of God is advancing there are a great many regiments falling back and falling back, and if it does not become a complete rout, a positive Bull Run defeat, it will be because here and there a church hurls itself to the front and ministers of religion, trampling upon the favor of the world, and sacrificing everything, shall snatch up the torn and battered banner of Emanuel and rush on, crying: "This is no time to retreat—forward the whole line!"

IV. I see also a reason for a mighty awakening in the

of the unrepentant. Do you know since you came on the stage of action a whole generation have gone through the gates of eternity? They disappeared from the churches, from the stores, from the offices, from the factories. Some of them went out without an item of hope. Some of them never offered one prayer for their own salvation. You might have uttered perhaps a saving word, but you did not utter it, O Christian! Just think of that. Where is the fountain where, with sleeves rolled up, we may wash off from our hands the blood of immortal souls? But that forever has ended.

THE QUESTION

is now whether we are going to interrupt the other procession marching on—tens of thousands of clerks coming out of stores; tens of thousands of husbandmen coming off farms, tens of thousands of students coming from the colleges and universities, tens of thousands of operators coming from the factories. On and on, inaking no preparation for the eternal world, taking everything by storm, capturing all the obstacles put in the way of their destruction. Who will be brave enough to go out and throw himself in front of that stampede of men and women, and, swinging the sword of God's truth, cry, "Halt, halt, halt!"

O my brothers and sisters in Jesus, it seems to me the time has come for something almost desperate! Ordinary solicitations will not do the work. You want a momentum gotten by a whole night of watching in prayer with the omnipotent God. Catch that soul before it makes the plunge! Put down everything and run to the rescue! To-morrow may be too late, to-night may be too late, three o'clock this afternoon may be too late. Seize that soul now before it flashes into the great eternal world! There are houses aflame, and no ladder to the window; there are ships going down, and no lifeboat. O God, whelm us with these realities! Kill our stupidity. Take from under us our couches of ease. Hurl us into the battle.

I need no rehearse in this place what God has done for this individual church. I need not rehearse the first day we opened, the first communion season, when three hundred and twenty-eight souls stood up in these aisles and joined the Church of God. We have had a great blessing. We are going to have greater.

There are a vast multitude who are permanently connected with this church who do not profess the Christian religion. These are among my warm personal friends. They are among the most liberal supporters of the church. When the time comes next Monday night for the public rental of the pews they will do their very best for the support of all Christian institutions. Some who profess to be Christians might perhaps pride themselves on how little they can do. There are these men of the world who will rejoice in doing all they can do. If I wanted a favor they would be the first men to whom I would go. If prolonged sickness should come to my household, they would be the men and the women whom I would ask to come in, and I could trust my darling children to them, and whoever might fall asleep that night they would be wide awake until the dawn. If I were to make my last will and testament, and I had solemn distribution to make with reference to the welfare of my household, they would be the men to whom I would commit everything. Yet they are not Christians. If I should ask them, they would tell me they are not. Oh,

WHOSE FAULT IS IT?

Is it mine? I have sometimes thought it was. I have sometimes thought if I had been more earnest in my work they would have come to God long before this. Oh, they have got to be brought in! They are going to come in. I know it. I know it.

And then what about the eighty or one hundred thousand strangers who the last twelve-month floated in and out this service? How about the eighty or one hundred thousand strangers who will float in and out the service for the next twelve months? If when John Livingston preached the Gospel in his church in Scotland five hundred received the truth in one day, why could not we be enough in prayer to have thousands in a day? It was not John Livingston that saved them; it was the Holy Spirit that is now abroad. If John Knox could put the lever of his prayer under Scotland until it shook from end to end, can you not get under this city and shake everything from the East River to New Utrecht, and from New Utrecht to Long Island City? God is ready. In your prayers put your body, mind, soul, and eternal destiny into this thing.

I need not rehearse to you the stereotyped illustrations of the fact that God answers prayer. I need not tell you of Hezekiah and the restored fifteen years, or of Elijah and the great rain, or of the post-mortem examination of the Apostle James, who, it was found, had his knees calloused by much prayer, or of Richard Baxter, who stained the walls of his study with the breath of prayer, or of John Welch in the midnight plaid, or of Whitefield on his face before God whole nights imploring the divine mercy. I rather turn in upon yourself and have you think of the time when your soul was sinking and you cried to God and He heard you, of the time when your child was at the point of death and you cried to God and He restored the little one—or of that other time when your fortune went and God set into your empty pantry the cruse of oil and the measure of meal. Oh, we do not want any illustration! We just take

THE LADDER OF THREE RUNGS!

I put that down at your feet, and I ask you to climb up and look off and see the salvation of ten thousand of your fellow-citizens—a ladder of three rungs: "As and it shall be given you. Seek and ye shall find. Knock and it shall be opened unto you." Put your right foot on the lower rung, and that will bring your left foot on the middle rung, and that will bring your right foot on the top rung, and there hold fast—hold fast until you see the serges of the divine mercy dashing clear above the topgallants of your ship.

My brethren, I do not know how you feel in regard to this matter, but my heart breaks with the longing I have for the redemption of the people.

It seems to me if God denies me my prayer, I cannot endure it. I offer myself, I offer my life to Him. Take it, O Lord Jesus, and slay me if that be best. Whether by my life or by my death, let a multitude be brought to glory. If from the mound of my grave a greater multitude can climb into the kingdom of God, then, Lord, let me sleep the last sleep. It is sweet to live for Christ.

If eight million perished in the Napoleonic wars, if one hundred and eighty-seven million were sacrificed in the Roman wars, do you not think that ought to be some of us for Christ? Oh, I wish you knew how to pray! I do not. I mean the prayer that always brings the blessing—always, always. Oh, that we might be so overcome with desire for the salvation of the people that from ten o'clock at night until six in the morning we might be sleepless!

If such a night as that should come, sleepless because full of prayer, let that be a night of weeping over our sin and of rejoicing in the divine mercy. Let there be wailing, wailing, wailing! Let there be shouting, shouting, shouting! But, lest we might not have such a night as that, and lest before the setting of this day's sun our accounts should be made up, let us this moment go so low down before God that there shall be no lower depth of humiliation. Oh, that we might have a blood-red prayer, which would bow the heavens and bring all the unforgiven to the feet of a bleeding, dying, sympathetic Jesus, and this place be shaken as with tempest and earthquake, or that it might be as solemn as though we heard the rapturous and agonizing vociferation of three worlds!

THE RESURRECTION BODY.

By Rev. G. W. Pendleton, A.M.

What Corruption Really is—The Resurrection not of the Soul—The Unclothing and Re-Clothing—The Doctrine Brought to Light—Personal Identity of the Risen—The Vitality of Seeds—When the First Resurrection will Take Place—A Glorious Rising.

In the Greek, the terms "corruptible" and "corruption," used in the familiar passage, "When this corruptible shall have put on incorruption" (1 Cor. 15: 54), imply the act of destroying, vitiation, ruin, plague, detriment, ruinous loss. Incorruptible and incorruption imply redemption from vitiation, ruin, detriment, loss—that the body shall come out of this state of depravity and decay into an imperishable, incorruptible condition. "Because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God"—a deliverance from the curse of sin and the grave—a state of imperishableness and incorruptibility. Thus "the dead shall be raised incorruptible." "This mortal shall put on immortality." "He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal body by His spirit that dwelleth in you."

The resurrection is raising up the mortal body.

NOT A MORTAL SOUL.

The phrase, the mortal soul, is nowhere used in the Bible. The soul is not mortal, and therefore does not go to the grave or to the state of corruption. At death, the earthly house of man's tabernacle is taken down, pulled to pieces, as a tent, and in the resurrection he receives a better house, a permanent dwelling, an immortal body, with which the spirit shall be clothed.

Paul says (11 Cor. 5: 4), "For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened; not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life." The unclothing is putting off the mortal body, or the unclothing of the spirit. The unclothing of man is to put off the body, as a cloak—dissolution, death. "The dust returns to the earth, and the spirit to God, who gave it." The Christian does not anticipate this unclothing with pleasure. "Not for that we would (or wish to) be unclothed." Death is not a welcome event. Many Christians are subject to bondage all their life-time through fear of death. But the putting on of the body, or "clothed upon with our house from heaven," is a joyful event, for this is resuscitation, the resurrection of the body, and the clothing of the spirit.

What does the body clothe, if not the spirit? What does the spirit inhabit, if not the house—the body? A tabernacle is made to be inhabited. The believer is clothed upon, that mortality (the mortal body) may be swallowed up of (by) life—by means of life. When this is accomplished, we have the resurrection body—the re-union of the parts separated by death; and death, the last enemy, is destroyed. In the believer, to the condition it was in before sin entered Paradise. "Death is swallowed up in victory," the grave is robbed of its victim, and all things in Christ are made anew. The "vile bodies" of the saints are fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body. They will be clothed upon with their house from heaven. Thus Christ will finish the work which the Father gave Him to do; and the masterpiece—the finishing touch of this great work—will be the resurrection of the body from the grave—the clothing of the spirit of man with an immortal, imperishable, indestructible body.

NATURE IS REINSTATE

This is the immortality which Christ has brought to light through the Gospel. "I am the Resurrection and the Life."

This great truth of Christianity was brought from obscurity into clear light by the resurrection of Christ. Many wise men, ages before, were unable to comprehend this truth, and give satisfactory answers to those who had consigned friends to the grave. They made dark and mysterious blunders; struggled to apprehend the nature of this truth, but without satisfaction. "Gross darkness covered the minds of the people," until Christ opened the grave and "brought life and immortality to light."

Now, when we lay our friends in the grave, we are comforted with the truth that the mortal will put on immortality, and that we shall see them in the clothed upon, with their house from heaven. This truth dries up the grave's chilly dampness, and lifts the sad heart to the joys of the better life, and sends its cheering light through all the darkness of the future. Hence David said, "Then shall I be satisfied, when I awake in thy likeness."

Believers in the doctrine of the resurrection entertain different views on the subject of

of the resurrected body. The Bible clearly teaches that the body raised is substantially the same body that is buried in the earth. It is not, then we must call the raising of the body from the grave not a resurrection, but a creation. If the resurrected body is not substantially the body laid in the grave, then it is another personality. Then some one else, and not ourselves, must appear for us before the judgment-seat of Christ, and give account for the deeds done in our bodies.

Some physiologists teach that the body entirely changes every seven years, so that there is nothing left of its old particles. But we do not lose our personal identity—we are conscious always that we are the same persons. If physiologists are right in their belief, the body changes so slowly and imperceptibly that it is exactly reproduced, even to the moles and scars it bore before the change, and this process, which now takes seven years, may in God's hands be so accelerated as to be done in a moment. Christ said of Himself, "Handle me, and see that a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have"—that is, I am not a spirit, but a body, with flesh and bones, raised from the tomb.

Scientists tell us that there are ten thousand species of insects and eighty thousand species of plants and seeds, and that these seeds and plants are scattered everywhere, braving the elements, the cold, and storms, and yet they never lose anything of their or of the life hidden within them. The warm sun and rains will renew them into life, after lying two thousand years. What can we say, then, of God's great power to revive and bring into life the dead body, gathering its atoms, scattered to the four quarters of the globe? He who denies this "knows neither the Scripture, nor the power of God." Is it more difficult for God to raise the dead than to renew the seeds and plants at the return of spring? Certainly not. Paul says, "And God hath both raised up the Lord, and will raise up us also, by His own power." The infinite power of God will effect the resurrection of all the dead. From the dust will come up the same body identically that went into the grave, but beautified, incorruptible, and immortalized, like Christ's glorified body.

"It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body"—indestructible and eternal.

When shall the

occur? At the second coming of Christ.

"Whence we look for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, who will change our vile bodies," etc. When the Lord descends from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trumpet of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first. "For the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." The whole family of Christ, once vile and corruptible, will be changed, physically as they have been changed spiritually—sanctified and cleansed by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Spirit, and prepared to be presented by Christ at His coming to His Father, a glorious church, without spot or wrinkle or any such thing. "The whole spirit, soul and body have been preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." "And so shall we ever be with the Lord." "Wherefore comfort one another with these words."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Johnnie's Dying Creed.—At a Recent Meeting Mr. Clyde narrated the following: "Last week I went to visit a sick child. Sitting down beside him, I said, 'Johnnie, do you love Jesus?' 'Oh, yes, I love Jesus!' he replied. 'How long is it since you learned to love Him?' I then asked; and he told me that it was about two years since he had given himself to Christ. I opened my Bible, and read part of Isaiah 53. After we had spoken on the verses which I had read, he said: 'Although I cannot see Jesus, I know that He can see me. I also know that He died for me, and I love Him for it.' Now, that young and believing soul is with the Saviour whom he so dearly loved. To-day we followed to the grave all that remained of little Johnnie. Oh, that every Christian had the simple faith of that little child!"

A Drink-Slave's Confession.—At a Recent noon prayer-meeting the Rev. Mr. Haslam said: "Last night at our meeting I was speaking on pardon. At the close of the meeting I noticed a man who was sitting at the extreme end of the hall, and as I approached him I was conscious of a strong smell of drink; and when I spoke to him, he said: 'Yes, after what I have heard you say, I think that there is a little hope for me yet, but it is this love of strong drink that keeps me back; I cannot trust myself; I have no power to resist it.' But I told him that he did not require to keep himself, but to ask God to keep him, and give him liberty, and afterward just to look on the bondage in which he was now, that he might praise God for freedom. After a word of prayer he professed to give himself to Christ. Oh, may that man's profession be a true and sincere one, as I have reason to believe it to be!"

A Doubter Liberated.—A Well-known Clergyman remarked: "On one occasion I was speaking to a man in an evangelistic meeting, who was doubting Christ's willingness to save him, and said he could not believe that such as he could be saved." I said to him, "How do you know that I am here?" "Because I see you," was the amused reply. "Very good," I answered; "you believe because you see me. Now, shut your eyes, and shake hands with me," I said. He did so. "How do you now know that I am here?" I asked. "Because I feel you," he replied. "Let go my hand, and still keep your eyes closed; now," I said, "how do you know that I am here?" "Because I hear you," was the answer. "Well," I said, "always hear the voice of God, and doubt not." He doubted no longer, but by faith received Jesus as his Saviour, who had long been saying to him, "Come unto me, and I will give you rest."

A Variety Theatre Singer's Conversion.—A member of the Mizpah Band thus testified: "It is six years since the Lord saved me. I was left an orphan when a child. I grew so reckless and sinful that my relatives would have nothing to do with me. For seven years I sang at variety theatres; the voice which God gave me I used for Satan; but God in His mercy did not cast me away. One day I was walking along a street with my little boy; I had on nothing but rags; we were both very miserable. I saw a bill in a shop window telling of a lecture which was to be delivered that night; so I said to my little boy that we would go and hear the lecture; and the words spoken that night pierced me, I saw myself such a sinner before God. The preacher chose the text, 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God.' I sat there till every one had gone except a few gentlemen. One of them came and told me that the meeting was over, and I asked him if I could see the gentleman who had spoken. I accepted the offered gift of salvation that very night. My wife too is following the Good Shepherd.

Happy Peter and the Showers.—The Rev. Mr. Haslam said: "At one time I went to visit a much-maligned and very happy man. He had been a great sufferer for many years. Amid all his sufferings and poverty he was always so happy and cheerful that he soon gained for himself the name of 'Happy Peter.' On this occasion I took a doubting friend with me, and induced Peter to talk about himself, which was sometimes very hard to do. He told us he had suffered very greatly for thirty-five years. My friend asked him if he had been always happy through all these years, and he said he had, since it was the Lord's will to afflict him. Very much astonished, my friend said: 'And have you never had a cloud through all these years?' He turned and looked at his wife, who was almost as great a sufferer as himself, and the tears came into his eyes, but he answered: 'Cloud? If I had not a cloud, where are the blessed showers to come from?'

The Dove in the Steeple.—"Dr. Todd relates the following: A steeple of an old climbing-house was to be taken down. A man climbed up toward the top, and fastened a strong rope round it. The street was full of men and boys, a great many of whom took hold of the rope to pull the steeple over. 'All ready?' cried the overseer. 'All ready,' shouted scores of voices. So they all set to work. Soon the poor old steeple began to tremble. Just then there came a beautiful solitary white dove, and flew round and round the steeple, not daring to fly into it, and not able to leave it. 'See that dove,' exclaimed a hundred voices. 'Poor thing! She must have some young ones up in the steeple,' said a few. Again they pulled, and again the old steeple reeled and tottered. The distress of the poor bird was now so great that all shouts were hushed. Again they pulled the rope, and the steeple reeled. The bird hovered a minute on her wings, and just at the instant the steeple began to fall she darted up into it out of sight. A moment later the spire fell with a crash. I went to it, and there I found the poor dove lying between her two little white children—'all three dead.' 'Alas, poor dove! You were willing to die for and with your children, but you could not save them. But oh, when Jesus Christ died for men, He saved them! He did not die in vain, like the poor dove.'

Story of a Starving Robin.—"A Lady Once came to the Rev. W. Haslam at the close of an address, and said that she did not understand, but would like to know what he meant by consecration of all to Christ. After some conversation she said: 'Well, Mr. Haslam, I'll tell you what I think is the trouble. I have got a comfortable income and a pleasant home, and have surrounded myself with all that to me makes life enjoyable, and now I fear if I yield myself wholly to Christ, that He will send me out to China.' Mr. Haslam said: 'Will you imagine the following incident? It is winter, and there has been a long frost. As you look from the window of your warm room you see a little starving robin on the branch outside your window. Moved to pity, you crumble some bread in your hand and hold it out to the starving bird. Tamed by cold and hunger, it hops on to your hand, putting itself entirely in your power. What do you do with it?' 'Oh, I would take every care of it, for it had trusted me.' And do you fear to trust Christ? Do you think He will use you hardly? If you yield your will to Him He will make it a joy to you to do His bidding.' Two years afterward a lady came to him at the end of the meeting, and, after a cordial greeting, said: 'Do you remember a lady to whom you once told a story of a starving robin?' 'Oh, yes,' said Mr. Haslam, 'and you were afraid to enter the service of Christ.' 'But not now,

Mr. Haslam,' answered the lady, 'for oh, do you know, I am going out to China!'

NOTES ON NEW BOOKS.

EVIE'S DAUGHTERS.

By Marion Harland, is a book by a lady, for ladies. Such a book was imperatively needed. Many a wife and mother who reads it will lament that the knowledge now imparted comes too late to save herself from the consequences of error, if not of sin. The question is often an anxious one for the mother conscientiously desiring to do her duty toward her daughters, how and when she shall impart to them knowledge respecting the mysteries of their physical being. It is a difficult and a delicate task, and many mothers shrink from it so long that mischief is done before the task is performed. 'Oh, if I had but known!' many a woman has said, when years of pain and life-long debility have come upon her. Our authoress makes no attempt to satisfy prurient curiosity. Her position in the religious world, her well-earned reputation as a writer of chaste and wholesome literature, are a sufficient guarantee that the product of her pen will never injure the modesty of the most pure-minded girl. But convinced, as she is, that on such a subject silence is wrong as well as imprudent, she tells what she deems it necessary to tell, and she does so with marvellous tact and with exquisite grace. Her book will encourage and assist mothers to impart knowledge to their daughters, instead of leaving them to learn the facts from servants or precocious companions; or if the mother still lacks the courage to do her duty, she may place in her daughter's hand the book itself, which is the next best thing. We may hope, too, that ladies who are interested in the welfare of girls who have been deprived of a mother's counsels, will use this book as a gift-book. Mrs. Terhune has done a courageous deed, which will shed a fresh lustre about the already well-loved name of Marion Harland, by producing this work, for which all 'Evie's Daughters' who read it will thank her. It is published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

AN APPEAL TO CÆSAR.

By Albion W. Tourgée, is a work dealing with the subject on which Mr. Tourgée has written so much—the condition of society in the South. The book, as the author informs us in his introductory chapter, was written at the request of President Garfield, to whom he submitted his views. General Garfield believed that the public was not prepared to indorse a policy such as Mr. Tourgée recommended, and advised him to write a book on the subject to arouse the attention of the people and to lead them to consider the question. Mr. Tourgée is concerned by the attitude of the two races in the South, and fears that the colored race, increasing, as it does, far more rapidly than the white race, will eventually organize to resist the social and political dominance of the whites, and that unless some remedial measures are promptly taken there will be a bloody and cruel war. Mr. Tourgée is evidently in earnest, and though we think some of the facts he cites would be traversed by the political leaders in the South, he presents a view of the question which demands the serious attention of Congress and the people. Published by Messrs. Ford, Howard & Hallert.

AN ILLUSTRATED COMMENTARY.

by the Rev. Lyman Abbott. Vol. IV.: The Acts of the Apostles. This volume forms part of the great work undertaken by the eminent Biblical scholar whose 'Life of Christ,' 'Dictionary of Religious Knowledge,' and other works are well known to ministers and Sunday-school teachers. The three volumes, previously issued, cover the four Gospels, Mark and Luke being dealt with in the second. The Acts of the Apostles is probably the book of all others in the New Testament, in the study of which a commentator can render useful service. We want to know all that can be told of those marvellous missionary journeys of the great Apostle of the Gentiles and as we follow him in the inspired volume from place to place, we long to know more than is told us there of the people to whom he preached and the rulers before whom he appeared. It is with a keen sense of this general desire that Mr. Abbott has prepared this volume. His aim is to assist Christian parents, Sunday-school teachers, and lay workers, rather than to supply new information to learned men and ministers. Numerous illustrations and maps are contained in the volume, thus giving the highest degree of lucidity to the exposition. Published by Messrs. A. S. Barnes & Company, New York and Chicago.

THE LOST FOUND.

and the Wanderers Welcomed, by the Rev. William M. Taylor, D.D., minister of the Broadway Tabernacle, New York. This series of discourses covers a ground on which the Christian delights to dwell. It has been the favorite theme of preachers from the apostolic age to the present time, and will continue to call into exercise the best powers of preachers, until the last soul has been gathered out of the world. Jesus came to seek that which was lost, is the burden of each discourse, and again and again, with rich variety of illustration, this most precious truth is presented. The Lost Sheep, The Lost Coin, and The Lost Man, the Prodigal Son, are the subjects of the discourses, the last named furnishing matter for four of the six. Those who have listened to Dr. Taylor's preaching will welcome this enduring memorial, while those who have not had that privilege will be glad to learn something of the character of the preaching of a man whose name is a household word in all the religious homes of America. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. Price, seventy-five cents.

THE BOOK-BUYER.

for January completes the first volume of the new series of this excellent monthly guide to the book-market. We have in a previous number directed attention to the advantages it offers to purchasers of books. Its list of books published during each month, and its extracts from reviews of the most prominent of those works, are a valuable aid to those who are collecting a library, and are desirous of limiting it to any particular class of books. The January number now issued contains a copious index for the year. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. Price, five cents; annual subscription, fifty cents.

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

An illuminated copy of the Lord's Prayer, suitable for presents, or when framed and glazed, for an ornament for the wall, has been issued by Mr. Delvin F. Brown, of New York, who offers it free by mail securely packed for twenty-two cents. The actual engraving, which is of the much-esteemed and known as 'line' engraving, is twelve and a half inches wide by sixteen long. It is printed on fine plate paper sixteen by twenty inches. The characters are not, as is too often the case in such productions, hieroglyphics, but good plain Roman letters, which any child can understand. Beautifully engraved little pictures, eight in number, of the leading events in the Saviour's life are interspersed, and besides those there is a picture of Christ as drawn by one of the greatest masters, and the exquisite engraving of the Last Supper, described in a previous number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

MODERN LOW-COST HOUSES.

The Co-operative Building Plan Association, of 24 Beekman Street, New York, has issued a manual for the use of persons about to build a house. It contains fifty-six pictures of residences, varying from one that may be built for four hundred dollars to one costing six thousand and five hundred. It also contains a picture of a chapel and Sunday-school to cost two thousand dollars, and of a church costing four thousand dollars. In each case a plan of the ground floor is annexed and the price stated for which full plans, specifications, and bills of particulars will be furnished. Price, fifty cents.

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

A wrong date will appear on the address label of some papers this week. A large number of renewals have been received since the commencement of the year, and it has not been possible in every case to change the date in type to that covered by the renewal.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Albany has been the Centre of Political Interest during the past week. On Tuesday, January 6th, the President-elect, in a brief note to the State Senate, resigned the governorship, and Lieutenant-Governor Hill was sworn in in his place. The question of a successor to United States Senator Lapham was the most prominent one discussed in political circles. As its settlement will indicate the progress made in the work of harmonizing the sections of the Republican party in the State, it is the subject of some anxiety throughout the country. Present circumstances afford little encouragement to those who are hoping for peace. The candidacy of President Arthur, which would apparently have afforded the best basis for harmonious action, finds few supporters. Mr. Blaine's friends have decided on supporting Mr. Everts, while the present choice of the Stalwarts is Mr. Morton, who is now our minister in France. Efforts have been made to gain Democratic votes for a compromise candidate, but the Democrats have decided to support a candidate of their own. The objection urged against Mr. Everts is that in 1882 he wounded Judge Folger by refusing to speak in the campaign for the governorship. It is a curious coincidence that in the circumstances Mr. Everts should be supported by the section which is just now so severe on bolters. No one proposes that Senator Lapham should be his own successor, which is a bad omen for Senator Warner Miller, whose term expires in 1887.

The Defections from the Republican Party which resulted in the election of Mr. Cleveland seem likely to become permanent. The Republican managers in many districts have refused to allow members of the party who did not vote for Mr. Blaine to participate in the organizations of the party. The result is that in New York, Boston, Brooklyn and other places, the "Independent Republicans" are making permanent their organizations, which were intended to be only temporary, for the purposes of last year's campaign. The Prohibitionists are following the same line. The Republican journals having called them traitors and other hard names, and ruled them out of the party, they declare that henceforth they will be Prohibitionists and nothing more. A very bitter feeling prevails on both sides.

Secretary Lincoln has Formally Refused to oblige General Hazen by placing Lieutenant Garlington upon trial. His letter on the subject has not been made public, but the Associated Press has secured some of its chief points. It states that the Secretary quotes at length from the findings of the Proteus Court to show that Garlington was not so derelict in the performance of his duty as Hazen alleges, and he gives that officer several other points in the history of the case that will not be very pleasant reading for him. It seems probable that if there should be another investigation of the sad calamity, it will bear on General Hazen's own conduct.

The National Committee of the Prohibition party intend to continue the agitation on the same lines as before. A two days' session was held last week in New York, when a series of resolutions was adopted, of which the most important was the following: "The honest enforcement of law is the object of just government. The National Prohibition party has no confidence that either the Democratic or Republican party will so legislate for or administer government in behalf of citizens as to secure them in their just rights by the legal destruction of the national crime. And the purpose of this party is to exchange the present policy in administration that favors and protects crime for the right and just policy of protection to citizens against crime. The prohibition of the liquor traffic is a national issue to be consummated by amendment to the Federal Constitution; and the prohibition party is a necessity to secure such amendment, and to maintain an administration in power favorable to its enforcement." Mission work during the ensuing year will be supervised by John B. Finch, of Lincoln, Neb.; D. P. Sagendorph, of Charlotte, Mich.; A. J. Jenkins and J. A. Van Fleet, of Chicago; Samuel D. Hastings, of Madison, Wis., and Mattie McClellan Brown, of Cincinnati, who compose the Executive Committee.

The Socialists Arming and Drilling in Chicago have aroused alarm in many quarters during the past week, especially in States where wages are being reduced and large numbers of men are unemployed. The facts appear to be that in Chicago there are five companies of Socialists, with an aggregate membership of seven hundred and fifty men, of which three companies are armed with breech-loaders. It was true that the companies drilled in secret. Before the law was passed forbidding armed bodies of men, except the State militia, to drill in public without permission of the Governor, the Socialists used to drill on Sundays in the streets. Since then they appeared to have a greater desire to drill than before. Nearly all the Socialists had received more or less military training in the old country, and they kept up their military practice here partly in continuance of habits they had formed and partly because they felt themselves somewhat aggrieved by the law forbidding their drilling under arms in public here. In spite of the assurances given that no outbreak is contemplated, it has been deemed prudent to place a guard in the armory, which now patrols it night and day.

The Principles and Aims of the Socialists were authoritatively formulated at the meeting of the International Association in Chicago of January 4th. One resolution passed declares that the despotic power which the privileged class possesses is destructive of life, liberty, and happiness, and should be abolished by any and all means. The speakers took the same tone. One said that the world had been created for the people alike, and that the capitalists must take the non-capitalists into partnership or else, with the assistance of dynamite, leave the world. When socialism prevailed every man would be a joint-stockholder of the entire earth, and richer than Vanderbilt. Another, an old man, said he "believed in slaughtering a few thousand capitalists." A lady said she thought she would look very charming in the good clothes and diamonds at present worn by the wife of some capitalist. She asserted herself able to throw dynamite as effectively as her husband. She closed with the expressed desire that the ministers would in the future tell their starving parishioners to "trust in dynamite" instead of "to trust in God."

General Wolsley Telegraphs that he Expects to reach Khartoum by January 24th. His former predictions in other campaigns, improbable as they seemed when uttered, were kept to the letter; in this case England is earnestly hoping that he may prove equally accurate. The continental powers are pressing her on all hands, and France, urged on by Bismarck, is insisting on her claims to take part in the solution of the Egyptian difficulty. Lord Wolsley requests reinforcements for himself and that another expedition be sent out to operate from Suakim to Berber, presumably in the hope that Osman Digna may be prevented attacking his flank. A decisive battle with the Mahdi is expected within a few days.

Mr. Gladstone is Suffering from Insomnia. His condition causes alarm to his friends, who fear that he will be compelled to retire from office. The worry of the Premiership, and the vexations connected with the Egyptian troubles, in which he has been forced into a course from which he recoils, are, it is believed, the cause of his illness. That his retirement is possible may be inferred from a brief speech delivered by him recently, who, replying to a toast to his father's health, said that after fifty years of arduous public service a much further prolongation of the Prime Minister's political life could not be anticipated. His father would doubtless always remain in harness, although his labors would be less arduous than those of men in the political arena.

A Female Assassin, Mme. Clovis Hugues, was tried in Paris last week, amid sensational surroundings. She had received a number of offensive post-cards, and charges of complicity in proceedings which led to the divorce of a prominent Frenchman from his aged wife were made against her; whereupon she took a revolver and deliberately shot the man she suspected of getting up the evidence against her and of writing the post-cards. At her trial she boldly avowed the act, acknowledged that she did it with premeditation, and avowed that if she could have got at his employer she would have shot her. It was also proved by experts that the murdered man did not write any of the post-cards. The jury, notwithstanding, acquitted the prisoner, who received an ovation from her friends. Such a scene was never witnessed in the worst days of the Second Empire.

A Year of Daring Events is the Prediction hazarded by a prominent European journal in describing the prospects of Europe for the year 1885. The direction which these daring events are expected to take is a general scramble for new territory by the European powers. The London correspondent of the New York Times thus glances over the field of battle: "Prince Bismarck has this week given currency to a rumor that Germany will shortly take Zanzibar under her protection, while the Berlin correspondent of the Moscow Gazette, who is very close to Prince Bismarck, writes about the duty of Russia to absorb Abyssinia and take a hand in settling the Egyptian and African questions. It is also announced that Russia is preparing to approach another step to the frontiers of British India by annexing Herat. Spain is said to be on the eve of annexing a large block of African territory, if she has not already done so, while France is more than suspected of an intention to repeat her Tunisian tactics in Morocco. Italy is getting a squadron ready for an African invasion, ostensibly to avenge the massacre of Bianchi. Truly this is an era of planetary politics."

Jerry McAuley's Cremorne Mission Celebrated its third anniversary on January 4th, when the services, both morning and evening, were crowded. Mrs. McAuley, it was stated, proposes to carry on the work of the mission, and she is encouraged by many tokens of success. About a thousand dollars is needed to clear off the debt on the place, and four thousand to meet the expenses of the current year. The friends present at the anniversary services contributed sixteen hundred dollars.

The Rev. Noah H. Schenck, D.D., Rector of St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., died on January 4th, aged sixty years. He was one of the most popular and useful clergymen of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He was a native of Pennington, N. J. He was educated for the legal profession, and practised for a few years in Cincinnati, O. At the age of twenty-six he abandoned his brilliant prospects, and studied for the ministry. He was ordained in 1853 and commenced pastoral work at Gambier, O. Subsequently he labored successively at Hillsborough, O., Chicago, Ill., and Baltimore, Md. In 1867 he settled in Brooklyn, where he remained until his death. In July, 1871, he went to St. Petersburg, in company with Rev. Mr. Washburn and Cyrus W. Field, as a delegate from the Evangelical Alliance of America, to present a memorial to the Czar.

Mr. Moody's Opponents have Failed in their unscrupulous scheme to interfere with his usefulness in the South. They industriously circulated the report that in a sermon in New York he had compared Generals Lee and Stonewall Jackson to the devil. When Mr. Moody arrived in Richmond, Va., on January 3d, he found that a very bitter feeling against him had been produced by this report. In a published interview with him he emphatically denied the report. "How," said he, "such a sentiment could have been attributed to me I cannot understand. I have always looked upon these two distinguished sons of the South as the highest type of the Christian and soldier. I always aim to preach what I feel, and, as I have said, I have always entertained the highest respect for those two great Southern leaders. No, I cannot think of anything that I have said that any one could possibly have understood to be an aspersion on Generals Lee and Jackson. It is hard for me to understand how these things can be said about me, when I have always shown kindness to the Southern people. During the war I visited many of the military prisons in the North and preached to the Confederate prisoners." Mr. Moody preached to very large congregations on January 4th, among which were many prominent ex-Confederates.

An Intelligent View of the Mormon Question was presented, on January 5th, to a meeting of clergymen by Rev. Dwight Spencer, who has been laboring as a home missionary in Utah. He said there are now six times as many Mormons as there were in 1850. The income of that church from tithes alone is three million dollars a year. More than one half the area of the United States, Mr. Spencer said, lies beyond the Rocky Mountains. Montana alone, if settled as thickly as Belgium, would absorb the present population of the entire country. This region is now but sparsely settled, and such society as there is, is in a chaotic condition. There is no Sabbath, and educational advantages, when there are any at all, are limited. It is right in the centre of this vast region that the Mormon kingdom has been set up, and from it missionaries are sent out to the mining camps and railroad towns to preach sanctified lust to the half civilized people. After referring to the menace to our social life, which the Mormon Church is constantly making by destroying the family, which is the unit of society, Mr. Spencer said that the women submitted to the terrible degradation of polygamy, because they have been taught that in this way only could they secure eternal life. He described the misery wrought by polygamous marriages in vivid terms. Speaking of the remedy for the evil, he said that legislation might do something, but so long as Congressmen were allowed to advocate crime on the floor of Congress and go unrebuked, he had little hope from this kind of remedy. The chief remedy must be the Gospel.

A Sanguinary Attack on a Dynamiter was made last week in New York. Captain Thomas Phelan, the superintendent of the almshouse at Kansas City, Mo., who is one of the Irish Invincibles, was requested by the society of New York to explain an interview which had appeared in the Kansas City Journal. In that interview he was represented as disclosing the secrets of the dynamiters. Individual members of the fraternity also sent to him urging him to come to New York and expulate himself. He came on January 9th, and was taken to the office in Chambers Street, where O. Donovan Rossa edits the United Irishman. Rossa was not in, and Phelan sat down to wait for him. In a few minutes a man stole up behind him, having in his hand a bowie knife nine inches long and a quarter of an inch thick. With this he stabbed Phelan in the back, in the neck, and in the right arm, the last-named blow being of such force as to break the bone. Fourteen stabs in all were inflicted, but Phelan retained sufficient strength afterward to draw a revolver, with which he shot his assailant, wounding him very slightly. Phelan was taken to the hospital, where he lies in a critical condition, and his assailant was arrested. Phelan insists that he was inveigled into Rossa's den to be murdered. How deeply he was involved in the dynamite, Phoenix Park, and other conspiracies is not known, but he evidently took some part in arranging them, and this crime is a punishment for his supposed treachery. It is only another illustration of the truth of our Saviour's words, "They that take the sword shall perish with the sword" (Matt. 26 : 52).

An Unremunerative Occupation was Pursued by a woman, according to her son's account. "My mother gets me up, makes the fire, and gets my breakfast, and sends me off," said a bright youth. "Then she gets my father up, gets his breakfast, and sends him off. Then she gives the other children their breakfast, and sends them to school; and then she and the baby have their breakfast." "How old is the baby?" asked the reporter. "Oh, she is most two, but she can talk and walk as well as any of us." "Are you well paid?" "I get $4 a week, and my father gets $3.50 a day." How much does your mother get? With a bewildered look, the boy said: "Mother? Why she don't work for anybody." "I thought you said she worked for all of you." "Oh, yes! for us she does, but there isn't any money in it." As the boy grows older he will find that very many of the world's best workers toil without any prospect of making money by their labors, and very often they do not win the gratitude of those who benefit by their exertions. Missionaries, preachers, and Christian workers know that their occupation has "no money in it," but, like their Master, they will eventually be satisfied as they look back on their travail of soul (Isa. 53 : 11).

A Romantic Reunion of Husband and Wife has occurred in Wilmington, Del. In 1866 a young man of good family married a young and beautiful girl, the daughter of a wealthy merchant in that city. He fell into dissipated habits about a year after his marriage, and in a short time his young wife and her child were reduced to want. His father-in-law so severely upbraided him with his misconduct that he left home, resolving never to return until he had conquered his evil habit. The wife went to her father's house in humiliation. A year later an unknown man died in a hotel at Erie, Pa., and the published description of him so closely agreed with that of the fugitive husband that inquiries were made which satisfied the family that it was he. The body was taken to Wilmington and decently buried in the family vault. After ten years, during which the lady continued faithful to her husband's memory, a letter was received from him saying he was still living, that he had completely overcome his dissipated habits, and was again a prosperous man. His wife and child gladly rejoined him. They had passed more than ten years of unnecessary sorrow on his account. The nian might have spared them that suffering by writing earlier, had he not been so obstinate in waiting for complete moral and financial restoration. The same mistake is often made with more disastrous consequences by awakened sinners who do not realize that Christ will accept them as they are without waiting for the slow and uncertain process of self-reformation (Matt. 9 : 11, 12).

The Fatal Blunder of a Drowning Lady Last week led to her own death and that of the man who attempted to rescue her. Two young men were drawing two ladies over the frozen surface of a lake on the Lorillard farm near New York, when the ice broke, and all four were precipitated into the water. One of the young men succeeded in saving the lady to whom he was attached, and the other young man tried to rescue his companion. She, however, was in a paroxysm of alarm, and did not heed his warning to remain passive while he saved her. She made frantic efforts to save herself, and when he approached her she grasped his arms convulsively and prevented him swimming. Both were drowned. The poor lady's mistake was a type of one often made by the sinner under conviction. He is frequently kept back from peace by his efforts to save himself. He does not even cling to the Saviour, much less rest calmly in perfect confidence in Christ's promise and power (Eph. 2 : 8, 9).

The Beautiful Tints in Autumn Leaves, which are so much admired by young collectors, are accounted for in an unpoetical way by a scientific writer. The variegated tints, he says, are merely the earlier stages of decomposition, and are due to the more or less considerable triumph of chemical forces over the weakened or destroyed vitality of the living plant. It is to be feared that the same observation may be applicable to the popular teaching of certain well-known preachers. "It is so beautiful, so poetical," say the admirers. "A great advance on the old style of preaching, when the pulpit was always threatening the pew with hell-fire." When beauty is gained at the expense of vitality and truth it is dearly purchased (Jer. 23 : 32).

The Significant Reply of a San Francisco lady to an insinuation is quoted by the Angle-side. She was speaking in defence of an absent friend. "Ah, madam," said one, "you speak well of him because he is your friend." "Not at all," she answered. "He is my friend because I can speak well of him." If this principle always held sway, how often we should hear Christians, now so often silent, speaking of their Saviour! But Christ adopts a still higher principle. He owns as His friends men of whom He has no reason, save in His own love, to speak well (Rom. 5 : 7, 8).

Three Treasured Letters, Framed and Glazed, ornament the wall of a humble home in Lewiston, Me. They were written by the grandfather of the present owner, who at the time of writing was fighting for his country against the British. The first letter, which is a specimen of the others, is dated "Cambridge, June 18th, 1775," the day after the Bunker Hill fight. The writer, one Jeremiah Dole, thus addresses his wife and child: "I right these few lines to let you know that I am well as I expected to be. Through good Providence God saved my life. But we expect to go to it a gin to-day very hot. I puts my trust in God. I hope to see you again. Don't send my things before you here from me again. No more at present. I hant time to write no more." It will be seen that the letters are not prized for their accurate orthography nor for their literary merit, but because the owner is proud of an ancestor who risked his life for his country's deliverance. Such relics would be treasured in any patriotic family, and even by men who hold in light esteem the words of Him who gave His life not for one country alone, but for a lost world (John 3 : 16).

JOHNAH'S RESOLVE; OR, "LOOK AGAIN!"

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Then I said, I am cast out of thy sight; yet I will look again toward thy holy temple."—JOHNAH 2:4.

Man a Complex Creature—Faith Always to the Front—I. The Verdict of Sense—Unbelief the First to Speak—The Verdict Apparently Correct—Was Deserved—God's Hand Evident in It—A Very Bitter Punishment—It was not True—II. The Resolve of Faith—Sent him to Prayer—Led him to Quote Scripture—Dared to go to God with a Yet—Driven to do the First Acts—Self-Magnifiers.

WHAT a complex creature is man! Those who fancy that they can fully describe him do not understand him. He is a riddle and a contradiction. As says Ralph Erskine:

"I'm in mine own and others' eyes
A labyrinth of mysteries."

In the text Jonah appears to be in a despairing condition—"I am cast out of thy sight;" and still he has hope, for he resolves, "Yet I will look again toward thy holy temple." Everything seems lost, and yet as long as a man can look to God nothing is lost. God cannot see him, so he thinks; yet he talks about looking toward God; this is singular, is it not? It is as if he said, "I am cast out of thy sight, and yet thou art the object of my sight." I do not know of a more gloomy sentence that human lips can speak than this—"I am cast out of thy sight." I do not know of a more hopeful resolution that the human heart can determine upon than this—"Yet I will look again toward thy holy temple." Oh, untried and inexperienced brother, be not at all disconcerted when you cannot comprehend yourself; on the contrary, take it as that there is a divine life within you when you become a mystery to yourself! If, like a school-boy, you can draw your own likeness on a slate with a piece of pencil, and can say, "This is all myself," why, then you will be rubbed out, and your image will be forgotten; but an immortal and divinely-inhabited spirit which is to survive sun, moon, and stars is not so readily sketched. While you are brother to the worm, and akin to corruption, you are nevertheless nearly related to Him that sitteth on the eternal throne. Vast regions of wonder-land lie between your condition as the abject prey of death and your position as an heir of God by Christ Jesus. Manhood is a great deep. I set it not side by side with the fathomless abyss of Godhead, but I know of nothing else which surpasses it.

Our text next leads me to observe that faith in the child of God, whatever may be his circumstances, still comes to the front. Here is Jonah in such a wretched condition that he says, "I am cast out of thy sight;" and yet, despite this, he declares, "Yet I will look again toward thy holy temple." The huge Atlantic wave comes rolling on, it sweeps not only over the feet and breast of faith, but it rises far above her head, and for the moment faith seems to be drowned. Wait an instant, and with her face ruddy from the wave and her locks streaming from the flood, faith lifts up her head again and cries, "Yet I will look again toward thy holy temple."

Faith in weakness makes us strong, in poverty makes us rich, and in death makes us live. Get a firm confidence in God, and you need not inquire what is going to happen—all must be well with you. Winding or straight, up hill or down dale, or through the fire or through the sea, if thou believest, thy road is the King's highway. If faith does not fail, nothing fails. Faith arms a man from head to foot with mail through which neither sword, nor spear, nor poisoned arrow can ever pierce. Though it be forged upon the anvil of the devil's greatest subtlety, no weapon can prosper against thee, O true believer! Thou art as safe as He in whom thou believest; for "He shall cover thee with His feathers, and under His wings shalt thou trust. His truth shall be thy shield and buckler."

If I might at this time help any child of God who is in trouble into a solid rest in God, I should be indeed delighted. Oh, that the ever-blessed Spirit would help me to that end! Carefully note, first, the verdict of sense—"I am cast out of thy sight;" and, secondly, the resolve of faith—"Yet I will look again toward thy holy temple." These, remember, were both found in one man at one time.

I. First, here is

THE VERDICT OF SENSE.

Please notice that it comes first in the text. Sense hurriedly decides, "I am cast out of thy sight." It is noteworthy that unbelief is always first to speak. Whenever David observes, "I said in my haste," you will notice that something is to be confessed which was unwise and untrue. Unbelief cannot wait, it must have its say; it blabs out all its silly soul at its earliest opportunity. In your own case, if you can be calm and patient you will speak to God's glory; but if you are hasty and petulant, and must needs talk as soon as ever the trial comes upon you, it is almost an absolute certainty that you will say what you will be glad to unsay. Our hasty words are often dipped in wormwood and handed back to us that we may eat them.

Hold thee still a while, my brother, or, if thou must speak, speak to thy God and not against Him; speak to thy God and not to thyself. Even if thou utter hasty words, and words of unbelief, they are better uttered in His presence than muttered within thine own heart. He will hear them in any case; but when He perceives that in thy spirit there is no guile, though much impatience, He will freely forgive thee all thy childish error of too hasty speech, and help thee to bear up under thy woe. Speak, for silence slays; but speak to God, for He is full of compassion. Take the warning of the text, however, and be slow to murmur, remembering that the carnal nature is ever swift to speak and sure to speak amiss.

This verdict of sense, in the next place, was apparently

VERY CORRECT.

"I said, I am cast out of thy sight." Did it not seem so? Jonah had tried to get away from God, and God had pursued him with a tempest, and almost broken the ship to pieces in order to be at him. As the result of the tempest he had been hurled into the sea, and in the sea a great fish had swallowed him, and he had been carried down till the floods compassed him about. Did not all his surroundings confirm his suspicion that he was a castaway? He reckoned with abundant show of reason that he must be cast out of God's sight. Yet it was not so; and therefore I invite those of you who have begun to judge your God by what you feel, and by what you see, to revise your judgment, and in future to be very diffident as to your power to come to any just conclusion as to God's dealings with you. Thank God, you will be wrong if you despair. It is much better for you to show your faith by relying on your God than to display your folly by saying, "I am cast out."

As this verdict of sense seems to be correct, Jonah must have felt that it was assuredly deserved. If the Lord had dealt with Jonah according to his sins, he would have been a cast-away. He had hurried to Joppa, and taken a passage in a ship to go to Tarshish, or anywhere else, to flee from the presence of God. Now, what was a fitter punishment for him than that he should be cast out from the sight of God? Had not this been his inquiry at Joppa, "Whither shall I go from thy Spirit?" Was not this his demand, "Whither shall I flee from thy presence?" If he had been driven away as an outcast, it had but been righteous retribution to a runaway who refused his Master's service. This must have made him doubly sorrowful; a guilty conscience is the sourest ingredient of all. When each wave howled in Jonah's ear, "You deserve it," he was in an evil plight indeed.

One sharp part of Jonah's misery was that God's hand was so evidently in his misery. He sees it and trembles. Observe how he ascribes all to God—"Thou hadst cast me into the deep, in the midst of the seas; and the floods compassed me about; all thy billows and thy waves passed over me." We can bear a blow from an enemy, but a wound from our best friend is hard. If the Lord Himself go forth against us, the war is one to tremble at. If the messenger of grief be commissioned by Jehovah Himself, and we know it, mere carnal reason concludes that all is over finally, and that henceforth all we can do is to sit down and die. Faith thinketh not so; but this is after the manner of flesh and sense.

Observe that this verdict of sense, "I am cast out from God," was VERY BITTER TO JONAH.

You can see by the way in which he speaks that it is a heavy burden to him, and yet it seems strange that it should be so. Here is a man who, when he was in a wrong state of heart, sought to flee from the presence of the Lord, and therefore went to the seacoast on purpose, rejoiced to find a ship bound for a distant and almost unknown land, and paid the fare to sail therein of set purpose that he might get away from God; and now that he thinks he is away from God, he is filled with horror and dismay. By this we know the children of God even at their worst estate. Oh, you that are the people of God, you may sometimes in your wilfulness wish that you could get away from the all-searching eye; but if you could do so it would be hell to you.

Thus I have brought out somewhat the force of this verdict of sense—"I am cast out of thy sight;" but I want you further to notice that

IT WAS NOT TRUE.

There was ground for grief, but not for this despairing inference. Poor Jonah! the mariners cast him out, but God did not; he was cast out of the ship, but not out of the sight of God. The Lord of old was faithful, and it was His rule never to cast away His people; even as David saith, "For the Lord will not cast off forever; but though He cause grief, yet will He have compassion, according to the multitude of His mercies." So that if ever you should be in a condition which seems to you quite as forlorn as that of this prophet in the midst of the sea, you may yet be sure that you are not cast off, nor cast out. He who says he is cast out, says more than can possibly be true; since the infallible promise is, "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out."

II. Follow me, dear friends, and may the Lord make it profitable to you, while I dwell during the rest of my time upon

THE RESOLVE OF FAITH.

Oh, that the Holy Ghost may work in us "like precious faith" with Jonah! "Yet," says Jonah, "even if I be cast out, yet I will look again toward thy holy temple." Jonah was a man of God when he was in his worst state of mind; at no time was the eternal life quite extinct within him. An ugly kind of saint this Jonah, when he was in the sulks! A proud, self-conscious, willful, and morose being, hard to love! Yet, as an oyster may bear a precious pearl within its rough shell, so did the harsh prophet contain, within his being, a priceless jewel of faith—faith eminent, prevalent, triumphant, faith of the highest degree.

This faith put him upon prayer. The chapter begins, "Then Jonah prayed unto the Lord his God out of the fish's belly." Jonah had not prayed when he went down to Joppa. He had taken the management of himself into his own hands, and referred nothing to God as to that rash voyage. How could he pray in such a temper? He paid his fare to go to Tarshish; he did not pray God's blessing on that expenditure, I am quite sure. When the sea began to work, and was tempestuous, he was in the sides of the ship, but he did not pray; no, he went to sleep. His conscience had become stupid, and seared as with a hot iron; there was no prayer in him, but a certain numbness of mind and lethargy of heart. And now he gets into the fish's belly, a very close, dead place, where one would think he would lie in a state of coma, or in a sort of fainting fit, if it were possible for him to live at all; yet there he begins to pray. He prays, and one of the surest evidences of a living faith is prayer. If thou canst not do anything else, thou canst pray, and if thou be a child of God thou wilt as surely pray as a man breathes or as a child cries; but thou canst not help it.

There is one thing about Jonah I want you particularly to notice, that as his faith made him pray, and made him pray to the Lord his God, his faith made him deal familiarly with holy Scripture. "What," say you; "how know you that?" He had but a small Bible compared with ours, but he had laid much of it up in his memory. Evidently he loved the Book of Psalms, for his prayer is full of David's expressions. Kindly look at Jonah's prayer. I think I am right in saying that there are no less than seven extracts from the Psalms in that prayer and its preface. A deep experience is bound to resort to Scripture for its expression. Human compositions suffice for surface work, but when God's waves and billows have gone over us, we quote a Psalm. When our soul fainteth within us, we are not to be revived by human songs, but we turn to the of inspiration. When a true child of God is in trouble, it is wonderful how dear the Bible becomes to him—ay, the very words of it. I say, the very words of it; for I care nothing about the scorn which attaches to a belief in "Verbal Inspiration." If the words are not inspired, neither is the sense, since there can be no sense apart from the words. My soul doth know what it is to hang her hope upon a single word of God; and to find her trust accepted. I would not even change the expression of our translation in many a place: not that I am bound by a translation, for God's original is that which we accept as infallible; but yet there are translations which are evidently accurate, for the Lord's own Spirit has made them unutterably dear to His saints. There are circumstances connected with the very words of many a text, and with God's dealing with us through those words, and in such instances we cling even to the English text with all our might.

I think you will find that tried saints are the most biblical saints. In summer weather we delight in hymns, but in winter's storms we fly to psalms. Your frothy professors quote Dickens or George Eliot, but God's afflicted quote David or Job. Those Psalms are marvellous. David seems to have lived for us all: he was not so much one man as Somewhere or other, the great circle of his experience touches yours and mine, and the Holy Ghost by David has furnished us with the best expressions which we can utter before the Lord in prayer.

ALL MEN IN ONE.

I desire to come close up to my text, while I bid you note that faith dares come to God with a "yet." Jonah said, "Yet I will look again toward thy holy temple." Faith in her worst circumstances trusts to God. Clog her, load her, shut her up, yet she looks to God alone. According to the Hebrew, the word should be rendered "only" instead of "yet"—"only I will look again toward thy holy temple." Faith looks to God only. Faith comes alone to her God, and seeks no company to keep her in countenance. When we were first saved it was by faith only, and we must be saved in the same way still. Be it ours to believe, to believe, and yet again to believe. Jonah looked again to the place where God revealed Himself, and we look to the person of the Lord Jesus Christ, in whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. He looked to the mercy-seat sprinkled with the blood of sacrifice, where the Lord was wont to pardon and bless all suppliant sinners, and we also look to Jesus as the great Propitiation. To this look we will add nothing as a ground of trust. Jesus only is our hope, and only will we look to Him. If you have lost some of your first light, look again; look toward His holy temple at once, and the light shall surely return to you.

Do you notice here that faith is driven to do according to her first acts—"Yet I will look again." You know faith is described in other ways beside looking; it is taking, grasping, possessing, feeding; but faith first of all is looking; and so, whenever you fall into grievous trouble, it will be wise to resort to the beginning of your confidence, and hold it fast to the end. If you cannot grasp, yet look. If thou canst not go forth to fight by faith, stand still and look by faith. If thou canst not declare the glory of the Lord, yet look. If thou canst not tell what God hath done for thee, yet keep thou still looking by faith to see what God will do for thee. Do thou thy first work, and as thy first work was a simple look at the Crucified One, look again to Him.

With this I shall close, urging dear friends here present, even if they forget all the rest of my text, to remember those two words,

"LOOK AGAIN."

If any of you are in sore trouble, I will bid you go home with only these two words ringing in your ears, "Look again!" If you did look once, but have fallen into new darkness, look again. I did look to Christ three and thirty years ago, or more; so did some of you. But the devil may say, "Your faith was fancy; your conversion was a delusion." Be it so, O Satan; we will not dispute with you, but we will begin again from this moment. It is such a mercy that faith does not need to grow old before it saves us; the faith born this moment saves the soul in its very birth.

Is it so, that your faith is not more than five minutes old, my brother? Have you only just begun to trust Christ? Well, thy faith hath saved thee quite as effectually as the faith of a man who has believed in Christ for fifty years. We must believe anew each day; yesterday's believing will not do for to-day. Let us now look to Jesus Christ upon the cross, and trust Him this morning as if we never trusted Him before.

A person proudly said the other day that he could no longer sing—

"I'm a poor sinner, and nothing at all,
But Jesus Christ is my all in all."

He had got beyond that! Hightly-tightly, here's a fine fellow! He has just risen from the dunghill, and is come to be a grand gentleman all at once! Nothing will do for him but—

"See the conquering hero comes, Sound the trumpets; beat the drums."

Alas, for the top-lofty hypocrite! Shame on the proud self-magnifier! If he did but know himself he would confess his nothingness with a deeper emphasis than ever, and he would, like the publican, cry, "God be merciful to me a sinner." I believe that as a child of God grows in sanctification he deepens in humility, and as he he sinks in his own esteem. Oh, that men would give over that bladder-blowing which seems to be so much admired in certain quarters! We have had much occasion to mourn over the lower life of some professors; but the higher life of others is not a bit better; it is false, proud, censorious, and unpractical.

Those who boast of perfection will have much to grieve over when once they come to their senses, and stand in truth before the living God. No man talks of living without sin till he is taken in the net of self-deception. I have walked with God for many years, and enjoyed the light of His countenance, but my experience is that I am this day obliged to take a far lower place before Him than ever I took before, while—

"Less than nothing I can boast,
And vanity confess."

Brethren, whether you will do so or not, I flee to the cross again. In the Rock of Ages I again hide myself. Who among us dares to come forth from that divine shelter? "Jesus, lover of our soul, let us to thy bosom fly." Let all of us sing as though it were for the first time—

"Just as I am—without one plea
But that thy blood was shed for me,
And that Thou bidd'st me come to Thee,
O Lamb of God, I come."

Dear friends, it is due to God, it is due to Christ, it is due to the Gospel, that we should every day believe with like simplicity of undivided trust. Keep on believing in Christ, "to whom coming as unto a living stone." We are to live by faith. You may be quite sure that you are permitted to do this, for Christ is always a sinner's Saviour. If you cannot come to Him as saints, come to Him as sinners. If your unfitness for fellowship as a servant comes before your mind and breaks your heart, yet remember that you may always return as a prodigal son. If you cannot feed in green pastures as sheep of the fold, yet yield to the strong hand of Him who seeketh the lost sheep. If you cannot come to Jesus as you should, yet come just as you are. If your garments are not clean, as they should be, yet come and wash them white in the blood of the Lamb.

This ought to be done more readily by us every day, for it should be to believe our God as experience proves His faithfulness. When we are at our worst let us trust with unshaking faith. Recollect that then is the time when we can most glorify God by faith. To trust Christ when thou hast a shallow sense of sin, when thy heart is glad and thy face is bright, is but a slender trusting Him; but to believe that He can cleanse thee when thy heart is black as hell, when thou canst not see one good trait in all thy character, when thou seest nothing but fault and imperfection about thine entire life, when all thine outward circumstances seem to speak of an angry God, and all thine inward feelings threaten thee with doom from His right hand—this is to believe indeed.

Let us believe though the trumpet sounds for judgment, and the great white throne is set in the open heaven! Wherefore should we doubt? The covenant confirmed by promise and by oath, and ratified with the blood of Jesus, places every believer under the broad shield of divine truth; and what cause can there be for fear? O my hearer, believest thou in Christ? Dost thou trust thy God? If thou canst stand to that, thou art not only a saved man, but thou already givest glory to God. So may He help thee to do. Amen.

THE LATE MR. WILLIAM TWEEDIE.

The late Mr. William Tweedie, the famous English publisher of Prohibition literature, was born at Haddingtonshire, Scotland, on July 19th, 1821. When nineteen years of age he signed the temperance pledge, and in 1848 acted for a few months as agent of a temperance association. The same year he found his way to London, where he opened a temperance depot, and made temperance truths familiar to the frequenters of the busy city. As a publisher Mr. Tweedie soon became widely known. Five years after his advent in the Strand Mr. Tweedie began the issue of the Weekly Record, afterward called the Temperance Record, which he continued to publish for nearly eight years, until the end of 1863, when he handed it over free of all charges to the committee of the National Temperance League. Had the establishment of the Record been the total of Mr. Tweedie's labors, that would have laid the movement under a lasting debt of gratitude to him. But Londoners know they did not end there. His office became a manufactory of teetotal weapons, and some of the best text-books in the science of teetotalism, as well as books which rank high in fiction, found daylight under his auspices.

But business proper occupied a comparatively insignificant portion of Mr. Tweedie's time. Before everything else he was a teetotaler, and anything likely to aid his favorite principle always commanded his earnest attention. In this spirit he assisted in forming the "Temperance Permanent Land and Building Society," of which he occupied the responsible position of chairman for nineteen years. He also became director of another and really valuable auxiliary, the "Temperance and General Provident Institution," a position he filled for twelve years. And the successful attempt to found the London Temperance Hospital found in him a wise counsellor and a zealous worker. He was a member of the hospital executive at the time of his death.

The society in which he took the deepest personal interest was the National Temperance League, which has charge of the Prohibition movement in England. In 1851 he was among the principal promoters of the London Temperance League, and when, by union with the National Temperance Society, in 1856, the former became the National Temperance League, Mr. Tweedie became one of its chief pillars. He was first one of the honorable secretaries, then became, and continued, a member of the executive until death called him home. In all the League's manifold efforts he bore an active and acceptable part.

As an advocate, Mr. Tweedie's services were in constant request. Directly he mounted the platform, his bright, intelligent eyes and cheerful face gained the attention of an audience. His words never removed the good impression. Clearly enunciated, well chosen and directly to the point, they gave his hearers the idea that they came not only freighted with the work of a mind well stored, but softened by the influence of a heart overflowing with earnest sympathy, and sensible of the great responsibilities which rested upon him. He based his appeals on the ground of Christian expediency, but no man could more clearly show the dangers of tippling and the manifold advantages of true sobriety.

Probably his best work was done privately. His great sagacity, clearness of perception far from common, and his conscientiousness made him the safe custodian of many a confession, which he only utilized in the giving of practical aid to any desirous of leading a changed life. Not a few large houses at the West End of London, peopled by aristocratic families, have been the scene of such labors, while in his own office words of wise counsel and touching sympathy have many a time brought repentance to an erring heart. But he did not confine his care to the lost. Young men coming from the country to London found in him a warm and faithful friend, ready to counsel, to direct, and, indeed, assist from his own well-drained purse. Rich in faithful labors, in the love of his wife, and the dutiful affection of his children, and cheered by the gratitude of many whom he had helped, Mr. Tweedie has passed into eternity, leaving his family to the watchful care of those in whose service his faithful life was spent.

One of his medical attendants writes: "At few death-beds have I ever been more strongly impressed with the conviction that the life which preceded must have been one not only of purity and blamelessness, but of active, energetic love. I shall ever cherish Mr. Tweedie's memory as an example of a life spent in unselfish devotion to the good of others."

Only a few days before his departure, when the reflected light of the unseen world was beaming upon his countenance, Mr. Tweedie was overheard to pray with great earnestness and fervor that God would raise up laborers, especially young men, to carry on the work of the Temperance reformation.

MR. WILLIAM HOYLE, The Temperance Statistician.

MR. HOYLE, whose portrait appears on this page, was born in the year 1831, in Rossendale, England, and, like many other self-made Lancashire men, had little school education. He began the struggle for bread as a half-timer in a cotton mill at eight years of age, and the other half of the day was spent at school. When thirteen years of age he was taken from school altogether, but he used to attend a night-school after his day's work was done. One who knew him then states that he was a diligent student, "and made considerable progress in mathematics," a science which he ardently loves, and in which his proficiency is evidenced in his speeches and printed works. He signed the pledge when fifteen years of age, and immediately commenced the study of the Temperance question in order to make himself useful in the work of extending temperance principles among the people by public discussion. His energy and his determination to educate himself in spite of all obstacles carried him to success not only in commercial, but in social life. He was often at work at his books at three in the morning, and as soon as he had finished his day's work he was again poring over educational volumes. In his twentieth year he removed with his father to Crawshawbooth, where they began business as cotton manufacturers. In 1859 Mr. Hoyle married, and removed to Tottington, near Bury, where the firm erected a new mill. Here he took a more conspicuous part in Temperance work, and devoted special attention to the economic aspect of the drink question.

An incident which occurred on Christmas Day, 1871, illustrates his manner of work. Mr. Hoyle thought he would like to go to the poor-house and see the paupers have their Christmas dinner. In one of the wards, where there were sixty or seventy men, he thought he recognized a face. He asked the man if he had not worked at Summerseat, on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway. He replied that he had. A voice was heard in another part of the room, "I worked there, sir, thirty years ago, and didn't we get lots of brass." A third man, holding his hand to his mouth as if drinking, said, "It's that that brings us here, sir." Mr. Hoyle then addressed the paupers, dwelling on the fact that the men who acknowledged they were earning lots of money thirty years before were then dependent upon the ratepayers for food to keep them from starving. He told them that thirty years before he lived at Summerseat, he was a poor lad earning wages worth thirty-six pence a week, but he had never spent a penny in any kind of intoxicating drink or tobacco, or wasted his time at the corners of the streets, or gazing at the bottoms of pewter pots, and, consequently, by God's blessing, he had now become a large employer of labor.

He is an ardent advocate of Prohibition, and was one of the contributors to a fund of $300,000 raised in 1871 to promote the cause. His donation on that occasion was $5000, and he has since subscribed $2500 annually to the same cause. In reply to a friend who expostulated with him on gifts so lavish, which must seriously cripple him in providing for his own family, he said: "I would much rather leave my children penniless in a country without liquor-shops than leave them a great fortune as things are; a good share of my income shall therefore go toward this great movement."

Mr. Hoyle is well and widely known as a writer on economic questions. His best-known work is "Our National Resources, and How They Are Wasted," which has gone through many editions. His papers read at the Social Science Congresses, and before other societies, have all been published, and have had a large circulation. One of his papers, read before the Manchester Statistical Society, in 1876, attracted a good deal of attention. It discussed "The Prospects of the Prohibition Movement." Every year, as soon as the government returns are published, Mr. Hoyle sends to the newspapers a letter commenting on the figures, with the view of impressing the people with his conviction that the way out of national depression, and the way to raise the poor out of their poverty, is to absolutely prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. In his letter on the statistics of 1883 he showed that in that year $631,256,795 had been spent in the United Kingdom for intoxicating liquors. Mr. Hoyle is a prominent vegetarian.

A Search for a Lost Diamond.

THE LOST DIAMOND.

(See Illustration.)

THE incident depicted in the illustration on this page has been frequently described by Mr. J. B. Gough and other earnest workers in the cause of religion and temperance as a type of their work. A lady's brougham stopped in a dirty city street; the door was opened, and a lady stepped to the sidewalk. As she did so, something fell and rolled on the roadway. There was a momentary glitter as a precious stone shone in the sunlight, and then there was nothing of it to be seen. But the lady knew what had fallen. A valuable diamond ring had slipped off her finger when she took off her glove, and it was that which had shone on the paving-stones. Her eyes followed its course until it rolled into the gutter.

The gutter was one of those wide and deep ones which are needed in quarters where manufacturing and butchers' markets are numerous, and even its capacity is often fully tested. A torrent of liquid filth disgusting to eye and nostrils poured along it on its way to the common sewer, and into that tide of abominations rolled the precious circle of gold and jewels.

"I saw her," says Mr. Gough, "prodding about among the mud and filth with her delicate parasol, trying to fish up the ring, but without avail. She could not recover the ring in that way. But she did not mean to lose it. Boys and men were watching her with amusement, but she did not care. Turning up her dress sleeve and the costly laces and ruffles that covered her shapely white arm, down went the white arm into the filthy abomination, and she felt about until her fingers grasped the gem. She held it up daintily, and I could not help laughing to see her shake off the mud and go into a store near by to get her arm cleaned."

The lesson is obvious. In the degradation, the moral filth of society, there are God's jewels, made in His image, whom Satan has cast there by his fiendish cunning. Drunkenness and vice of other kinds covers them, and will carry them away to the bottomless pit if no one rescues them. What is the worth of a single soul? Who can estimate its value? The lady knew the value of her lost diamond, and counted that contact with noxious filth a price well paid to recover it. Should the Christian shrink from contact with moral corruption if by the ordeal he can snatch a priceless soul from destruction? It is no pleasant task to go into the haunts of vice to reach the drunkard and "the strange woman," but they are worth saving even at that cost. All honor to those devoted men and women who are doing it every night in our midst, telling the wanderer and those whom Satan has bound of One who died to save them and to break hell's chains. They need our prayers and our moral and pecuniary help for their encouragement and support. They need them now in this their hour of trial, but the day is coming when they will need them no longer, for they who "turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and ever" (Dan. 12:3).

as the stars forever and ever" (Dan. 12:3).

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

Return of the Fugitives.

THE young clergyman stood on the platform of the little railroad station the very personification of vexation and chagrin. He had come so far in such haste to find Hester and her father, and had arrived a few minutes too late. Where could they be going? Perhaps the knowledge that their hiding-place had been discovered was sending them to seek one more secure. They might still be lost to Carl as completely, or even more so, than they had been during those long months of baffled search.

"Is there nobody here that can speak English?" he exclaimed, pathetically. This was an utterly unforeseen crisis, full of difficulty and anxiety; at the moment he would have exchanged all his scholarly knowledge of dead languages for as good an acquaintance with colloquial French. "What was the train that had just disappeared bound for? Was it going to Paris, or was John Morley carrying away Hester to some still more obscure hiding-place than Equemontville? This last was possible, if he was not quite sane, and was unwilling to return to Little Aston. Or perhaps they intended to go back to Equemontville. The driver of the diligence very probably knew that, and where they had taken tickets for; but how could he communicate with him? He was too deeply absorbed in these reflections to care very greatly for the breathless spectators about him, each one of whom seemed afraid he should miss some eccentricity of the Englishman's behavior.

"How do ye do?" said a voice at Carl's side, dwelling long upon the first word and running the other three into one. He turned quickly round, and saw a bright but sorrowful face, with black hair drawn tight from it, and confined by a pretty little white cap. The eyes meeting his were dark, and smiled with a somewhat anxious expression, as the speaker awaited the effect of her salutation.

"Thank heaven, you can speak English!" exclaimed Carl, fervently, taking the little woman's hand eagerly into his, and looking down upon her with a flush of gladness upon his embarrassed face.

"How do ye do?" she inquired again, with greater confidence.

"Oh, quite well, thank you!" said Carl, rapidly. "I want to know where your train is going to."

He pointed down the line, where the last streak of smoke was quickly vanishing, and she followed the direction of his finger with her bright eyes, but there was an expression of uneasiness in them.

"I you no comprehends no," she said, shaking her head anxiously; "how do ye do?"

"I want to know," persisted Carl, "if that train is going to Paris."

He pronounced the word Paris well enough for her to understand it, and she caught at it quickly. But he had come direct from there, and could not wish to return, she thought.

He continued pointing down the line, and repeating his question, "Is it going to Paris?"

"No, no," she answered, shaking her head emphatically, and afterward waving her hand comprehensively about the surrounding country, "non, non; pas à Paris."

The audience were enjoying this unintelligible interview with great zest; but Carl's hope had perished altogether. Hester was lost to him at the very time he had expected to find her. He sighed a heavy sigh of vexation and perplexity; but he could not help smiling at the solicitude of the little Frenchwoman, who looked into his face with an air of disappointment.

"How do ye do?" she repeated, with a desire to afford him a forlorn comfort by her knowledge of his language.

He answered only by another troubled smile, and broke through the circle surrounding him. There was a time-table near the window of the ticket office, and by dint of profound and repeated study Carl made sure that there was no train to Paris stopping at the little station until the same hour the next day. He pointed it out to his new friend, and made her understand that he must return to Paris by that train. In the mean time she took him into her charge, and conducted him to a hotel, where he was entertained with the utmost hospitality and curiosity. But he was too fully occupied with anxious thoughts concerning John Morley and Hester to be conscious either of kindness or inquisitiveness. His anxiety grew almost intolerable before the moment came when he seated himself in the train which was to convey him back to Paris.

John Morley and Hester were going home gladly, yet with a solemn gladness, for a dark shadow fell across the future. The thought of Rose was upon both their hearts. How could they meet her? In what relationship could she stand to them in the future?

Human nature is seldom, if ever, able to attain the full measure and perfection of forgiveness. John Morley examined himself, and found that he was not capable of it. He was careful in his self-scrutiny, and did not spare himself. Looking into his heart, he knew that he still loved his sinful wife. If the means of avenging the wrong against him lay ready to his hand, he would not punish her. By neither act nor word nor look would he show that he resented all the misery he had suffered at her hands. So far she was forgiven. But John Morley was accustomed to try himself by the highest standard,

"Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive."

How many times had he uttered those words? Yet he dare not utter them now. The forgiveness he craved for himself was a forgiveness which included the blotting out of the sin. He knew that nothing short of being taken back into his Father's heart would content him. And that forgiveness he could not yet extend to his wife. What, then, was he to do in regard to her? Could they live in the same house on such terms? Must she go away to live out her days in solitary, useless remorse? He could not say.

Even Hester felt the terrible weight and difficulty of the decision. She clung more closely to her father in this time of conflict, and scarcely gave Carl a thought as they were passing through London. John Morley left all the arrangements of their journey to her; and she, with the intolerance of suspense natural to her years, would not stop for rest on the way. But both of them shrank from the idea of being recognized at Little Aston station; so they left the train about two miles from it, at a village where neither of them was known.

It was a soft, dark, soundless night of autumn, with no breeze abroad to rustle the dying leaves. The air was heavy and scented, with a languor in it which oppressed the spirits, and caused Hester to sigh often, with a painful and unquerable depression. All the silence and utter stillness, the muteness of the quiet hedgerows, where the birds uttered no sleepy chirp as they do in the spring and summer when a footfall disturbs them in their nests, the hush of the dark funeral trees which made no stir or murmur overhead; all this silence seemed ominous. She wanted a little whisper of welcome and encouragement. If her father had been indeed a murderer, skulking under the black shadows of the trees for concealment, there could not have been a more condemning hush and dumbness of all nature as he passed by. The sky above them was shrouded by one unbroken cloud, through which neither moon nor star looked down upon them. For a hundred yards or so a little wayside brook gurgled along their path with a pleasant and soothing babble, but it also soon forsook them, and turned aside into the meadows, leaving the road more cheerless by its desertion.

John Morley was silent too; but if Hester could have seen his face she would have been alarmed at the strong passions which furrowed it. This was the walk he had most often taken with Rose; in those early days when he was lavishing a wealth of love upon her, and when he believed himself beloved again, because her treacherous blue eyes had been bent upon him, dewy with a feigned and false tenderness. Every step was bringing him nearer his home, and nearer her presence in his house. Even now he could have turned and fled again—fled back to that pleasant and sunny valley in Burgundy, where no man knew his dishonor. But Hester was by his side, though he was but half conscious of her nearness, and had but a vague sense of his complete wretchedness without her. It was when they came in sight of the town-lamps, and their own street lay before them, that he arrested his steady step for an instant, and lifted her hand reverently to his lips, murmuring, "God bless you, my daughter."

The chapel stood at their left hand, and Hester drew her father into the shadow of its great portico, where she had found Rose homeless and friendless. They stood behind the pillars, hand pressed in hand, pausing for a little while before making the last stage of their journey. Opposite to them, in the garret where Lawson and his mother lived, there twinkled the faint glimmer of a candle in the uncurtained window, which was too high to be overlooked.

"Father," whispered Hester, pressing his hand more warmly, "let me go and get Lawson's key, and then we can enter our home without going in at the house door. You can turn into your own room, while I see where she is. It is late, and she may be already asleep; or she may be gone back to the old nursery. You need not see her to-night. Take some rest first, and you will feel better."

John Morley answered only by releasing her hand, and she left him in the chapel portico. Very quick but softly she mounted the familiar staircase, and pushed open the door of the garret. Lawson was alone, leaning back in a large old chair, and looking very ill and worn. His dark eyes burned under his gray eyebrows, and his hollow cheeks were of an ashy paleness; his hair was grayer and his eyes redder and more sunken than when she had seen him last. She had advanced half way across the room before he perceived her entrance.

"Miss Hester!" he cried, in a tone of terror. "Yes; it is Hester, dear old Lawson," she said; "Hester come back, and her father. He is waiting outside for me. I am come here for your key, so that we may get in home without letting anybody know."

"She is there," he answered, in a hoarse and hollow voice.

"We know it," said Hester; "I think I know all about it, Lawson. There is nobody in the world who knows it all as I do. You used to love me very dearly, and my mother too. But oh, how could you be so cruel, so wicked! See what sorrow it brought upon me! I think I should almost have died of home-sickness, if we had not known soon that we could come home safely."

She uttered her reproaches in a tender yet penetrating tone; and Lawson laid his palsied head upon the table before him, groaning bitterly. He made no attempt to answer her; but when he lifted his face for an instant to look at her, she was shocked at its expression of suffering and despair.

"Are you ill, dear old Lawson?" she asked.

"I have my medicine here," he answered, tapping a small box which lay close to his hand. "I cannot stay now," she said; "my father is waiting for me. I see the key is hanging up in its old place. Good-by, Lawson. Come down and see me alone in the morning; alone, you know."

She lingered for a minute to see if he would look up, or speak to her once more; but he did not, and she hurried away and out in the street again to her father.

They walked down the quiet street side by side, and in silence, for their hearts were too full for speech now. Their tread was hushed and measured, as though they formed part of a funeral procession. On either hand the tall houses were dark and full of gloomy shadows, which moved fitfully as they passed by in the flickering light of the few and feeble lamps. The strip of sky overhead was breaking into a multitude of small clouds, and the moon, which was on the wane, looked down with a pale and hurried gleam through the rifts before the clouds closed speedily again over its mournful face.

Their steps, slow before, slackened as they drew nearer to their old home, and stopped altogether as they stood opposite to it, looking up to its dark gables traced against the obscure sky. Of all who had ever gazed at the decayed and dingy dwelling, none had ever looked with such eyes as theirs. A shiver passed through them both, as if some deadly miasma had breathed upon them from the deserted and dishonored house. Yet it was their home, the only home Hester had ever known; the home to which John Morley had brought her mother, and that second wife of his, who had disgraced it by her sin. They stood opposite to it, two dark shadows in the gloom, scarcely daring to venture across the narrow street and invade the solemn solitude, if solitude indeed were there, of the empty house.

"Come," said Hester at last, grasping her father's hand again, and leading him like a child across the street. The door by which Lawson entered his workroom was gained by an outer staircase, like that leading to the nursery, and it brought them on to the second floor of the building. Hester unlocked it and threw it open, a damp, cold, earthy air greeting them. The darkness was unbroken blackness within; but there was no danger that they should stumble upon the floor their feet had trodden so often. Yet John Morley stood within the closed door, rooted and immovable, while Hester found Lawson's match-box and kindled a light. She came back to him and looked into his face. It had quite lost its new-born air of resolve and strength; and he stood with his head drooping once more, and his shoulders bowed, an old and decrepit man. She put both her arms fondly about his neck, and forced him to look at her.

"Have we done wrong in returning here?" she asked. "Do you feel sorry we came back?"

"No, no," he answered; "we have done well. It is but a passing paroxysm, a dread which is almost over. In a minute or two I shall be myself again. I will go to my own room, Hester."

He put his arm through hers, and leaned heavily upon it as she led him across the empty workrooms. They found the door into the house unfastened, though a bolt was upon it which had never been there in their time. It opened at one end of the long, dark passage which ran in a straight line through the middle of the house. At the other end was the door of Rose's drawing-room, standing wide open, and sending a broad, bright stream of light into the darkness. Almost involuntarily Hester extinguished her candle, and drew her father's arm more closely through her own, thinking to gain his room unseen. But John Morley did not stir, and she could catch, in the glimmer which reached them, the flashing of his eyes as he gazed steadily into the lighted room. There was the sound of a footfall passing to and fro on the carpeted floor, but no one came into sight; and after a minute or two John Morley whispered into his daughter's ear.

"I must see her," he said; "let us go forward softly. Even if she discovers me here, I must see her this night."

IMPENDING DANGER.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 25, Acts 21: 1-14. Golden Text, ver. 14. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

A Reluctant Parting—Finding a Ship—An Unknown City—The Message of the Tyrian Disciples—Apparent Contradictions—His Habit of Referring Difficulties—God's Direct Teaching—Another Parting—The Journey Continued—In Philip's House—Woman's Place in the Early Church—The Warning of Agabus—Entreaties of Companions—Paul's Answer—A Common Folly.

It was not easy for Paul and his little company of followers to leave Miletus and its gathering of Ephesian elders. "After we were gotten from them" expresses very fully how loath the parting was on both sides. "After we had gotten from them, and had launched, we came with a straight course unto Coos, and the day following unto Rhodes, and from thence unto Patara. Nothing is told us about the ship in which this voyage was taken; who knows whether it was not the property of some one of Paul's Philippian converts? But travelling in those days was quite another thing from traveling as we know it. There were neither railways, steamships, nor regular conveyances of any description. Paul had to trust God to provide a ship which should sail in the direction he was taking, as much as for any other thing in the life of dependence upon God to which he was called. Finding a ship [evidently an ordinary trading ship] sailing over into Phœnicia, we went aboard, and set forth."

The ship was bound for Tyre, and there the little company landed, and found disciples. How, in an unknown city, would this be? Paul how to trust God about everything; he, however much he might be at a loss, God was so; and thus he put everything into God's hands, the finding of a ship to carry him, the finding of disciples to whom he might have a message from God—all was part of the life which he both taught and lived. "Be careful for nothing; but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4: 6, 7).

For seven days the little missionary party remained in Tyre—days, no doubt, of great blessing to the Tyrian church, which witnessed for the Lord in the midst of the merchant city, full of worldliness, as described in Ezekiel 27. Some of the Tyrian disciples said to Paul, through the Spirit, that he should not go up to Jerusalem. The apostle had before this experienced what seemed at first sight

CONTRADICTORY GUIDANCE.

"Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature" might, to a captious mind, seem warrant enough to disobey the Spirit when He forbade him to preach the Word in Asia, and when He would not suffer him to go into Bithynia. Paul knew how to refer difficulties to the Lord, without attempting to reason them out himself, and thus he was "led of the Spirit," although very likely he could no more have reduced the guidance he understood to a science than we can. He had purposed in the Spirit to go to Jerusalem (Acts 19: 21), and had testified that he went bound in the Spirit unto Jerusalem (Acts 20: 22); now disciples said to him through the Spirit, that he should not go there. What was the lesson to him? Surely this, to follow the leading which he understood, and not to be a servant of men. As a rule, God guides His people directly, not through a second party. And if light on our path should come through a second party, it is not safe to follow it until it has been confirmed between God and our own souls. One who walks with God understands Him better than any other, and when anything spoken in the Spirit contradicts God's guidance to him, he does not attempt to explain it to others, but just follows what he himself understands of the Spirit's teaching.

Here was another parting: the whole church, men, women and children, turned out, following the missionaries to the sea-side, where they held a meeting in the open air. "We kneeled down on the shore, and prayed," God was everywhere in the eyes of the simple believers. And, blessed be His name, the place of prayer is wherever a needy one is found; the place of praise wherever one of His children recognizes God. It was just this commending of one the other to the Lord which made parting easy. "And when we had taken our leave one of another, we took ship; and they returned home again," we did the will of God, and they too. From Tyre the travellers came to Ptolemais, where they spent one day with the brethren, necessarily unannounced, but doubtless one of conference, prayer, and praise.

From Tyre they went to Cæsarea, "And we entered into the house of Philip the evangelist, which was one of the seven; and abode with him. And the same man had four daughters, virgins, which did prophesy."

Shortly after his conversion Paul had been at Cæsarea (Acts 9: 30), and Philip, who had gone to that city when God took him away from the scene of his labors at Samaria (Acts 8: 40), was probably well known to him. Oh, how much these two men of God would have to tell one another of God's wondrous revelations to them and of His grace and power in the conversion and building up of thousands of souls! Both of them were men very full of the Spirit, both were ready to co-operate with any others—men or women—whom the Spirit used. Paul was always surrounded by his beloved sons in the faith—Timothy, Titus, Luke, Trophimus, Epaphroditus, and others. And he mentions again and again as his helpers in Christ Jesus fellow-workers Aquila, and Priscilla, Phœbe, a succorer of many, Tryphena and Tryphosa, who labor in the Lord, and many others, both "those women who labored with me in the Gospel," "Clement also, and other my fellow-laborers, whose names are in the book of life." Paul knew and taught that in Christ Jesus "there is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal. 3: 28). And Philip had been taught by the same Spirit, therefore we are not surprised to find "that the same man had four daughters, virgins, which did prophesy."

There is no doubt that in the early church the Spirit of God made use of men and women equally to proclaim the blessed tidings of salvation, to prophesy—i.e., to speak unto men, "to edification, and exhortation, and comfort" (1 Cor. 14: 3). Men were appointed to the care of churches as bishops and pastors, but women, equally with them, exercised the gifts of the Spirit. The early church had its elders,

BOTH MEN AND WOMEN

(1 Tim. 5: 1, 2); there were "fathers" of the church and "mothers" too. With the loss of power in the church of Christ has come also the prejudice against God's testimony through women. In our day, with a revival of primitive power, has come also a door open more to the ministry of women in directly spiritual work. "The wind bloweth where it listeth." It is, in a meeting, the Spirit of God impels a woman to deliver a message which He has given her, the blessing will be hindered if she is not permitted to deliver it. We have yet much to learn about following the Spirit and being led of Him, instead of superintending and limiting the Holy Ghost.

Paul was in no hurry to leave Cæsarea, "we tarried there many days." Meanwhile "there came down from Judea a certain prophet named AGABUS."

And when he was come unto us, he took Paul's girdle, and bound his own hands and feet, and said, Thus saith the Holy Ghost, So shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle, and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles." This was no news to Paul. In every city the Holy Ghost had witnessed that bonds and afflictions awaited him; but none of those things moved him, and now the prophecy of Agabus did not move him. He had received his directions, and he abode by them, come what might.

His friends were moved; Luke, speaking for himself and for them, said: "When we heard these things, both we and they of that place, besought him not to go up to Jerusalem. Why was this? They looked at the circumstances, and not at God. God had not said to Paul, 'Thou shalt not go up to Jerusalem,' but had only shown him at what a cost his journey would be. Paul had counted the cost, and was decided. He saw the grace of God to sustain him, while they were looking at the human side." Paul answered, What mean ye to weep and to break mine heart? for not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus. And when he would not be persuaded, we ceased, saying, The will of the Lord be done. Oh, how often children of God have hindered one the other by themselves taking care of them rather than committing them to God! "You ought not to take that meeting; you know you are not strong enough," is so often said. What is the will of the Lord? He sends us no warfare on our own charges. But, says one, "so and so overworked herself before, and such and such consequences followed; she must not be allowed to do the same again." Then, dear anxious one, trust the Lord to prevent her, and take your hands off. None of Paul's friends loved him as the Lord loved him. Paul and his Lord understood one another, and Jesus was quite equal to take all the care of Paul which the circumstances demanded. As soon as they saw he was steadfast in his God, they saw that he was in the will of God, and acquiesced, saying, "The will of the Lord be done."

In almost every religious household in this land, and in the majority of those in Europe, honor is paid to the name of the lady whose portrait this week adorns the first page of this journal. Smiles and tears have come on a hundred thousand faces as the pages of "Stepping Heavenward," "Little Susy's Six Birthdays," "The Flower of the Family," "The Story Lizzy Told," and many other books from her pen have been turned by readers, young and old. How deep a debt of gratitude the world owes for those books none can tell. They have delighted, interested, amused, comforted, and encouraged the children of God under varied circumstances, and they have been blessed, as their writer hoped they would be, to the spiritual help and advancement of a multitude of souls.

Apart from their distinctly religious tendency—though Mrs. Prentiss never regarded them as apart from it—their is far beyond the common standard. The children who look at us from her pages are real flesh and blood. Her heroes and heroines are not prodigies, angelic or fiendish; they are the men and women we meet with in our daily life—natural, fallible, with real cares and real troubles—in short, our brethren and sisters, whom we know and can love. Mrs. Prentiss frankly said she knew no other kind. When the Perfectionists explained their doctrines to her she quietly said she had never met any one without faults, and until she did meet them she declined to believe that any such perfect people existed. She drew characters from the life, and it is the marvellous fidelity, the naturalness of her creations which have given her books their wondrous charm. But we need to go still deeper to find so remarkable. Mrs. Prentiss, in a letter to an intimate friend, revealed the secret. She said: "I never sat down to write without first praying that I might not be suffered to write anything that would do harm, and that, on the contrary, I might be taught to say what would do good." Those who write for fame and those who write for wealth may think this mode of preparing for literary composition a strange one; but those who write "to do good" can find no better way of achieving the object than that adopted by Mrs. Prentiss. It may be that if some of our ablest writers had so commenced each day's work, with prayer for guidance, some pretentious books would never have found their way into type, but our literature would have been purer and more helpful.

The reader of the books Mrs. Prentiss gave to the world, fancies he catches glimpses of her in each of them. More than one mother who has passed through a trying ordeal, and has afterward read some words from the pen of Mrs. Prentiss, has said: "That woman has suffered as I have; she could not have so accurately told the sorrowful story if she had not." To some extent this is true; her life was one of physical suffering almost continuous from cradle to grave, and she more frequently than most mothers was called to endure that bitterest of all pains to a sympathetic nature, that of seeing her beloved children suffer and die, and she unable to save them. Nevertheless, her whole history appears in none of her own works. She never drew herself exactly, and the thousands of those who fancied they did know her in some exquisitely sketched heroine of one of her books will be surprised as they gain authentic knowledge of her life and character. Happily such knowledge has been imparted. Her husband, who fully appreciated her, who watched her in loving admiration in joy and sorrow, in sickness and in health, in public and in private, has gained pathetic solace in his bereaved loneliness by writing a biography of her* so faithful and so discriminating, yet withal so affectionate that all who read it lay it beside her own works as the key and explanation of them. To that beautiful conjugal tribute we are indebted for the information we here place in the possession of our readers.

THE FAMILY

to which Mrs. Prentiss belonged traces its origin back to a source which she knew how to value. Two hundred and fifty years ago the good ship Hopewell carried among its passengers who were flying from the tyranny of the despicable Stuart, King Charles I., of England, a young man named Edward Payson and a girl, Mary Eliot, the sister of John Eliot, "the Apostle of the Indians." The two became acquainted on the voyage, and were afterward married. Their descendants to the fifth generation were all renowned for their piety, and many of them for their brilliant talents. Dr. Edward Payson, their lineal descendant, who was born in 1783, was the pastor of a church at Portland, Me., for twenty years. It was his first charge, and though repeatedly invited to more lucrative pastorates in New York and Boston, he remained faithful to his early friends at Portland until his death. There, on October 26th, 1818, his daughter Elizabeth was born.

She was the fifth child God had given to the good pastor and his wife, and the father quaintly notes in a letter to his mother that six special blessings, duly enumerated, crowned the happy event. The child grew up with that highly strung which her father possessed in a marked degree. A dark-eyed, delicate little creature, of sylph-like form, reserved and shy in the presence of strangers, she had a sweet disposition, and was very intense in her sympathies. So marked was this last trait, and so prominent was it as she grew into girlhood, that her father said, "She will be in danger of marrying a blind man or a helpless cripple out of pure sympathy." She was, nevertheless, full of childish vivacity, in her movements light-footed, venturesome to rashness, and at times wild with fun and frolic. But her intensity was the trait every one who knew her was most impressed with. Whatever she felt, whatever she did, she felt and did as for her life.

It was a character needing the watchful care of a father for its development, but at the early age of nine years the child was deprived of the advantages of paternal love and tenderness. Dr. Payson died in 1827, and his widow and her young family had to face the world alone. Happily the widow knew the widow's God, and she gave herself and her children into His care, and, trusting in Him, was not dismayed. She removed to New York, where her eldest daughter, Louisa, a singularly gifted lady, who afterward became the wife of Professor Albert Hopkins, of Williams College, opened a school for girls. It was during this sojourn in New York that Elizabeth, then a child of twelve years, was converted, and the widow had the happiness of seeing this her youngest child at the Bleeker Street Presbyterian Church. Two years later they returned to Portland, Me., where another girls' school was opened, which eventually became very successful. Elizabeth was the life of the home, and while she studied with unremitting energy to qualify herself for the position of

she gave her hours of leisure to the cheering and helping of her mother. She remained at home until her twenty-first year, when she accepted an appointment in the school of Mr. Persico, of Richmond, Va. The day of parting to one so sensitive was naturally a most trying one. It was rendered doubly painful to herself and her family by a short but intense period of physical agony, which the violence of her mental agitation produced. The physicians said it was angina pectoris, but whatever it may have been it was the prelude to many such attacks, which rendered her subsequent life one of frequent illness.

Two characteristic extracts from her letters from Richmond will show how her inner and outward life were being passed. She wrote to her cousin a day or two after her arrival: "I have trembled ever since I came here at the host of new difficulties to which I am exposed. Surely, I did again and again ask God to decide the question for me as to whether I should leave home or not, and believed that He had chosen for me. It certainly was against my own inclinations." It was a very pathetic and significant confession, truly Abrahamian in tone. The young girl, timid, shy, and sensitive went from Maine to Virginia against her own inclinations, simply because she believed that God had chosen the course for her. All too few are the men and women who so seek to know God's will, and obey it, rather than follow their own inclinations.

A STAMMERING CHILD

is the subject of the second of the two extracts referred to. She wrote: "This morning I had a new scholar, a pale, thin little girl, who stammers, and when I spoke to her, and she was obliged to answer, the color spread over her face and neck as if she suffered the utmost mortification. I was glad when recess came, I drew her close to my side and to tell her that had a friend afflicted in the same way, and that consequently, I should know how to understand and pity her. She held my hand fast in her and the tears came stealing down one after another as she leaned confidently on my shoulder and I could not help crying too. What a beautiful picture! It would seem that Dr. Payson had much insight when he thought his daughter might marry a blind man out of pure sympathy. The stammering child was one of many afflicted ones who in after years held her hand clasped in theirs and saw those beautiful dark eyes suffused with tears for their sufferings. It is not surprising to read of the little children that Richmond school putting their arms around her neck, as one neglected child did, and saying 'There is one in this house who loves me I know.'"

After one year in Richmond she returned home. The work had been a drain on her vital powers, pleasant and successful as it had been and she needed rest. Beside this, a strong spiritual conflict, a time of severe suffering of soul had weakened her. Satan had taken advantage of some theological teaching presented to her, suggested doubts to her own heart whether she did, after all, love the Saviour in very truth. Happily, she came out of the battle triumphant but with a body never very strong, weakened by hours of sleeplessness and mental torture. Three months were spent at home with her beloved mother and sisters, and then, at the urgent request of her Richmond friends, she returned to her duties there. One of the incidents of this second sojourn in the South was ceremony, which she thus described: "We had a black wedding in my schoolroom the other night, our colored cook having decided to take to herself a lord and master. It was the funniest affair I ever saw. Such comical dresses! So many heaps of cake, wine, coffee, and candy! So many kisses and huggings! The man who performed the ceremony prayed that they might obey each other, wherein I think he showed originality and good sense, too. Then he had a book upside down and pretended to read, he knows what! but Mrs. Persico laughed so loud when he said, 'Will you take this wo-man to your wedded husband?' that we all joined full chorus, whereupon the poor priest (who was only the sexton of St. James's) was so confused that he married them over twice. I never saw a couple in their station in life provided with a tenth part of the luxuries with which they abounded. We worked all day Saturday in the kitchen, making and icing cake for them, and a nice frolic we had of it, too."

Financial troubles in the following year necessitated the breaking up of the Richmond school, and on July 18th, 1843, Miss Payson bade adieu to Richmond. Two months of quiet, restful happiness she spent at home, and then the entries in the diary she kept suddenly ceased. She gives no reason for the cessation, but Mr. Prentiss explains it by saying: "September 11th she marked with a white stone, and kept ever after as one of the chief festal days of her life." It is not difficult to follow the clue so given, for on April 16th, 1845, Miss Elizabeth Payson the beloved wife of the Rev. George L. Prentiss, the newly-ordained pastor of a church at New Bedford, Mass. A very happy, useful life was that of the young wife in her new sphere. A nature so gentle and affectionate could not fail to find in the life of a pastor's wife innumerable opportunities for congenial work. That she devoted herself to them with the old intensity there is abundant evidence. In 1851 Mr. Prentiss accepted the charge of the Mercer Street Presbyterian Church, in New York City, and thither the pastor and his wife and their two children removed. A third child was born to them, but before many months had passed there were two gaps in the little household.

BECAME MRS. PRENTISS,

A GATHERED FLOWER

was the similitude under which the death of one child—"the Ernest" of "Stepping Heavenward"—is described in the Christian mother's diary. She wrote: "'Oh,' said the gardener, as he passed down the garden walk, 'who plucked that flower?' His fellow-servants answered, 'The Master.' And the gardener answered his peace." It would be difficult to imagine a more tender, suggestive passage in modern literature than that simple entry, so characteristic of the woman who wrote it.

When the second child was called away the mother's heart was well-nigh broken, but the Christian overcame by the power of the Saviour. The following lines, written immediately after the second bereavement, show the spirit in which she suffered:

"I thought that prattling boys and girls
Would fill this empty room;
That my rich heart would gather flowers
From childhood's opening bloom.
One child and two green graves are mine,
This is God's gift to me;
A bleeding, fainting, broken heart—
This is my gift to thee."

In her younger days, before going to Richmond, Mrs. Prentiss had frequently written verses and short sketches which had appeared in a Boston journal; but after going South she had written nothing for publication. In 1853, however, after thirteen years of literary inactivity, she produced

HER FIRST BOOK,

"Susy's Six Birthdays." "It was composed," says her husband, "with the utmost rapidity. In about ten days the work was finished. Upon its publication it was at once recognized as a work of real genius, inimitable of its kind, and neither the popular verdict nor the verdict of the children as to its merits has ever changed." In 1854 appeared the next work, "The Flower of the Family," which was translated by admirers in the respective countries into French and German. This was followed the next year by another book, "Henry and Bessie." From that time onward her pen was seldom idle.

A VISIT TO EUROPE

rendered the year 1858 a memorable one to her. The enfeebled health of Dr. Prentiss rendered absolute rest and change of scene imperative. He therefore resigned his charge, and went with his family to Switzerland. Mountain air and mountain climbing (see frontispiece) did much to restore the health of the devoted pastor and his wife. They passed two years on transatlantic shores, visiting France and England on their way home. In London Dr. and Mrs. Prentiss went the usual round of the sights familiar to American tourists, and Mrs. Prentiss wrote home interesting letters of description. One of them narrates a visit to Hyde Park, where she stood on a camp-stool for hours to see the Queen and Prince Albert review the Volunteers (see frontispiece); but the pageant and the sight of royalty do not appear to have lessened her love for the simple grandeur of the republican government of her own beloved country. On September 24th, 1860, she and her husband and children were glad to set foot once more in New York.

A NEW SPHERE

of Christian work soon opened before them. A part of the Mercer Street Church were anxious, in view of the general movement up-town, to establish a congregation in a more suitable locality. This, after some delays incident to the sad national events of those years, was accomplished. The congregation met temporarily in hired buildings under the ministry of Dr. Prentiss until 1865, when the Church of the Covenant was built on Park Avenue. In all that troublous time, and in the labors connected with it and with the formation of the new church, Mrs. Prentiss, though in feeble health and tried with many bereavements, was a right hand to her husband. But throughout, her labors with her pen continued, book after book being written and finding eager readers.

In 1869 "Stepping Heavenward," the best known of all the works Mrs. Prentiss wrote, was published. Its sale surpassed that of any of her other works. In America alone 70,000 copies were quickly sold, and those in England, France, Germany, and Australia could not be counted. Two other works—"The Story Lizzie Told" and "Urbane and His Friends"—successively appeared, and both had an immense circulation.

A MARVELLOUS ESCAPE

of Dr. and Mrs. Prentiss from a dreadful death was an incident during those years which was never forgotten by either of them. They had found it necessary to establish a small country retreat, where they could go occasionally to recuperate, and the place selected was Dorset, Vt. During one of their sojourns there they visited some friends at East Dorset, and were returning home. Not far from that village is a dangerous railroad crossing; and, as the sight or sound of carriages so affrighted their horse as to render him uncontrollable, special pains had been taken not to arrive at the spot while a train was due. But just as they reached it a "special" train, whose approach was masked behind high bushes, came rushing along unannounced, and had they been only a few seconds later would have crushed them to atoms (see frontispiece). So severe was the shock, and so vivid the sense of a providential escape, that scarcely a word was spoken during the drive home. The next morning Mrs. Prentiss gave her husband a very interesting account of the thoughts that, like lightning, flashed upon her mind while feeling herself in the jaws of death.

The early months of 1876 were very busily spent, as usual, in literary work and in attendance upon Mr. Moody's memorable services at the Hippodrome, New York. In a letter to a friend, she says: "The work at the Hippodrome took a great deal of my time, and there is a poor homeless fellow, now at work in my garden, whom it was my privilege to lead to Christ there, and who touched me not a little this morning by bringing me three plants purchased out of his scanty earnings (see frontispiece). He has connected himself with our mission, and has made friends there."

DEATH.

During the months that followed, her friends noticed with sorrow that the health and strength of Mrs. Prentiss were rapidly declining. She, however, would not abate any of her usual activities, and long after her weakness became painful to witness she insisted on conducting her Bible readings for ladies as usual. On August 8th, 1878, the last of those Bible meetings was held. Five days afterward she peacefully entered into her rest.

Our effort has been in this brief sketch to show what Mrs. Prentiss was rather than to relate what she did. For the facts and incidents of her life—a life unusually full of incident—we must refer our readers to the book which we have before mentioned, in which her husband has lovingly gathered her letters, extracts from her diary, and his own recollections of thirty-three years of constant fellowship—"The Life and Letters of Elizabeth Prentiss," published by Messrs. Anson D. F. Randolph & Company, New York.

CHRISTMAS DAY AT THE SPURGEON ORPHANAGES.

To the delight of the children and the managers, Mr. C. H. Spurgeon was able to spend last Christmas Day at the Orphanages, where his large family gathered lovingly about him. Places were set for four hundred and twenty children, one hundred and eighty of whom are girls. A large Christmas tree, the gift of a valued friend of the institution, was set up in the covered play-ground, and was stocked with presents by a wealthy lady who takes a deep interest in the work. Through the munificence of another friend every child found on sitting down to dinner, placed in front of his or her seat, a new shilling (25c.), a box of figs, a medal, and a Christmas-card.

Mr. Spurgeon had not been able to attend the Orphanage Christmas feast since 1881, and numbers of the children had never even set eyes upon him, so that when he entered the room, accompanied by Mrs. Spurgeon, the cheering was both hearty and protracted. Dinner was then disposed of, after which Mr. Spurgeon delivered a genial address. He said that he was very, very glad to spend Christmas once again with his friends at the Orphanage. It had been a great joy to look upon the children, and to see them all so well provided for. "It was a comfort to think that none of the staff needed looking after; if they liked to neglect their duties they could, but they never did so; and thus, those who were responsible were able to feel at ease. (He Mr. Spurgeon) intended to see them oftener in the future if possible; but in point of fact, there was very little time available for such a purpose; so many works required attention that he was glad to hand over to others all that they were able to do. In any case, it was only necessary for them to go on as they had done; for no one could be served by a better staff. Turning next to the "old boys" the president said how glad he was to see their faces again; and he added, that he should like to see those who had left the Orphanage all together; and if he could live to be as old as Sir Moses Montefiore, what a sight such a gathering would then be! Something was then said to the young men respecting the advantages which came of practice in public speaking, Mr. Spurgeon humorously referring to himself as an example in point, he not having been able to speak a word of English, or, in fact, of any language, when he "first arrived in the country." He hoped that some of the young men would turn out to be preachers; but if otherwise, let each do what he could for God's glory. If any were ambitious, let the practical outcome consist in doing well what they had to do.

Mr. Spurgeon at the close of the entertainment once more expressed the gratitude he felt on account of being able to be present. When down in the dumps he always felt that something might be going wrong; if he could not actually smell a rat, his wife knew how apt he was to rummage up a mouse. But there was never anything wrong with those present, and he was grateful for their services.

Speaking on behalf of his wife, the president added how glad Mrs. Spurgeon was to be able to leave the room where she was constantly writing to ministers about books and take part, after so many years of illness, in so joyful a celebration.

GOSPEL LOOKING-GLASS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, January 18, 1885.

"And he made the laver of brass, and the foot of it of brass, of the looking-glasses of the women assembling."—EXODUS 38: 8.

The Laver in the Tabernacle—Its Double Purpose—For Revealing Impurities—For Cleansing—The Mirrored Room at Hampton Court—The Fresh Water in the Laver—A Great Storm on the Atlantic—Lapsed Insurance Policies—Washing Both Extremities—Complete Surrender Required—A Large Laver—Queen Caroline Excluded from the Coronation—The Washing Imperative—A Dying Woman's Message—A Picture of a Battle-Field.

We often hear about the Gospel of John, and the Gospel of Matthew, and the Gospel of Luke. There is just as certainly a Gospel of Moses, a Gospel of David, a Gospel of Jeremiah. In other words, Christ is as certainly in the Old Testament as in the New. If after one has departed we want to get an idea of just how he looked, we gather up all the photographs—some taken from one side the face, others from the other side the face, some the full face, some the full-length portrait, and then from all these pictures we recall to our mind just how the departed one looked. And I want all the pictures of the evangelists and all the pictures of the prophets to bring before me the image of Jesus Christ. I want to know just how He looked, and the more pictures I have of Him the better I shall understand.

When the Israelites were on their march through the wilderness, they carried their church with them. They had what they called a tabernacle, a pitched tent. It was very costly and very beautiful. The framework was made out of forty-eight boards of acacia wood, set in sockets of silver. The curtains of the building were of purple and scarlet and blue and fine linen, and they were hung on artistic loops. The candlestick had a shaft and branches and bowls of gold, and there were lamps of gold, and tongs of gold, and snuffers of gold, and rings of gold.

Now, there is one thing in this ancient tabernacle that especially attracts my attention, and that is

THE LAVER.

It was a great basin filled with water, and the water went down through spouts and passed away, and the priests came and washed their hands and their feet as this water came down through the spouts and passed away. The laver was made out of the looking-glasses of the women who had frequented the tabernacle, and who had made that contribution to the furniture. The looking-glasses were not made out of glass, but of brass of a superior quality, polished and burnished, until just as soon as a priest looked into the side of the laver he saw his every feature and any spot of defilement that may have been on his countenance; so that this laver of looking-glasses spoken of in my text had two purposes: the first, to show those who came up the defilement upon themselves, and secondly, to offer them a place where they could get rid of it. And as everything in the ancient tabernacle was typical of something in the Gospel of the Son of God, or, at any rate, suggestive of it, I take this laver of looking-glasses in my text as all suggestive of this Gospel, which first shows me sin, and then gives me an opportunity of divine ablation.

"Oh, happy day, happy day,
When Jesus washed my sins away!"

This is the only mirror, the burnished side of this laver is that shows you just as you are. Some mirrors flatter the features, and they make you look better than you are. Some mirrors distort the features, and they make you look worse than you are. This mirror—this mirror of God's Word—shows you just as you are. These priests would come in, and just as soon as they confronted the burnished, polished side of this looking glass, this metal out of which the laver was made, he saw where there was any pollution upon his countenance, where there was any spot that needed to be cleaned off.

Just as soon as we come in and look at this mirror of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, we see ourselves just as we are. "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God." That is one showing. "All we, like sheep, have gone astray." That is another showing. "From the crown of the head to the sole of the foot there is no health in us." That is another showing. Some people call these defects imperfections, or eccentricities, or erratic behavior, or wild oats, or high living; but this Book calls them filth, transgression, the abominable thing that God hates. Paul got one glance at that mirror—that polished mirror—and he cried out: "Oh, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me?" David caught one glimpse of that mirror, and he cried out: "Purge me with hyssop and I shall be clean!" Martin Luther got one glimpse of that mirror, and he cried out to Staupitz: "Oh, my sins, my sins, my sins!"

Mind you, I am not talking about bad habits. We do not need any Bible to persuade us that blasphemy is wrong, or impure life is wrong, or evil speaking is wrong. I am now talking of the heart, the fountain of bad thoughts, of bad words, of bad actions. Here is ingratitude, for instance. If you hand me a glass of water, I say, "Thank you." If I hand you a glass of water, you say, "Thank you." But here we have been taking ten thousand mercies from the hand of God—our hunger fed, our thirst slaked, and we have had shelter and home, and ten thousand blessings and advantages, and yet I do not state a thing that you will not believe when I say that there are people in this house this morning fifty years of age who have never got down once on their knees and thanked God for His goodness. And here is pride of heart. Oh, we all have felt it, the pride that will not submit to God. Pride wants its own way. I will not quarrel with theologians about terms. I do not care whether you call it total depravity, or whether you call it something else. This evil nature we got from our parents, and they got it from their parents, and it goes down from generation to generation—a nature obnoxious to God before conversion, and after conversion there is not one in any of us except that which the grace of God planted and fostered and keeps.

THE EVIL HEART,

It seems to me that the reason there are comparatively so few conversions in our day is to be found in the fact that the preaching of our day is so apt to persuade a man that he is almost right anyhow, he only needs he only needs a few touches of divine grace, and then he will be all right; only a little out of order; only a little repair necessary to our nature, instead of the broad, deep talk which Baxter and Payson and Wesley and George Whitefield thundered in the ears of a race trembling on the verge of instant and eternal disaster. Ah! my friends, if there is any truth plainly set forth in this Book, it is that we have thoroughly gone astray, and that we are not by nature almost right, but altogether wrong. "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." Some of us have been in Hampton Court, and we remember that room where all the four walls are covered with mirrors, and it does not make any difference which way you look you see yourself. And when a man once fully steps inside this precinct of the Gospel he sees himself on all sides, every feature of moral deformity, every spot of moral taint. The whole head is sick and the whole heart is faint. I do not care what your ancestry was, your ancestry was no better than my ancestry. But all generations have felt this touch of sin. Have you not realized it? I will tell you why. You have never looked into the looking-glass, you have never seen the mirror.

"But," says some one, "what is the use of displaying our defects to us if we cannot get rid of them?" None. You say: "What is the use of showing me that I am a sinner if I cannot be anything but a sinner?" No use. I cannot imagine anything meaner than for a physician to come into a sick room and tell the patient how bad he looks, and to discourse upon his affliction, and enlarge upon the fact that his case is hopeless, and then go out with his hands behind his back, and whistling. There never has been a case like that. No physician would be so hard-hearted as that. If you cannot cure a disease you certainly will not make the matter worse by discoursing upon it, and I am the last man to stand here and talk about the sin of my heart and the sin of your heart unless there is a cure for it. There is no use for the polished side of this laver, no use for the burnished looking-glass, if there is no place for me to wash and be clean.

Now, you notice that this laver of looking-glasses spoken of in the text was every morning. The servants of the tabernacle took buckets, and they filled them with the water, and they brought this bright water and poured it into the laver; and that is a type of this Gospel of Jesus Christ, which is a fresh Gospel—fresh every year, every day, every hour, every moment. It is not a stagnant pool of accumulated corruption; it is living water breaking from the rock. Christians often make the mistake of being satisfied with old experiences. Why, my brother and sister, I do not care what your experiences were ten, fifteen years ago. Do not give us a stale Gospel. Give us a fresh Gospel. What are you now? Suppose a war should come and I could prove to the government that ten years ago I was loyal, would that be any excuse for my not taking the oath of allegiance? The government would not ask me what I was ten years ago, but "What are you now?" And I do not ask you whether you were loyal to Jesus Christ ten or five years, or one year ago. Are you loyal now? Are you fighting under the standards of Emanuel? Are you a soldier of Jesus Christ now? I was in a great and the captain said: "We must go down," and the crew said there was no hope, and all the passengers expected to perish. Then I thought of home, and then I asked myself: "How about my life insurance? If I am swept off now, will my family be cared for?" And then I thought to myself: "Yes, I paid up the premiums on the life insurance," and I was content. But how if the insurance had run out? The trouble is, that a great many are depending upon old insurances against the damage of sin and old insurances against the damage of the great future—old insurances that have run out. Suppose that you allowed the fire insurance on your home to expire yesterday and to-day your home should be consumed, would you have the impertinence to go to-morrow morning with the papers to the insurance company and demand the amount of the policy? No. If you did they would say: "You have no business here, you have no right to ask that, you let the insurance expire on Saturday; this is Monday." O follower of the Lord Jesus, do not depend upon old insurances, ten, or twenty, or forty years old, as I know some of you are depending upon them! You want the policy paid up by the blood and the tears of the Son of God.

But I notice in regard to this laver looking-glass spoken of in the text that the priests there washed

THEIR HANDS AND THEIR FEET.

The water came down through the spouts from the basin, and they carefully and completely washed their hands and their feet, typical of the fact that this Gospel is to reach to the very extremities of our moral nature. Here is a man who says: "I will fence off part of my heart, and it shall be a garden full of flowers and fruits of Christian character; and all the rest shall be the devil's commons." You cannot do it. It is all garden or none. You tell me about a man, that he is a good Christian except in politics. I deny your statement. If his religion will not take him in purity through the autumnal election, that religion is worth nothing in May, June, or July. You say that a man is a very good man, he is a Christian, he is useful, but he overreaches in a bargain. I deny your statement. If it is an all-pervading religion, if it touches a man at all at one point of his nature, it will pervade his entire nature.

It is quite easy to be a Christian, or seems to be, on Sabbath, surrounded by kindly influences; but not so easy to be a Christian when by one twitch of the roll of goods you can cover a defect in the silk. It is quite an easy thing to be a Christian with a psalm-book in your hand and the Bible on your lap; not so easy to be a Christian when telling a merchant you can get better goods at less price at another store until he lets you have the goods cheaper than he has any capacity to sell them; he is going to hurt himself when he does sell, for there are more lies told before the counter than behind the counter, ten to one. Christ will have you all, or He will have none of you. This grace must reach to the very extremities of our nature.

Suppose you have rented or purchased a whole house, and the former owner comes to you with the keys. There are twelve rooms in the house and he gives you six of the keys. You say, "Where are the other keys?" "Oh," he says, "you can't have them! There is a room on the second floor you can't have, and there is a room on the third floor and a room on the fourth floor you can't have, and there is a dark place in the attic you can't have, but here are the keys for the others." You say, "I purchased the whole house, and I want all the keys, or I don't want any of them." Here is a man who comes to God, and he gives part of his nature, and says: "You may go to this and go to that, but there is something I can't give up, there is a room in my nature and this I want to keep, and that I want to keep. You can have half of the keys of my soul, but not all." Then Christ will not have any. He will take everything from cellar to attic—all of the keys to all your affections, all your hopes, all your ambitions, all your heart, all your life, or He will not take one key. The grace of God must touch the extremities, the very extremities of our moral nature. The priests when they came to this laver of looking-glasses washed their hands and washed their feet.

But I notice also, in regard to this laver spoken of in the text, it is

A VERY LARGE LAVER.

I know it from the fact that so many washed there. I know it still better from the fact that Solomon when he duplicated that laver of the tabernacle in the temple which he built, built it on a large scale. And that means pardon for all and mercy for all—a great, wide Gospel. The Bible does not say there is pardon for small sins, but it says positively there is pardon for great sins. If a sin be only faintly hued, it does not especially say there is pardon for faintly hued transgression; but if it be glaring, if it be red like crimson, it shall be as wool.

I say this not to put a premium upon crime, but to encourage that man who thinks there is no mercy because he is so great a sinner. Paul was a murderer. Did he not stand at the assassination of Stephen? and he took part in that crime, and yet Paul became the most illustrious man in the Christian church. And if Christ be at the right hand of God, I think Paul will be at the right hand of Christ. Oh, how bad he was, and how good he became! The dying thief was as bad as bad could be, and yet he was saved. Oh, God loves to take hold of a bad case! There are a thousand bridges in this country over small brooks and small streams. You do not know the architects, do you? But you know who built the Brooklyn Bridge. The greater the span the mightier the genius and greater the glory.

Oh, let all the penitentiaries come to this laver and wash off their crimes! Let all the almshouses come to this laver and wash off their poverties! It seems to me the round earth, if you could once grasp it, if you could once clutch it—this round earth could be bowled into it. And all you have to do is now, to-day, to get the advantage of this grace. Come down out of your pride.

wanted to see her offended husband, George IV., crowned in Westminster Abbey; and while the coronation was going on she rode up behind ten shining bays, and in great pomp, to the door of Westminster Abbey; but she had no ticket of admission, she could not go in. Then she went to another gate of Westminster Abbey, and was refused admission; and then she got in her splendid equipage, and rode home in wrath and indignation. You cannot come into the Kingdom of our God in your pomp and pretension. You will never get into the coronation unless you come afoot—unless you come on your knees.

I remember the Syrophenecian woman. She had a daughter with convulsive sickness, and she came to Christ; and Christ, just to rally her courage and test her faith, said: "It is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to the dogs"—for you know the Jews considered the Gentiles dogs in those times—as much as to say, "We can't give this great blessing that belongs to the Jews to you, a Gentile, —not to the dogs." But the Syrophenecian woman said: "Yea, Lord, yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their masters' table; I don't pretend to be any one; I am a poor Gentile dog, but even dogs have privileges, and when the door is ajar, and through the cracks of the table some of the crumbs have fallen down, don't the dogs come in and take the crumbs? I don't ask a loaf of thy mercy, I don't even ask for a slice of thy mercy; give me just one crumb of it. I crawl at thy feet, O Master, I will just crawl at thy feet." Christ could not stand it. He said: "Woman, your daughter is well; you start for home, and you will meet her." Do not come with the pride of Queen Caroline—come with the humility of the Syrophenecian woman.

WASHING IMPERATIVE.

Once more, I notice in this laver of looking-glasses that the washing in it was not optional, it was imperative. Here the priests came into the tabernacle. Suppose now one of them should say: "I washed before I came from home; there's no use of my washing in this laver." God says: "You wash in this laver or die." But suppose the priest had said, "Why, there are other lavers just as bright as that from which this water was taken, and I might wash there just as well; why wash in the water of this laver?" God says: "Wash here or die." Not optional—imperative. Typical of the Gospel which says, "You wash in this fountain open for sin and uncleanness, or perish." We have no choice.

"But," says some one, "couldn't God have provided other ways of salvation?" Fifty of them, perhaps. I do not think that God exhausted all His wisdom when He laid out this plan of salvation. Perhaps He might have provided fifty plans of salvation. He provided only one. You say: "Might not a whole line of ships sail from earth to heaven?" Yes, but there is only one going. Are there any other trees as luxuriant as the tree of Calvary? Yes, more, for that one had neither bud nor blossom, and it was stripped and barked. But the one path to heaven is under the bare arm of that stripped tree. Not optional, but imperative.

Just before a Sunday night service I stopped to see and after I had talked with her and prayed with her, I took out my watch and said: "It is twenty-five minutes past seven, and I must leave you now: I must get to the church." And I said—for I knew I would never see her again alive—I said, "Have you any message to send to the church to-night?" Her face was very illumined, and she said, "Yes, I have; tell them all I wish they were as happy as I am." Oh, I wish I could coax this whole audience to come up to the laver!

I cannot at the close of a sermon begin to talk about the love of Christ. You talk about a mountain; it is higher than that. You talk about the sea; it is deeper than that. A painter in his dream had a vision of the transfiguration of Christ, and it awoke him; and as he awoke he seized his pencil and said, "Let me paint this now and die." Oh, I have sometimes seen the glories of Christ and the wonders of the cross, until I have felt I should be willing to do anything almost if I could only sketch them for the world. Well might you paint that scene and die. And yet there are those unmoved by it.

Christ comes with His face wet with tears and His brow crimson with blood, and He lies down on Calvary. I mistake. He did not lie down. A stone would have been a soft pillow for Christ. He did not even lie down. He stood up when He died. He stood, that foot spiked, that foot spiked, that arm spiked, that arm spiked. Outstretched as though to invite a world, and yet I know men who are not moved by it. They say, "What is all that to me? what are those tears? what is that blood? I don't care anything about it." Lord Jesus, they will not take Thee down, they will not help Thee down. The soldiers came and tore Thee down, and with their arms they lowered Thee into the tomb. They will not help Thee down. Lord Jesus, just look at them this morning, and perhaps they will change their mind.

"I saw one hanging on a tree,
In agony and blood,
Who put His languid eye on me,
As near His cross I stood.

"Oh, never till my latest breath
Will I forget that look;
He seemed to charge me with His death,
Though not a word He spoke."

O brother, sister, come up to the laver this morning,

THE LAVER OF THE GOSPEL!

O afflicted soul, come and bathe off your wounds, and, sick one, come up and cool your hot temples! Pardon for all your sin. Comfort for all your troubles. The dark cloud that hung thundering over Sinai floated above Calvary and burst into a shower of the Saviour's tears. If you have any trouble, come to God. He will make you His darlings. He will make you His favorites. We cannot in our households have favorites, but if you have a favorite, mother, I know which one it is; it is the sick one, the crippled one, the one that coughs all night, the weary one, the wan one—that is your favorite. And God seems to have His favorites, and they are the weak and the worn and the sick and the weary. Just come up to Him to-day, and He will put His arms around you, and He will kiss your wan cheek, and He will say as He hushes you with the divine lullaby: "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." Come up to the laver this morning. Do not cry.

At Kensington, London, I saw

of the battle-field of Waterloo years after the battle had passed, and the grass had grown all over the scarred places, and the artist—for it was a masterpiece—the artist had represented a dismounted cannon, and then a lamb which had wandered up from the pasture field, sound asleep in the mouth of the cannon. Oh, what a suggestive picture it was to me! and I thought right away that the war between God and the soul is ended, and right amid the batteries of the law that once quaked with fiery death, now you may behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world.

"I went to Jesus as I was,
Weary, and worn, and sad;
I found in Him a resting-place,
And He has made me glad."

Hail! Master, hail! Hosanna to the Son of David!

ISLAM.

By Rev. A. C. Tris.

The Vanguard of Antichrist's Army—History Repeated—Mohammed's Sudden Appearance—Unexpected Exaltation—His Followers Have the Spirit of Antichrist—Their Vast Number—Objections to the Theory—I. It is not Homogeneous—Divisions Apparent, not Real—The Power of the Caliph of Mecca—II. The Decadence of Turkey—Mohammedanism not Dependent on Turkey—III. A Dying Religion—A Change of Methods—No Decrease—The Outlook.

IN a former article,* we have said a few words about "The Antichrist: His Spirit and Times." We now propose to show that Islam is the vanguard of that multitudinous host of which the coming Antichrist will be the leader.

THE DANGER OF ISLAMISM.

It is true that Antichrist's forces are marshalled in quietness, and that they are equipped and prepared in those regions of the globe to which Christians are not accustomed to look; and yet, by investigation, it will be found that that army is doing its work with the greatest alacrity and faith worthy a better cause.

HISTORY REPEATED.

Let us recall to memory that when, in the sixth century, the Asiatic and African churches enjoyed apparently unbounded prosperity, having worldly pomp and archiepiscopal rule, but having very little of the true spirit of the humble Master, Jesus of Nazareth, that they did not think (as little we do now) that the enemy carrying desolation and ruin was standing at their threshold; very little did they imagine that the man was already born and lived among one of the unknown Arab tribes who should be called "The Scourge of the World," and yet such was his fact; and Mohammed was preparing in quietness his plans to devastate the earth.

Like Antiochus Epiphanes before him, this Ishmaelite of Mecca did come as the little horn will come (Dan. 8:9-12), making an upheaval among the Eastern nations, planting his seat in Jerusalem, and was proclaimed to be "the prophet of Allah"—indeed, the forerunner and leader of the vanguard of the coming Antichrist (II Thess. 2:4-12).

ISLAMISM AN ABOMINATION.

For more than twelve centuries this religious power of iniquity has not only been the scourge of Christendom, but has set up itself as a blasphemer and defier of the great Jehovah and of the religion of Jesus Christ. To-day the blind Muezzin chants from the Mosque of Omar in Jerusalem, one hour before daybreak, and at other times: "Allah is most great; I testify that there is no God but Allah; I testify that Mohammed is the apostle of Allah." That chant is heard from the place where the temple and altar of Jehovah stood, and where the Shechinah dwelt between the Cherubim (Ps. 80:1).

ISLAM THE FORERUNNER OF ANTICHRIST.

The followers of Mohammed bear the marks which will distinguish the coming Antichrist. They call the followers of Jesus "infidels and dogs," and teach that to exterminate them is the duty of every Moslem. They virtually deny "that the Father has sent His Son Jesus unto the world." They have superseded the Bible by their Koran, "received," they say, "from Allah," and they have all the evidences that they belong to the Antichrist.

THEIR NUMBER

is one seventh part of the population of our globe. About two hundred millions of human beings turn their faces to Mecca, the birthplace and grave of their prophet. (The religious statistics, Leipzig, 1882. Lexikon für Theologie.) What a mighty phalanx! Two hundred millions of fanatics, whose burning zeal, if kindled, may yet, yea, will be, one of the chief factors of the coming events. What may they do under the leadership of him "whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders" (II Thess. 2:9), united and strengthened by the army of atheists, and supported by "the kings and the rulers of the earth. Many arguments have been used against this theory that Islam stands in close connection with Antichrist as his forerunner and chiefly ally. Of those, three deserve consideration: I. The argument most frequently used, that

ISLAM IS NOT A HOMOGENEOUS POWER, but a religion, the members of which are scattered among many nations and races, without the political prestige of former ages. This objection seems at first sight to be well taken, but, examining the matter more carefully, we come to a different conclusion. There is a great difference between the millions of Mohammedans of the Soudan and the philosophical followers of Mohammed in Persia, who can be called the Moslem radicals; between the aristocratic Moslem believers of Constantinople and those children of the deserts of Arabia who are the orthodox followers of the family of Mohammed. The Sultan of Turkey calls himself the leader of the host, the caliph to whom all the Musselmans owe obedience; but it is the Caliph of Mecca who, as the descendant of Mohammed, is the spiritual chief, the very centre of Islam. His word is obeyed by all the faithful, and reaches the Mongolian, Tartar, and Indian races, and those of the far interior of Africa. The power of darkness is thus through him a homogeneous power, uniting the faithful. At any moment the green flag may be brought forth, and when it is seen waving over the Caaba the faithful will rise to exterminate the infidels; Islam will arise as a man, to conquer or to die.

II. A second plausible objection is THE TURK'S WANING POWER.

This objection also is apparent and not real. Mohammedanism can exist without Turkey, as Roman Catholicism would exist if the Pope were driven from Rome. Mohammedanism flourished for seven centuries before Turkey was conquered; it may flourish when Turkey is lost to us. At present only forty-four per cent of the Turks are Mohammedans, while of the inhabitants of the Sahara, of Nubia, Arabia, and the Asiatic provinces the Mohammedans are over ninety per cent.* Turkey belongs to the old Roman Empire, and its decadence, while it fulfils the word of prophecy (Dan. 2:40, 41), is also an indication that Mohammedanism is losing its hold upon it.

REVIVALS.

III. The third objection raised is, that Mohammedanism itself is dying out. That objection is based on want of true knowledge. Mohammedanism is now working less by the sword than by persuasion. Dr. Dollinger, of Berlin, says: "If we look simply at the strong, expansive force of the Arabian religion, we see that it is extending itself now almost as rapidly and as vigorously by the peaceful methods of persuasion, as formerly by the sword. We are in the presence of an historical enigma. In Africa it advances like a torrent; whole tribes in the interior, which yesterday were idolaters or fetich worshippers, being to-day believers in the Koran. In Sierra Leone, on the north-western coast of Guinea, there is a Moslem high-school with one thousand pupils. In China the Musselmans have already become so numerous that they were able recently to venture on an insurrection. Among the Malays on the islands of the Eastern Archipelago they have, for the first time in our day, made hosts of proselytes. From Sumatra Islam has spread to Java, and the whole population (nearly 8,000,000) have now, for the first time, become Mohammedan."

The Constantinople correspondent New York Herald writes recently: "Islam has great interest at stake in Africa apart from those connected with the Mohammedan states on the north, for the religion of the prophet has spread far and wide across the dark continent, and now counts among the adherents the whole population of the central parts, as well as several tribes on the western coasts. So marvellous, indeed, has been the progress of Islamism in Africa within the last few years, that it would seem destined in time to conquer the whole land, and that, too, in spite of the rival efforts of Christianity. . . . This advance of Islamism in Africa is really one of the great facts of the present age. It is due in a measure to the fervent exhortations of the Moslem professors at the Mosque of Azar in Cairo, and the Senoussi movement in the Tripolitaine. That Mohammedanism is still a living principle, and under certain conditions is capable of producing again those great waves of human action which have left such landmarks upon history, is seen in this movement of the Soudan tribes, which is giving such trouble to the British Government."

Last week we received the information from Rev. A. Albers, Dutch missionary laboring at Tjandjour, Java, "that the inhabitants of Java and elsewhere in the Indian Archipelago, who belong to the Moslem faith, manifest a new life in their religion; it is like an upheaval; everywhere small mosques have been built, and daily the throng of the faithful can be seen in those places. A letter from the Iman of Mecca has been received, and the consequences are visible; it has stirred up the Moslem population to action, implicit reverence and obedience, and no sacrifice is too great, if it should be required; there is danger for the Dutch colonial government if that population is ruled from such religious centres."

THE OUTLOOK.

The future is ominous. European statesmen feel the weight and the prestige of the Moslem power. It has a strength which is felt in the British Cabinet, and is the essence of the Eastern question. It is not generally known that Russia in Europe has two millions and a half of Moslem believers among its inhabitants, and that the number in Siberia, Russian Central Asia, and the Caucasus, with those in Europe, make the grand total of "nine millions." Among the teeming millions of Hindoostan, the votaries of Islam are counted by many millions—the name of "Sepoy" has become a household word, and their rebellion is yet fresh in our memory. Indeed, Hindoostan, the domain of Victoria, the Empress of India, can be compared to a volcano, from which the rumblings are heard and feared by British statesmen.

The times of the coming of the Antichrist are at hand. Already the Frog-like Spirit (Rev. 16:13) of Mohammedanism is reviving. Shall we slumber when the bridegroom is tarrying? Shall we not rather give heed to the signs of the times in which we live?

RECENT PERILS OF MISSIONARIES IN CHINA.

A CHRISTIAN gentleman now residing in China sends the following account of the disturbances which occurred in his neighborhood last October: "As you know by the telegraphic reports from China the missionaries are in extreme peril. We have now experienced the first signs of this peril.

"The port of Wenchow hitherto, owing to the modesty of its character, or the poverty of its trade, has been unknown to fame, its foreign community consisting of a dozen or more inhabitants, the largest half of whom are officials, the others being missionaries, one of whom is an Italian priest of the Catholic mission. The name Wenchow in English means "Placid District," and it has always been supposed to be a quiet abode where foreigners might live without the shadow of fear or the threat of disturbance. Missionaries, too, had evidence of work marked by success. So it came to pass that while almost every other foreign port in China had a neutral man-of-war or gunboat anchored in its waters to keep the peace, Wenchow was left to the kindness of the Chinese. But, unhappily for Wenchow, it happens to be next door to Foochow, the centre of military glory for China, and eternal defeat and shame to France or foreigners.

"On Saturday evening, October 4th, at 8 P.M., the Rev. Mr. Soothill, of the Methodist

Free Church mission, conducted the usual service with about twenty-five Chinese converts. The occasional interruption of runaway knocks, etc., was repeated with louder emphasis, and on this occasion the knockers did not run away. So a messenger was sent to the police magistrate's Yamen near to ask that means to preserve the peace might be set in motion. Meanwhile the disturbers commenced action with brought from a distance; then a charge was made at the 'back gate' of the premises, and an entrance speedily effected. The first object in sight was the kitchen crockery! and surely no bull in a china shop ever made more rapid or complete havoc of plates and dishes than did these warlike Celestials. Wooden partitions were torn down as easily as we tear paper; many hands make light work, and here were two hundred pairs working as if 'paid by the job.' A kerosene lamp was then called into use by the rioters, its blazing contents being poured upon the floor. From the ruins of the back door the missionary addressed the rioters, but, like savages who had tasted of the spoil, they responded with a volley of stones, which indicated to the missionary that he was helpless. He made his exit from another door, and went himself to the magistrate to ask for immediate and strong measures to repress the riot.

"In cases of riot the Chinese officials prefer to keep at a safe distance until the fury of the mob has expended itself, so the missionary was invited to remain in safety and leave his place to be wrecked. Consequently, the mob, having the power in their own hands, continued to set on fire, after extensive looting, the residences of five missionaries and several chapels and schools, one of these being the Roman Catholic mission premises, occupied by an Italian priest. "After the missions were all demolished the victory-thirsty mob thought of the residences of three European gentlemen, who manage the Chinese Custom House, and who are, indeed, the servants of the Chinese Government. They were at once attacked, and two of them had for life. They reached the river's edge, and took a boat; the boatman, under threats of the consequences of harboring foreigners, would have turned back with his fare, but, happily, the two gentlemen were armed, and under the nearer pressure the boatman ferried his passengers across to the opposite side of the river, where the English Consul and a few other Europeans reside.

"The priest of the Roman Catholic mission was aroused from his bed by the violent demonstrations of hostility at the front of his residence. Without time for dressing, the good man passed from his bedroom window on to the roof of some outhouses, and there upon his knees, and with hands uplifted toward heaven, prayed to the Unseen; and

DID NOT PRAY IN VAIN.

A neighbor, who lived in a house only separated from the mission house by a narrow alley with a high wall at each side, saw him, and placed a door as a bridge from house to house, so that the priest might escape, and ultimately hid him behind a quantity of firewood until official power again had command. This neighborly act was wrought by one not a Christian, and it deserves to be recorded and placed to the credit of the people of China.

"Mr. Soothill and Mr. Jackson, of THE CHINA INLAND MISSION, went to the Yamen for help to protect their houses, but they were politely but forcibly detained for their own safety. I regret to say, however, that the senior missionary of the city, the Rev. Mr. Stott, who had resided there full seventeen years, and is known to every one as the veteran of the place, was much ill-treated by the mob. And when the fact that this devoted man has lost one leg and is only able to walk upon crutches is known, the cruelty of the mob is more unpardonable. Happily for him, another veteran—in fact, one of the best-known men in China, Dr. Macgowan, who came to China before the writer of this account came into existence—seeing the danger, went to assist Mr. Stott to escape. Mrs. Stott had, most providentially, left the city for Shanghai only a few days before.

"Dr. Macgowan found Mr. Stott in his house surrounded by a number of little Chinese school-boys, and together they all started for the Yamen. The doctor brought up the rear, and, being a man of tact and talent, ready in speech, he, with great difficulty, and after being himself felled to the earth with a large stone, contrived to convey his company to the place of refuge. The Saturday night was one of intense and solemn emotion to these four men. The magistrate, however, did his best to entertain them, and that same afternoon each of the four, upon being sent to the English Consul, was supplied with fifty dollars to meet their immediate wants."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Railway Fatality Averted.—At a Recent meeting an evangelist said: "At one time, in America, two children, a boy and a girl, were crossing some very narrow railway lines. A train came up, which the children did not observe until it was quite close to them. The girl managed to get her brother pushed into the cleft of a rock, which was close at the side of the rails, and she then got up beside him just in time before the train passed over the spot where they both had been standing less than a minute before. She was heard to shout several times, 'Cling to the rock, Johnnie; cling to the rock, Johnnie!' That is what I say to all of you. Jesus is the rock of our salvation. In His wounded side, as in the cleft of the rock, every one who rests is safe. 'Cling to the Rock! Cling to the Rock!'"

The Will behind the Portrait.—"A Rich Gentleman's wife died, and not long afterward their only child, a little boy whom they both dearly loved, followed his mother to the grave. The gentleman never recovered from the shock of this double bereavement. His grief was terrible to witness; he soon died of a broken heart, and his body was interred beside those of his wife and child. After his death search was made for a will, but none could be found. At the sale of the house furniture an old domestic of the household was present for the purpose of buying a portrait of the little boy which was hanging on one of the walls. The servant had dearly loved the child when alive, and was now eager to secure the picture. It was sold to her where it hung, and on its being taken down, the will was found fastened to the back of it; and when read it was discovered that the person who, at the sale of his effects, should purchase the picture of his much-loved son should have all his property. This is what God has said to us; if we honor and love His son, He will make us inheritors of His Kingdom."

Picking up Cinders.—The Rev. Mr. Pugh said: "There was a man who was much given to strong drink; he was an excellent workman and earned good wages, but none of it went home; it was all spent in the liquor saloon, where he also spent much of his time. One morning he stayed longer than usual there, and while he was sitting enjoying himself, as he fancied, Mrs. Jones, the inn-keeper, entered the room, and looking out of the window, she called his attention to a poor, wretched woman who was picking up cinders in front of the window. This sight was enough. It went to the man's heart, for it was his own wife. Rising, he left the house without a word. Next morning he went home from his work without entering the saloon, and continued so to do. He signed the pledge, and kept it. Soon his home began to look more comfortable, and he had the pleasure of seeing his wife decently dressed. One Sunday on their way home from church, where he now regularly attended, he said, pointing to the saloon, 'Will you come in here for a minute?' 'No, do not go in there,' pleaded his wife. 'Oh, we will just go in for a minute; I will take care we get no harm,' he replied. Unwillingly Mary followed him in, and he called, 'Mrs. Jones.' She remembered the voice, and was with them in a minute. 'Mrs. Jones, what do you think of Mary? Isn't she neat?' 'Yes,' answered Mrs. Jones, 'she is very neat.' 'Isn't there a difference between when you saw her picking up cinders and now?' Mrs. Jones had to admit that there was a great change. 'Well,' said the happy husband, 'it is because I give Mary the money I earn now, instead of giving it to you.'

Crushed in Body and Soul.—A Christian Minister said: 'I shall never forget a man who was accidentally crushed between two trucks on the railway, and his body was fearfully mutilated. He was carried to his lodgings by four men, and I followed to see what could be done for the poor fellow. When they reached his lodgings those four strong men could scarcely hold him, although he was so fearfully hurt. He forgot the pain of his body in the agony of his soul; he seemed to get some supernatural power, and he cried, 'Oh, my soul, my soul, what has become of my soul?' and in that way he struggled and cried until the soul was separated from the body.'

Older, but not Wiser.—The Rev. J. Hudson Taylor said: 'When I was preparing for my first visit to China, our minister, a good old man, said to me: 'How do you, without much means, propose to get out to China?' 'Well,' I said, 'I cannot tell, but I am sure God has called me to go to China, and I have no doubt He will prepare the way for me, and failing anything else I might get employment on a ship, and work my passage out.' And after you are out,' he said, 'what then?' 'Then I suppose the first thing will be to acquire the language,' I said. 'Yes, yes, but how are you to live?' 'Well,' I replied, 'when the Master sent His disciples on their first mission, He commanded them to make no provision for their needs, and we read that when they returned He inquired, 'Lacked ye anything?' and they said, 'Nothing,' and His power is as great now as then.' And the fatherly old man, laying his hand lovingly on my shoulder, said: 'Oh, my boy, you will grow wiser yet! But, thank God, I have not grown wiser yet; and never wish to.'

How the Peace Came.—Capt. Hatfield Says: "A short time ago, at a meeting, I was asked to speak to a gentleman who was waiting behind. He was a man about fifty years of age, and therefore I was a little diffident in addressing him; but after being told that it was my duty to do so, touching him on the shoulder, I asked, 'What is the matter?' 'I have no peace; I am very miserable,' he answered; 'I have been a teacher in a Sunday-school for years, and yet I have no peace, no rest.' I opened my Bible at John 3, and began to read in the 16th verse, but he said, 'I know all about that.' Handing him the Bible, I asked him to read it for himself. He was a little irritated, but took the book out of my hand, and read the 16th verse. 'For God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son,' etc. After reading it, he said, 'What are you to understand by the world?' 'Well, who is the world?' I asked. 'I suppose it means the whole world, every one in the world.' 'Yes,' I said, 'it means you and me and all the rest of the world.' I then asked, 'Do you believe that God loves us?' 'Oh yes, I believe that!' was the response. 'Will you read it this way?' I then asked: 'For God so loved, and put in your own name instead of the world.' He rather looked displeased but, nevertheless, he did it, and read, 'For God so loved so-and-so, that God gave His only begotten Son, that if so-and-so believeth in Him he shall not perish, but have everlasting life.' That man was filled with joy and happiness through a simple faith in Christ, and I went away thanking God that I had been the means of turning a soul from darkness into His marvellous light."

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

A wrong date will appear on the address label of some papers this week. A large number of renewals have been received since the commencement of the year, and it has not been possible in every case to change the date in type to that covered by the renewal.

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Important Provision Appears in the Indian appropriation bill reported to the House on January 16th. It prohibits the introduction into the Indian country of any ardent spirits and forbids any person to sell, give or otherwise furnish to any Indian under the jurisdiction of the Indian Bureau any spirituous liquor or wine. The penalty for a violation of these provisions is a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $500, and imprisonment for a period of not less than six months nor more than two years. It would appear that the Appropriation Committee believes that, for the Indians, at any rate, Prohibition is a good thing.

The Edmunds Bill to Place General Grant on the retired list of the army with full pay, passed the Senate on January 14th by a vote of forty-nine to nine. The bill has been carefully worded so as to meet the objections expressed by the President in vetoing the Fitz John Porter bill. It authorizes the President to appoint and place on the retired list of the army one person from among those who had been generals commanding the armies of the United States or generals-in-chief of said army. The earnest manner in which the bill was introduced by Mr. Edmunds, who on all other occasions is so frigid and imperturbable, astonished the Senate. It elicited warm support from several Democratic Senators from the South. Mr. Maxey, of Texas, spoke of the magnanimity which General Grant had shown to the Southern people at Appomattox. He believed that there was not a man in the South who would begrudge a reasonable sum to General Grant in his declining years. It was well known that his resources had been swept away. Mr. Voorhees, of Indiana, spoke of the pleasure he would experience in voting for the measure. He also referred to General Grant's courage in time of peace as well as war, and recalled the time when Secretary Stanton wanted to imprison General Lee after the surrender at Appomattox, and General Grant said that Lee was his paroled prisoner and not a hair of his head should be touched. The bill now goes to the House.

Mr. W. H. Vanderbilt Last Week Generously offered to present Mrs. Grant with the whole of the securities transferred to him by General Grant in May last. It will be remembered that General Grant, the day before the failure of the firm of Grant & Ward, borrowed from Mr. Vanderbilt $150,000, which was regarded between the two as a debt of honor. When the firm failed, General Grant pledged the whole of his possessions, real estate and personal property, to Mr. Vanderbilt to make good the loss. Mr. Vanderbilt had an inventory taken of it, but bought in everything, which, in a graceful letter, he tendered to Mrs. Grant absolutely, with the exception of the swords, medals and historical trophies belonging to General Grant, which he stipulated should at the death of General and Mrs. Grant be handed over as historical relics to the national Government. Mrs. Grant felt it her duty to decline the gift. Mr. Vanderbilt then proposed to establish a trust fund with the proceeds of the estate, the income of which should be devoted to the benefit of herself and her husband, and the principal to be at her testamentary disposal. This offer was at first accepted, but subsequently declined by Mrs. Grant. General Grant has accepted the historical relics and intends to send them to Washington immediately. Mr. Cyrus Field and other capitalists recently undertook to raise a sufficient sum to discharge Mr. Vanderbilt's claim and release the securities, but that General Grant has also declined.

Statements Charging Ex-Governor St. John with having received money from the Democrats for continuing in the Presidential campaign continue to be published by the Blaine organs. Statements are also made by them that offers were made by agents of St. John to the Republicans to withdraw from the contest if a certain sum of money was forthcoming. All such statements are false. Governor St. John in a recent letter, published in a Worcester, Mass., journal says: "The whole story to the effect that I or the Prohibition Committee have received a single penny, pledge or promise from the Democratic or any other party, person or persons, directly or indirectly, in connection with the campaign, except my personal expenses paid by the Prohibition Committee, is infamously and maliciously false."

A Temperate New Year's Day was Observed at Atlanta, Ga. The Constitution of that city reports: "Last evening marked a notable era in Atlanta's methods on New Year's. Quite a number of the most fashionable residences were open from six until one o'clock, and at no place was wine served to the callers. It is a question if this has ever occurred in so large a community anywhere in the Union, and it is a fact alike creditable to the city and to the good taste of the people who opened their houses. The result was, not a solitary man was seen under the influence of wine, a thing unheard of on such occasions." While New York is unable to show so good a record it was remarked that the number of houses at which wine was offered was much smaller than in any former year.

Ex-Vice President Schuyler Colfax Died Suddenly in the Omaha Railroad station at Mankato, Minn., on January 13th. He had just arrived from Mankato by the Milwaukee road, and walked from the Milwaukee to the Omaha station, a distance of three quarters of a mile. The wind was extremely cold and the thermometer 30° below zero. The physicians, who arrived soon after Mr. Colfax breathed his last, believed that the air of the warm, close room after his exposure caused the fatal attack of apoplexy. Mr. Colfax was in his sixty-second year, having been born in New York City March 23d, 1823. He was a member of the Thirty-fourth Congress, having been elected by the Free Soil party. In 1863 he was chosen Speaker of the House and was twice re-elected to that office. In 1868 he was elected Vice-President on the same ticket with General Grant. He was involved in the Credit Mobilier charges, but though his reputation suffered seriously in the country and in Congress, his friends and neighbors retained their confidence in him.

The Record of Captain Phelan, who was stabbed in O'Donovan Rossa's office in New York on January 9th, has been traced by the English detectives. They state that Phelan lived in Sheffield in 1883; and openly avowed himself an agent of O'Donovan Rossa. He always dressed well, wearing a different suit of clothes every day, and seemed to be abundantly supplied with money. He had a large quantity of luggage, including a dressing case containing silver and ivory toilet requisites. He denounced the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Under Secretary Burke, saying that it was a bad plan; but when James Carey turned informer against the assassins, Phelan cursed the informer and uttered vague threats of vengeance for his treachery. Phelan's acquaintances in Sheffield remembered this fact when Carey was slain by O'Donnell, and they believed that Phelan had something to do with planning that crime.

The Progress of Socialism in England has recently been very noticeable, and it was emphasized last week by a speech made at Ipswich by Mr. Chamberlain, who, being a member of the Gladstone administration exercises a weighty influence on public affairs. He said in the course of his speech that he was not in favor of State-aided emigration. He believed it was possible to find employment for all at home. He was convinced that protection would not improve the position of farmers. The condition of farmers was never so hopeless, and the condition of laborers were never so abject as when corn was dearest. The creation of a peasant proprietary and permanence of occupation were the only remedies for the agricultural stagnation. The present land system was based on robbery, and the community was entitled to restitution and redress. Mr. Chamberlain's views are indorsed by all who know intimately the condition of the agricultural laborers and tenant farmers in Great Britain. They have been repeatedly urged by reformers, who see with indignation landowners evicting tenants and turning the land into game preserves, but it is astonishing that the colleague of the Marquis of Hartington and the Earl of Derby should utter sentiments so radical.

The French Premier Announced the Intentions of the government in reference to Tonquin in a speech in the Chamber of Deputies on January 14th. He declared that the government intended to immediately increase its energies in Tonquin, and would not stop until it occupied the entire country up to the frontier of the Chinese empire. Anticipating the objection that the campaign would dangerously diminish the army, which might be needed for European service, he said that the operations necessary to the proposed conquest of Tonquin would in no wise compromise the French military strength at home or interfere with the necessary general mobilization. There were 3,000,000 men in the Republic, the best soldiers in the world, ready to march at a moment's notice in the cause of France. The Parisians are beginning to ask whether a Republic guided by such a man as M. Ferry is much to be preferred to an empire.

An Anarchist Murder was Committed at Frankfurt-on-the-Main on January 13th. Police Councillor Rumpff, who took a prominent part in the detection and prosecution of the anarchists who tried to blow up the Niederwald monument and kill the Emperor, the Crown Prince, and the royal guests, was murdered in front of his own residence. The assassins escaped, but the general belief is that the murder was the work of anarchists, in revenge for the part the Councillor had taken in securing the conviction of Reinsdorf and his companions. The dagger with which the deed was committed twice penetrated the heart of its victim. No robbery was committed.

Special Services at the Brooklyn Tabernacle were conducted last week by the Rev. Samuel P. Jones, who preached three times each day, except Saturday. Large numbers attended the services, and there were many conversions. On Sunday last Dr. Talmage baptized by immersion four new converts. Mr. Jones is preaching this week also every morning and evening, except Saturday.

Major George A. Hilton, to whose Work in the cause of Christianity and temperance we have frequently referred, has decided on resigning his office in the Treasury Department, and devoting himself exclusively to evangelistic labor. Major Hilton has, during the past five years, been working for Christ as far as official duties would permit, and the blessing with which his labors have been attended has led him to consecrate himself wholly to the Master's service. During the next two months he will conduct services in Delaware and lower Maryland.

The Thirty-second Anniversary of the Young Men's Christian Association, of New York City will be held in Association Hall, Twenty-third Street, corner Fourth Avenue, on Monday evening, January 26th, at eight o'clock. A condensed statement of the work of 1884 in the Association building and its six branch rooms in different parts of the city will be presented, and addresses will be made by Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst, D.D., and Hon. Chauncey M. Depew. The doors will be open at 7.30. Admission will be by ticket, which can be secured free on application at the Association Rooms.

The Revival Services Mr. Moody has been conducting in Richmond, Va., were very largely attended in spite of the efforts to arouse sectional antagonism against him. A Press Association despatch from Richmond says: "At most of the meetings hundreds of persons were unable to get into the hall. So great has been the desire to hear Mr. Moody that many persons remained in the building from one meeting to another, afraid to leave the hall lest they should be unable to get in upon their return. Some took their lunches with them, and partook of them before the services opened. Mrs. Stonewall Jackson, who is visiting here with her daughter, has attended several of Mr. Moody's meetings and manifested much interest in his success here. On Sunday morning, January 11th, the revivalist preached to the colored people exclusively at the Ebenezer Colored Baptist Church. The largest gathering of colored worshippers ever seen in this State was present. Several thousand could not get in. Mr. Moody's success has been unprecedented."

The Observance of the Lord's Day on the railroads forms the subject of a circular issued by the Massachusetts State Commissioners of Railroads to the railroad managers of the State. The commissioners recommend that the number of freight trains run on the Sabbath day shall be reduced as far as possible, and that in any event one day's rest in seven shall be secured to every employe. They also recommend that where an employe has conscientious scruples against working on the Lord's day he may refrain from so doing without any fear of discharge or in any way compromising his relations with the company.

The Advantage of Using All Opportunities for religious appeals was illustrated by an incident related at the Fulton Street prayer-meeting, last week. Two gentlemen were on a boat on their way to visit Blackwell's Island. One of them felt prompted to speak to a young woman on board. He hesitated, and then, finding suggesting that he would get his trouble for his pains, or perhaps receive a suggestion to attend to his own business. But the Holy Spirit called for obedience to God, so the brother at once addressed the young woman, and for her shielding herself behind other people's failings. She attended a church where backbiting and quarrelling abounded, and she thought she was as good as these quarrelsome people. "Has that anything to do with your condition before God?" she was asked. This question, it appears, reached her heart and set her thinking. The result of the conversation has been her hopeful conversion.

Two Visits to a Billiard Room were De-scribed on December 26th at the evangelistic meeting conducted by Rev. E. W. Oakes in the Annex Hotel in Fourth Avenue, New York. A man rising in the meeting, and looking around the hall, said he knew the place well. The last time he was in it he played billiards there all day, and would have played all night, too, had he not become so intoxicated that he fell helpless under the table, where he remained until morning. On his second visit he found the place transformed into a Gospel hall, and he himself went away rejoicing in a more important transformation. Old things had passed away with him, all things had become new (John 5:24).

A Reporter's Blunder Recently Furnished matter for suggestive reflection. At a meeting of ministers in New York an address was to have been given by Dr. Cole, of Yonkers; but owing to the inclement weather the attendance was small, and the address was postponed. A reporter thereupon asked Dr. Cole what was the subject of his paper. "Exegesis of First Timothy, third and fifteenth," was the reply. "Exe-what?" queried the reporter. The answer was repeated with clearest possible enunciation. On the following morning, however, the doctor read with some surprise that he would deliver his address, on a specified day, and that his subject would be "Ecce Jesus" (Behold Jesus). The reporter wrote better than he knew. It would be well for the hearers if in the hands of all ministers exegesis meant Behold Jesus (1 Cor. 2:1, 2).

A Titled Stockman who, as Earl of Aylesford, was a member of the British House of Lords, died at Big Springs, Texas, on January 13th. He was a descendant of the great Henricus, Finch, on whom the peerage was conferred in 1714. His life in his own country was one of reckless dissipation. Though an hereditary legislator, with the right to assist in making laws for the people, he was more than once arrested as a law-breaker. His vicious habits were so notorious that when, about nine years ago, his wife abandoned him and he sued for divorce, he was refused it on the ground that his own immoral life precluded him from receiving the relief that would otherwise have been granted him. Three years ago he quitted his aristocratic friends, went to Texas, and became a stockman, and was so engaged when he died. In thus voluntarily humiliating himself and entering upon a life of hardship and privation, he may have had some vague notion of making atonement for the waste of his life and property; but if so, he died without accomplishing it. How striking a contrast, in every aspect of it, is the life of this man to that of Him whose voluntary humiliation brought hope to a lost world! To atone for sins not His own He left His high estate, endured the cross, despising the shame, and by His death purchased an eternal inheritance for all who come to Him (Phil. 2:7, 8).

A Train was Saved from Destruction by a tramp recently on the West Shore Railroad. A poor Irish boy from New York was tramping along the line, and when near Milton, N. Y., he heard something fall with a loud crash. He remembered reading accounts of land slides, so he dropped his bundle and ran back for dear life. He found tons of rock and debris on the rails. The boy started up the line, yelling as he went for somebody to come to him with a red lamp. One of the patrolmen who walk up and down the tracks all night heard the lad's voice in time to bring the rapidly approaching express to a stop before it crashed into the rock boulders. An inspection showed that the rock had fallen in such a position on the track that the locomotive was bound to strike it from the "inside," and the concussion would undoubtedly have thrown the coaches—eight in all—into the waters of the Hudson. The obstruction was cleared away, and the train passed on south nearly two hours late. The boy was not allowed to continue his weary walk, but was taken on board the train, and the passengers made a liberal collection for his benefit. It would have been strange if the engineer had persisted in going on without heeding the boy's warning. In such cases men show more wisdom than they do in spiritual matters. The warnings of a more terrible danger, uttered by preachers and Christian workers, too often fall on deaf ears (1 Chron. 36:16).

A Fight for Poisonous Candies was Stopped by the Police on Thursday last in New York. The Health Department seized a large quantity of the injurious stuff and had it packed on a wagon for transport to the offal dock, to be dumped in the river. Some of the packages were accidentally broken, and the contents fell upon the roadway. Immediately a crowd of children collected and seized some of it. They were driven off, but a lot of bigger boys coming, the crowd overcame the men in charge of the wagon, and managed to secure several handfuls of candies. It was not until a squad of police arrived that the lads were driven off, and even then they assailed the police with stones. Wise people who condemn the foolish children for struggling to obtain that which would have done them harm, may show their wisdom by self-examination. In struggling after wealth and station and other of the world's prizes, men seek that which would often be as harmful to the soul as poison to the body (Prov. 30:8, 9).

A Governor's Dream has Led to the Release of a prisoner in Michigan City, Ind. In passing through the prison on one of his visits, Governor Porter noticed a man whose open, intelligent face impressed itself upon him as that of a man unlikely to be a criminal. He asked the warden about him, and learned that the man was serving out a sentence of sixteen years for murder. The man's face retained its place in the Governor's memory, and that night he dreamed that he saw him standing at the foot of his bed with an agonized, appealing look, beseeching mercy. The next day he made further inquiries, and found that the man had no friends to get up petitions for his pardon. The Governor resolved to investigate the case, though he had received no petition. His inquiries led to the disclosure of extenuating circumstances, which had not been brought to his notice owing to the prisoner's friendless condition. Governor Porter pardoned the man, and sent him fifty dollars to give him a start in life. The pardon of a friendless man is a very unusual occurrence, and is an evidence of the Governor's kindness of heart. In like manner has salvation come to our friendless race, only in that case there were no extenuating circumstances, but infinite love and compassion in the heart of God (Isa. 59:16).

How an Irate Judge was Reproved is Told in the recollections of the late Chief-Justice Bigelow, of Massachusetts. Judge Bigelow went to the president of a railroad, and complained that he had been grossly abused by one of the conductors on the road. The president summoned the conductor to his office after the judge had left, and questioned the man. It appeared that the judge was riding in a car which did not stop at Quincy, where he resided, and as it was passing by, he pulled the rope, and the train was brought to a sudden stop. The conductor rushed into the car and demanded, "Who rang that bell?" "I did," said the chief-justice. "Why?" "Because I wanted to get off," at which the railroad official made some strongly uncomplimentary remarks. Some time afterward the judge and the president met, when the former inquired of the president whether he had reprimanded the conductor. "I spoke to him," was the reply. "Well, what did he say?" "He said that he was coming up some day to adjourn your court." The irate magistrate saw the point, and did not pursue the investigation. The judge would not have laid himself open to the rebuke if he had regulated his conduct by the rule laid down by the Great Teacher (Luke 6:31).

COMING OF AGE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Even so we, when we were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world: but when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father."—GALATIANS 4: 3-6.

A Subject of Unalloyed Delight—The World's Recognition of its Blessing—Looking Forward to the Second Coming—From Childhood to Manhood—I. The Result of the Incarnation—The Kindergarten Quitted—Not Depending on Ceremonies now—The Higher Law of Love—What is implied in Adoption.

THE birth of our Lord Jesus Christ into this world is a wellspring of pure, unmingled joy. We associate with His crucifixion much of sorrowful regret, but we derive from His birth at Bethlehem nothing but delight. The angelic song was a fit accompaniment to the joyful event, and the filling of the whole earth with peace and good-will is a suitable consequence of the condescending fact. I do not wonder that the men of the world celebrate the supposed anniversary of the great birthday as a high festival with carols and banquets. Knowing nothing of the spiritual meaning of the mystery, they yet perceive that it means man's good, and so in their own rough way they respond to it. We who observe no days which are not appointed of the Lord, rejoice continually in our Prince of Peace, and find in our Lord's manhood a fountain of consolation.

Let us consider by the light of our text the special effect produced upon the Church of God by the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ in human flesh. You know, beloved, that His will produce a wonderful change upon the Church. "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun." We are looking forward to His second advent for the uplifting of the Church to a higher platform than that upon which it now stands. Then shall the militant become triumphant, and the laboring become exultant. Now is the time of battle, but the second advent shall bring both victory and rest. To-day our King commands us to conflict, but soon He shall reign upon Mount Zion, with His angels gloriously. When He shall appear we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is. Then shall the bride adorn herself with her jewels, and stand ready for her Husband. The whole waiting creation which now groaneth and travaileth together in harmony with the birth-pangs of the Church shall then come to her time of deliverance, and enter into the glorious liberty of the children of God. This is the promise of the second advent; but what was the

RESULT OF THE FIRST ADVENT?

Did that make any difference in the dispensation of the Church of God? Beyond all doubt it did. Paul here tells us that the Church up to the time of the coming of Christ was like a child at school under tutors and governors; or like a young man not yet arrived at years of discretion, and therefore most fitly kept under restraint. When Jesus came His great birthday was the day of the coming of age of the Church; then believers remained no more children, but became men in Christ Jesus. Our Lord by His first advent brought the Church up out of her nonage and her pupillage into a condition of maturity, in which it was able to take possession of the inheritance, and claim and enjoy its rights and liberties.

It was a wonderful step from being under the law as a schoolmaster, to come from under its rod and rule into the freedom and power of a full-grown heir; but such was the change for believers of the old time, and in consequence there was a wonderful difference between the highest under the Old Testament and the lowest under the New. Of them that are born of woman there is not born a greater than John the Baptist, and yet the least in the kingdom of heaven was greater than he. John the Baptist may be compared to a youth of nineteen, still an infant in law, still under his guardian, still unable to touch his estate; but the least believer in Jesus has passed his minority, and is "no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ."

I. I invite you to consider

THE JOYFUL MISSION

of the Son of God. The Lord of heaven has come to earth; God has taken upon Himself human nature. Hallelujah! This great transaction was accomplished at the right time: "When the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman." The reservoir of time had to be filled by the inflowing of age after age, and when it was full to the brim the Son of God appeared. Why the world should have remained in darkness for four thousand years, why it should have taken that length of time for the Church to attain her full age, we cannot tell; but this we are told, that Jesus was sent forth when the fulness of time was come. There are no loose threads in the providence of God, no stitches are dropped, no events are left to chance. The great clock of the universe keeps good time, and the whole machinery of providence moves with unerring punctuality. It was to be expected that the greatest of all events should be most accurately and wisely timed, and so it was. God willed it to be when and where it was, and that will is to us the ultimate reason.

If we might suggest any reasons which can be appreciated by ourselves, we should view the date in reference to the Church itself as the time of her coming of age. There is a measure of reason in appointing the age of twenty-one as the period of for he is then mature, and full grown. Now, if we were wise enough, we should see that the Church of God could not have endured Gospel light earlier than the day of Christ's coming; neither would it have been well to keep her in gloom beyond that time. There was a fitness about the date which we cannot fully understand, because we have not the means of forming so decided an estimate of the life of a church as of the life of a man. God alone knows the times and seasons for a church, and no doubt to Him the four thousand years of the old dispensation made up a fit period for the Church to abide at school, and bear the yoke in her youth.

The time of coming of age of a man has been settled by law with reference to those that are round about him. It were not meet for servants that the child of five or six should be master; it were not meet in the world of commerce that an ordinary boy of ten or twelve should be a trader on his own account. There is a fitness with reference to relatives, neighbors, and dependents. So was there a fitness in the time when the Church should come to her age with regard to the rest of mankind. The world must know its darkness that it might value the light when it should shine forth; the world must grow weary of its bondage that it might welcome the great Emancipator. It was God's plan that the world's wisdom should prove itself to be folly; He meant to permit intellect and skill to play themselves out, and then He would send His Son. Our Lord and Saviour came when time was full, and like a harvest ready for His reaping, and so will He come again when once more the age is ripe and ready for His presence.

Observe, concerning the first advent, that the Lord was moving in it toward man. "When the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth His Son." We moved not toward the Lord, but the Lord toward us. I do not find that the world in repentance sought after its Maker, No; but the offended God Himself in infinite compassion broke the silence, and came forth to bless His enemies. See how spontaneous is the grace of God. All good things begin with Him.

Mark the divine interposition—"God sent forth His Son." I hope it may not seem wearisome to you if I dwell upon that word "sent"—"God sent forth His Son." I take great pleasure in that expression, for it seals the whole work of Jesus. Everything that Christ did was done by commission and authority of His Father. The great Lord, when He was born at Bethlehem, and assumed our nature, did it under divine authorization; and when He came and scattered gifts with both His hands among the sons of men He was the messenger and ambassador of God. He was the Plenipotentiary of the Court of Heaven. The Son doeth nothing of Himself, but the Father worketh with Him and in Him. O soul, when thou dost lean on Christ thou dost rely upon no uncommissioned Redeemer; but upon One who is sent of the Most High, and therefore is authorized in everything that He does.

Now run your eye to the next word: "When the fulness of time was come, God sent forth His Son." Observe the divine person who was sent. God sent not an angel, nor any exalted creature, but "His Son." How there can be a Son of God we know not. The eternal filiation of the Son must forever remain one of those mysteries into which we must not pry. He existed before He was born into this world: for God "sent" His Son. He was already in being or He could not have been "sent." And while He is one with the Father, yet He must be distinct from the Father, and have a personality separate from that of the Father, otherwise it could not be said that God sent His Son. Oh, the dignity of this, and consequently, oh, the efficiency of it! He that has come to save us is no weak creature like ourselves; He that has taken upon Himself our nature is no being of limited strength, such as an angel or a seraph might have been; but He is the Son of the Highest. Glory be to His blessed name! Let us dwell on this with delight.

"If some prophet had been sent
With salvation's joyful news,
Who that heard the blest event
Could their warmest love refuse?"
"But 'twas He to whom in heaven
Hallelujahs never cease;
He, the mighty God, was given—
Given to us—a Prince of Peace."
"None but He who did create us
Could redeem from sin and hell;
None but He could reinstate us
In the rank from which we fell."

Press on, still keeping to the very words of the text, for they are very sweet. God sent His Son in real humanity—"made of a woman." The Revised Version properly hath it, "born of a woman." Perhaps you may get nearer to it if you say, "Made to be born of a woman," for both ideas are present.

THE FACTUM AND THE NATUM,

the being made and the being born. Christ was really and truly of the substance of His mother, as certainly as any other infant that is born into the world is so. God did not create the human nature of Christ apart, and then transmit it into mortal existence by some special means; but His Son was made and born of a woman. He is, therefore, of our race, a man like ourselves, and not man of another stock. You are to make no mistake about it; he is not only of humanity, but of your humanity; for that which is born of a woman is brother to us, be it born when it may. Yet there is an omission, I doubt not intentional, to show how holy was that human nature, for He is born of a woman, not of a man. The Holy Spirit overshadowed the Virgin, and "that holy thing" was born of her without the original sin which pertains to our race by natural descent. Here is a pure humanity though a true humanity; a true humanity though free from sin.

No sooner was He born of a woman than He came under the law; this voluntarily and yet necessarily. He willed to be a man, and being a man He accepted the position, and stood in the place of man as subject to the law of the race. When they took Him and circumcised Him according to the law, it was publicly declared that He was under the law. During the rest of His life you will observe how reverently He observed the commands of God. Even to the ceremonial law as it was given by Moses He had scrupulous regard. He despised the traditions and superstitions of men, but for the rule of the dispensation He had a high respect. His advent in human form commenced the era of spiritual maturity and freedom.

II. I ask you now, therefore, in the second place, to contemplate which has come of our Lord's incarnation. I must return to what I have said before—the coming of Christ has ended the minority of believers. The people of God among the Jews were before Christ came the children of God; but they were mere babes or little children. They were instructed in the elements of divine knowledge by types, emblems, shadows, symbols; when Jesus was come there was an end of that infantile teaching. The shadows disappear when the substance is revealed; the symbols are not wanted when the person symbolized is himself present. The Christ has come, and now the Kindergarten school is quitted for the college of the Spirit, by whom we are taught of the Lord to know even as we are known. The hard governorship of the law is over. Peter speaks of it as a yoke, which neither they nor their fathers were able to bear (Acts 15: 10). The law was given amid thunder and flaming fire; and it was more fitted to inspire a wholesome dread than a loving confidence. Those sweeter truths, which are our daily consolation, were hardly known, or but seldom spoken.

Methods, one day with Christ was worth a half century with Moses. When Jesus came, believers began to hear of the Father and His love, of His abounding grace, and the kingdom which He had prepared for them. Blessed were they who in their day shared the privilege of the old economy, for it was wonderful light as compared with heathen darkness; yet, for all that, compared with the noontide that Christ brought, it was mere candle-light. The ceremonial law held a man in stern bondage; you must not eat this, and you must not go there, and you must not wear this, and you must not gather that. Everywhere you were under restraint, and walked between

HEDGES OF THORN.

It was quiet right that it should be so, for it is good for a man that, while he is yet a youth, he should bear the yoke, and learn obedience; yet it must have been irksome. When Jesus came what a joyful difference was made. It seemed like a dream of joy, too glad to be true. Peter could not at first believe in it, and needed a vision to make him sure that it was even so. Prohibition upon mere ceremonial points, and commands upon carnal matters are now abolished, and great is our liberty; we shall be foolish indeed if we suffer ourselves to be again entangled with the yoke of bondage. Our minority was ended when the Lord, who had aforetime spoken to us by His prophets, at last sent His Son to lead us up to the highest form of spiritual manhood.

Christ came, we are told next, to redeem those who were under the law; that is to say, the birth of Jesus, and His coming under the law, and His fulfilling the law, have set all believers free from it as a yoke of bondage. None of us wish to be free from the law as a rule of life; we wish that we could keep every precept of the law, without a single omission or transgression. Our earnest desire is for perfect holiness; but we do not look in that direction for our justification before God. Some seem to fancy that baptism and the Lord's Supper have taken the place of circumcision and the Passover, and that while Jews were saved by one form of ceremonial we are to be saved by another. Let us never give place to this idea; no, not for an hour. As to the moral law, which is the standard of equity for all time, it is no way of salvation for us. Once we were under it, and strove to keep it in order to earn the divine favor; but we have now no such motive. Then we strove to do the Lord's will that He might love us, and that we might be rewarded for what we did; but we have no design of purchasing that favor now, since we freely and securely enjoy it on a very different ground.

"What," saith one; "then do you not seek to do good works?" Indeed we do. By God's grace we desire to abound in works of holiness, and the more we can serve our God the happier we are. Ye that are in bondage, and feel the force of legal motives, ye cannot understand how we should serve our Father who is in heaven with all our heart and all our soul, not for what we get by it, but because He has loved us, and saved us, irrespective of our works. We are redeemed from the law in its operation upon our mind; it breeds no fear within us now. I have heard children of God say sometimes, "Well, but don't you think if we fall into sin we shall cease to be in God's love, and so shall perish?" This is to cast a slur upon the unchangeable love of God. I see that you make and think a child is a servant. Now, if you have a servant, and he misbehaves himself, you say, "I give you notice to quit. There is your wage; you must find another master." Can you do that to your son? Can you do that to your daughter? "I never thought of such a thing," say you. Your child is yours for life. Your boy behaved very badly to you; why did you not give him his wages and start him? You answer, that he does not serve you for wages, and that he is your son, and cannot be otherwise. Just so. Then always know the difference between a servant and a son, and the difference between the covenant of works and the covenant of grace.

I know how a base heart can make mischief out of this; but I cannot help it; the truth is the truth. Will a child rebel because he will always be a child? Far from it; it is this which makes him feel love in return. The true child of God is kept from sin by other and better forces than a slavish fear of being turned out of doors by his Father.

"Ah," saith one, "then I may live as I like." Listen! If you are God's child, I will tell you how you will like to live. You will desire to live in perfect obedience to your Father, and it will be your passionate longing from day to day to be perfect even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect. Being born again and introduced into the family of God, you will render to the Lord an obedience which you would not have thought of rendering to Him if you had only been compelled by the idea of law and penalty. Love is a master force, and he that feels its power will hate all evil.

The Lord Jesus Christ has come in human flesh that His people might to the full realize, grasp, and enjoy, of sons." I want you this morning to see if you can do that. May the Holy Spirit enable you. What is it to receive the adoption of sons? Why to feel, Now I am under the mastery of love, as a dear child, who is both loved and loving. I go in and out of my Father's house not as a casual servant, called in by the day or the week, but as a child at home. That is why Christ has come in the flesh—on purpose that you, His people, may be to the full the adopted children of the Lord, acting out and enjoying all the privileges which sonship secures to you.

And then, next, exercise your heirship. One who is a son, and knows he is an heir of all his father's estates, does not pine in poverty, nor act like a beggar. He looks upon everything as his own; he regards his father's wealth as making him rich. Your adoption brings with it large rights; be not slow to use them. "If children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ." Among men, sons are only heirs, heirs in possession, when the father is dead; but our Father in heaven lives, and yet we have full heirship in Him. The Lord Jesus Christ was made of a woman on purpose that His dear people might at once enter into their heirship.

Follow me a minute a little further. The next thing that Christ has brought us by being made of a woman is, "Because we are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts." Here are two sendings. God sent His Son, and now He sends His Spirit. You, oh child of God, have the Spirit of God as your present Guide and Comforter; and He shall be with you forever. The life of Christ is your life, and the Spirit of Christ is your Spirit; wherefore, this day be exceeding glad, for you have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, but ye have received the Spirit of adoption.

There we finish, for Jesus has come to give us the cry as well as the spirit of adoption, "whereby we cry, Abba, Father." According to ancient traditions, no slave might say, "Abba, Father;" and according to the truth as it is in Jesus, none but a man who is of God, and has received the adoption, can truly say, "Abba, Father." He who is the Destroyer, who says, "Return, ye children of men," is my Father, and I am not alarmed at the thought that He will call me to Himself in due time. My God, Thou who shalt call the multitudes of the slain from their graves to live, I look forward with joy to the hour when Thou shalt call and I shall answer Thee. Do what Thou wilt with me, Thou art my Father. Smile on me; I will smile back and say, "My Father." Chasten me, and as I weep I will cry, "My Father." This shall make everything work good to me, be it never so hard to bear. If thou art my Father all is well to all eternity.

Now, dear children of God, if any of you are in bondage under the law, why do you remain so? Let the redeemed go free. Are you fond of wearing chains? Are you like Chinese women that delight to wear little shoes which crush their feet? Do you delight in slavery? Do you wish to be captives? You are not under the law, but under grace; will you allow your unbelief to put you under the law? You are not a slave. Why tremble like a slave? You are a child; you are a son; you are an heir; live up to your privileges. Oh, ye banished seed, be glad! You are adopted into the household of God; then be not as a stranger. I hear Ishmael laughing at you; let him laugh. Tell your Father of him, and He will soon say, "Cast out this bondwoman and her son." Free grace is not to be mocked by human merit; neither are we to be made sad by the forebodings of the legal spirit. Our soul rejoices, and, like Isaac, is filled with holy laughter; for the Lord Jesus has done great things for us whereof we are glad. To Him be glory forever and ever. Amen.

BISHOP WILEY, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, whose portrait appears on the next page, was a man highly esteemed not only in his own denomination, but by all who, having at heart the extension of Christ's kingdom, knew of the value of his labors. His death, on November 22d, while on a missionary visit to Foo Chow, China, was deeply mourned by Christians of all denominations.

Dr. Wiley was under sixty years of age when he died, having been born at Lewistown, Pa., on March 20th, 1825. He was converted in early life, and while he was still only a boy he looked forward hopefully to the possibility of serving God in the ministry. He studied, with that career in prospect, at Dickinson College, and had already, at the age of nineteen, received license to preach. Just at the moment when his usefulness seemed to be reaching fruition he was stricken down by a calamity which appeared then an insuperable barrier to preaching. A period of extraordinary activity in some revival meetings was followed by a painful malady of the throat, which was pronounced incurable.

In this difficulty the young man reluctantly abandoned his hopes of being a minister, and entered upon the study of medicine. He studied at the University of New York, from which he graduated with honor in 1846. He practised at Pottsville, Pa., but his mind always turned longingly to Christian labor. At length God opened the way before him. In 1850 a medical missionary was needed for China, and Dr. Wiley gladly left his native land to go forth as an ambassador for Christ. He remained four years in China, doing valuable work, but the death of his wife and the complete break-down of his own health necessitated his return home.

He became a member of the Newark, N. J., Conference, and labored successively at Newark and Jersey City. He was chosen in 1858 Principal of Pennsylvania Seminary, where he toiled successfully during the following five years. He afterward engaged in editorial work, the Ladies' Repository being placed under his charge. He was so occupied when, in 1872, he was elected Bishop.

In 1877 an opportunity occurred for a foreign tour, and Bishop Wiley eagerly seized it. He made an extended tour in China and Japan, going over the scenes of his early labors with renewed delight. On his return he published his well-known work, "China and Japan," which had a deservedly wide popularity. He was on his third missionary tour in China when he was stricken with illness. Its fatal termination was briefly cabled to New York by his friend, Rev. N. J. Plumb. Bishop Wiley's name must now be added to those whose lives he lovingly described in his "Fallen Missionaries of Foo Chow."

PRIVATE BRICKTON'S IMPRISONMENT.

(See Illustration.)

"SERGEANT, get me a newspaper or a book of some kind, or I shall go mad," said a soldier whose misconduct had secured him three days' confinement in the guard-house. He had been drunk when he was brought in, but having slept off the fumes of the liquor, had whistled all the tunes he knew, and then sung them, and finally, half crazed with the confinement and dull monotony of the hours, appealed to the old sergeant who guarded him for some occupation.

In a few minutes the cell-door was opened by the sergeant, and Brickton stopped in his weary, restless walk up and down the cell, and held out his hand for the newspaper. But the sergeant was offering him a Bible. "This will do you more good than a newspaper," the old man said.

Brickton burst into a laugh. "No, thank you, Sergeant," he said. "My mind is running too much on that line already. I want something to put me on a different track."

"You've been on a different track too long already, young man. It's brought you here, and if you follow it, it will lead you to a worse place. You are going to the devil, Brickton, as fast as your legs can carry you. I'd advise you to try the Bible track now."

"Sergeant," said Brickton, in a bantering tone, and still refusing to touch the sacred volume the old man held out to him, "you ought to be made chaplain. I will speak to the colonel for you next time I dine with him."

"Well, I'll wait till you do dine with him, though a man of your education might have that honor, too, if you were not so fond of making a beast of yourself. I am no chaplain, but I'm an old man who would rather see a young soldier a credit to himself and the regiment, than see him ruin himself and disgrace the regiment by drinking rum."

"You're very good, sergeant, but it is too late to save me now, I guess. I am too far gone on the way to the being you mentioned just now. The devil's got me pretty tight now, and it's more than I can do, or you either, to choke him off."

"You are wrong there, Brickton; you ought to be ashamed to say so, for you know better. Anyhow, I'm going to leave the Bible. You'll get no other reading from me, and you had better take an old man's advice, and read it. It has made a man of me, and when I was your age I did not love it any better than you do." So saying, the sergeant laid the book down on the wash-stand and left the cell, carefully locking the door after him.

The prisoner sat down and looked at the book lying there, and sighed. "A sensible old man that," he muttered. "Seems kind, too, in his way. He is quite right; I am going to the devil, and very fast, too. But I've reformed and sworn off too many times now to make another beginning. It makes one ridiculous to show how weak one is." The despairing man flung himself on the bed and tried to go to sleep. The attempt, however, was futile.

The hours rolled by slowly for the young man in his close prison. Try as he would, he could not get his thoughts into any other channel than that of self-reproach. At last, taking up the Bible in utter despair, he turned to the Book of Joshua, thinking that the description of the strange campaigns of the heaven-appointed general might interest him without arousing his conscience to increased activity. Not half a dozen verses had he read before he came to that inspiring address: "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life; as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee; I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee" (Joshua 1: 5).

Brickton read the words twice. He thought if such words had been spoken to him he would have been a good fighter, and even in his despairing condition his conscience told him that he might win his moral battle under such conditions. He knew enough of religion, as his mother had taught it him, to be aware that God would even now be on his side if he cared to fight the tempter. There came to him a desperate struggle, and at its close Brickton was on his knees asking God if He would help a man too weak to help himself. He read much of the Bible during the time of his imprisonment, and prayed much. He also wrote to his mother for the first time in two years, telling her that he was making a new effort to reform. He frankly said he had no hope of its success, having learned by experience how weak he was before the enemy. But it seemed to him that God had encouraged him to make the effort, and so he was making it.

Many years afterward he used to tell others what God had enabled him to accomplish, and assure them that they might conquer, too, by faith and prayer.

YEDDIE'S COMMUNION.

AMONG the almost endless variety of forms in which mental aberration manifests itself, one of the most pitiful is that of semi-idiotcy. The consciousness of a deficiency of intellect is there, a constant and distressing fact. The idiot is probably a happier being. He is not tormented by a knowledge of his condition. So long as he can have his voracious appetite satisfied, and can sit in the sunshine unmolested, he is content.

But the being who has a small portion of intellect is in worse case. He becomes the butt for the ridicule of his associates, and is in continual fear of some undefined evil falling upon him. While keenly feeling unkindness, he is, as a rule, slow in resentment, and is usually eager to sympathize and help, as far as he is able, any one in trouble. It is remarkable how frequently these poor creatures are able to apprehend the truths of the Christian religion. Very often a mere lad, who has found it impossible to learn the multiplication table or to acquire even the rudiments of education, has grasped the sublimest truth the world has ever heard. The things "hidden from the wise and prudent" have been revealed to these babes of intellect. One such case, which occurred in Scotland, is a striking illustration of this fact.

Yeddie was a poor, half-witted waif, of whose parents nothing was known. He spent his childhood in the county poorhouse, and when he grew old enough to run errands he was placed with a poor old woman, whom the county paid a small sum to keep him. How Yeddie "got religion" we are not told; but as he was allowed to run around as he would on Sundays and week days, he may have gained his knowledge of divine things in some visit to a church or revival meeting. Somehow he did get the knowledge, and it filled his heart. Naturally his conception of Jesus was of a Being kind to the poor and miserable. Yeddie was poor, and often miserable, and he yearned to know more of the divine Friend. He was told that He was not on earth now, but he understood when he was told that Jesus could still love poor Yeddie and could hear his prayers. After that he seemed to be always praying as he went about, and the boys who heard him muttering said Yeddie was talking to his familiar goblin.

One day Yeddie presented himself in his coarse frock and his hob-nailed shoes before the minister, and making a bow, he said: "Please, minister, let poor Yeddie eat supper on the coming day wi' the Lord Jesus." The Lord's Supper was observed quarterly in that thinly-settled region, and was celebrated by several churches together, so that the concourse of people made it necessary to hold the services in the open air.

The minister strove to put off the simple youth as gently as possible. But Yeddie pleaded: "Oh, minister, if ye but kened how I love Him, ye wud let me go where He's to sit at table!" This so touched his heart, that permission was given for Yeddie to take his seat with the rest. And although he had many miles to trudge over hill and moor, he was the first on the ground.

As the services proceeded, tears flowed freely from the eyes of the poor "innocent," and at the name of Jesus he would shake his head mournfully and whisper, "But I dinna see Him." At length, however, after partaking of the hallowed elements, he raised his head, wiped away the traces of his tears, and, looking in the minister's face, nodded and smiled. Then he covered his face with his hands and buried it between his knees, and remained in that posture till the parting blessing was given, and the people began to scatter. He then rose, and with a face lighted with joy, and yet marked with solemnity, he followed the rest.

When Yeddie reached the poor cot he called "home" he dared not speak to the "granny" who sheltered him, lest he might, as he said, "lose the bonny face." He left his "porritch and treacle" untasted; and after smiling and patting the faded cheek of the old woman, to show her that he was not out of humor, he climbed the ladder to the poor loft where his pallet of straw was, to get another look and another word "fro' yon lovely Man." And his voice was heard below, in low tones: "Ay, Lord, it's just poor me that has been sae long seeking ye; and now we'll bide together and never part more." And then his voice grew softer and softer till it died away.

Granny sat over the smouldering peat below, with her elbows on her knees, describing in loud whispers to a neighbor Yeddie's strange words and appearance. "And besides all this," she said, "he refused to taste his supper—a thing he had never done before since the county paid his keeping. More than that, he often ate his own portion and mine, too, and then cried for more; such a fearful appetite he had! But to-night when he cam' in faint wi' the long road he had come, he cried, 'Na meat for me, granny. I ha' had a feast wi' the Lord Jesus, and noo I must e'en gang up the loft and sleep wi' Him.'"

When the morrow's sun arose, "granny," unwilling to disturb the weary Yeddie, left her poor pillow to perform his humble tasks. She brought peat from the stack and water from the spring. She spread her humble table and made her "porritch;" and then, remembering that he went superfluous to bed, she called him from the foot of the ladder. There was no reply.

She called again and again, but there was no sound above but the whistling wind through the openings in the thatch. She had not ascended the rickety ladder for years; but anxiety gave strength to her limbs, and she soon stood in the poor garret which had long sheltered the half-idiot boy.

Before a rude stool, half sitting, half kneeling, with his head resting on his folded arms, she found Yeddie. She laid her hand upon his head, but instantly recoiled in horror. The heavy iron crown had been lifted from his brow, and, while she was sleeping, had been replaced with the crown of the ransom, which faded not away. Yeddie had caught a glimpse of Jesus, and had gone to be with Him forevermore.

A deep awe fell on the parish and the minister at this strange event, and the funeral of the idiot boy was attended from far and wide. A solemnity rarely seen was noticed there, as if a great loss had fallen on the community, instead of the county having been relieved of a burden. And the minister related how eagerly Yeddie had desired to join in the communion, and what a strange heavenly light had been on his simple, usually vacant face as he smiled and nodded to him at the close of the celebration.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

Another Bitter Draught.

THE ordeal John Morley and Hester had dreaded during that long journey home was now at hand. Hester thought it would not come until the next day, and had borrowed Lawson's key and entered the house secretly, so that it might not take place until then. But John Morley chose to precipitate it by declaring that he must see his erring wife that night. Hester would not interfere, and advanced with him toward the room where she knew Rose would be.

With stealthy footsteps, as if they had no right to be in their own home, they crept along the passage until they could command the view of half the room within. It was many years since Hester had looked into it, and she had grown from childhood to womanhood since; but to her eye there was little change. Yet at one corner stood a little bed—she recollected it as her own—but it was not occupied. The child who had been sleeping in it was now being carried to and fro about the room, in the arms of its father, Robert Waldron.

He too had suffered severely. None could look at his face without realizing that. It was pale almost to ghastliness, and across the brow were lines deep as those on John Morley's forehead, graved there by the chisel of sorrow. Just now he was enjoying the only relief he knew, in tending his child. When Carl told him that little Hester was gone to her mother, Robert believed that she was lost to him altogether. He could not meet Rose in her husband's house; he could not even visit his child there.

Mr. Waldron went every day to spend an hour or two with the little granddaughter, whom he could not acknowledge, but who fastened the more closely about his heart. He spoke very gently to Rose, and with a reverence he had not accorded to her in the days when she had been a favorite with him, in spite of her girlish frivolity. The consecration of a great sin, purified by a great sorrow, was upon her. Now and then he addressed to her the few hearty words of fellowship and encouragement by which a true man, who is also a Christian, can bind up the broken in spirit; but they did not converse much. The thoughts of both were centred upon the child whose life was swiftly running to its close. From the moment that she entered under John Morley's roof, they saw that her days were numbered; and on the morning of this day, when John Morley and Hester were hastening homeward, Grant counted the duration of her life by hours.

It was then that little Hester, growing conscious of a change in herself, began to think of those who had made the last few months a holiday to her. Carl was gone away, and she should see him no more; but Annie could come to bid her farewell, and Robert Waldron, who had never been to see her since she had come to be with her mother. She asked Mr. Waldron himself, as he stooped over her bed, the tears in his eyes, and a strange pressure upon his throat.

"Why doesn't he come?" she said. "He used to be very kind to me. If you'd only tell him little Hester is going to die very, very soon, I'm sure he'd come. I loved him very much; almost as much as Carl."

"He shall come to see you, my little child," said Mr. Waldron.

So Robert came at last; back to the pleasant room, where pleasant and guilty hours had passed quickly for him and Rose—hours which had sown deadly seeds broadcast. He could not fly from it now; he could not make haste to leave it behind him. Hester—his child—was dying, and he was not coward enough to desert her death-bed. Rose was there, but he scarcely saw her, scarcely spoke to her. They met for the last time in the presence of their child, but they met as strangers; only one short, quick glance into one another's eyes told their tale of agony and repentance.

"Don't leave me again," moaned little Hester; "I shall die soon; and, oh, I am very tired. Could you carry me about in your arms for a little while?"

This had been her cry from time to time during the day; and Robert, cradling her tenderly in his arms, had paced about the room, gathering up all the scattered memories which lay in ambush for him behind every familiar object upon which his eye rested. How he loathed himself! How he wondered at his own idiotic sin! With what sharp, unutterable pangs every word and moan of the dying child pierced him to the heart! The martyrdom was keener to him than to Rose, whose feebleness softened the anguish of her soul. She was going to follow very quickly; but he would live for many years, with the image of a white face, and small, emaciated limbs, and the echo of a little feeble voice, dwelling forever in the depths of his memory.

It was upon this agony and passion of retribution that John Morley looked, himself unseen, and reading the whole story with his keen and quickened eyesight. There was Robert Waldron, his head bowed down over the form of his dying child, and his heavy feet treading to and fro under his burden, as his own had done in the room below, with a burden as heavy bending down his head. Rose had fallen asleep for sorrow, and was unconscious of the nearness of both of them. She was lying upon the sofa, with a shawl thrown over her; but her head was uncovered, and the light fell upon it. He could see every line traced upon her corpse-like face. If one element of repentance consists in not thinking over again the sins of the pleasant past, it was long since Rose had ceased to dwell upon them. Her husband's heart yearned to her with a great pity, with a passionate tenderness which no other woman had ever stirred within him. She slept, and he would not have her awake. If she had been dead he would not have wished her alive again. But he had never loved her, never grieved for her, as he did now.

It might have been that the bitter sigh which was in his heart rose unbidden to his lips, or that he or Hester made some movement of which they were unaware, for Robert paused suddenly in his dreary march, and turned toward them, peering anxiously into the darkness. The child, too, lifted her feeble head and bent it forward. Hester could restrain herself no longer. With a swift and noiseless step, and with her finger raised in a gesture of silence, she glided into the room, leaving her father still standing without, and took the little child out of Robert's arms. Little Hester nestled down upon her lap, breathing a sigh of measureless content, and gazing up into the sweet face bent over her with a flitting smile upon her own. Robert Waldron knelt down before them both, and felt that the supreme moment of his martyrdom had come.

"Dear Hester," murmured the child, "you are just in time. I've been here having my holidays before I die. But I'm going to die now, very quickly. Did you know, and are you come on purpose?"

"I did not know you were here, my darling," answered Hester. "This is my own home."

"Yes, I know," she said, plaintively; "my mother told me you used to live here when you were as old as me. Was it then you knew my father?"

Hester's pitiful gaze was bent upon Robert, but he could not bear to meet it. He covered his eyes, and bowed his head until it almost rested upon her feet.

"Yes; it was then that I knew him," she answered, very softly.

"I shall know him soon," said little Hester, in a tone of exultation; "very, very soon. I am going to heaven, and I shall see God there; and Jesus Christ, who loves little children so. But He won't be jealous if I love my father very, very much; because I've never known him here, and couldn't love him. You don't think God will be angry, or Jesus Christ, do you, Hester?"

"No, no," she answered, the tears falling fast upon the child's thin hand.

"Hester! Hester!" cried Robert, in an accent of profound anguish.

"Which does he mean?" she asked, touching his bowed head playfully. "There are two of us now. Is it me or the other Hester you are calling to? I don't know what we should do if I was going to live. But I'm very glad, after all, to be going to my own father."

She lay still for a few minutes, as if exhausted, looking up to Hester with a gaze of utter satisfaction. Grant, whom Hester had not seen until then, came forward and shook his head gravely as he felt the failing pulse in the languid little wrist, which he put down gently after he had held it for a few seconds. She turned her eyes away from Hester's face for a moment to look at him.

"You've all been very good to me," she murmured. "You've given me such holidays as I never thought of; but it is too late now; and I'm not sorry. I don't want anybody to be very sorry. Shall you be very sorry?" she added, touching Robert's head again with her cold little hand.

His heart was dead within him, and he neither spoke nor lifted up his face, though she waited for an answer. Rose was awake now, and was creeping toward them, holding by the chairs to steady her failing and faltering steps; while John Morley looked on, seeing all, hearing every word of the child's dying voice, and comprehending every turn of the brief history which was ending thus.

"I don't know what to call you," said the child. "They have all names but you; and I love you very much. I think I love you as much as Carl. If my father had not died, perhaps he would have carried me about like you've done, in your arms. Are you so tired that you cannot look at me?"

"He is not tired," said Hester; "he is too sorry to look at you."

"I don't want him to be so very sorry," she moaned, her lips quivering with grief; "nor anybody else, nor my mother. Tell him not to be like that, Hester. Tell him to look at us. I want to see his face again, because I love him."

"Robert," said Hester, "look at her."

Her voice was almost lost in sobs, and she laid her hand, as the child had done, upon his bowed head. He lifted it up then, and glanced first at her, then at his little daughter, with a look of anguish, such as she had never seen even upon her father's face.

"Why," faltered the child, in broken sentences, "do you think I love Carl the most now? I only loved him most because I knew him first. See, I love you quite as much. Kiss me, and let us be friends before I die. I wish I'd known you all my life, because then I might have loved you most of all. But it wouldn't be right now, would it?"

She had put her hand to his face, and was stroking it fondly; and Robert seized it, and held it passionately to his lips.

"You love me very much," she whispered, "very much. I wonder if my father would have loved me any more! But I shall soon know. Why, there's my mother leaning over our chair, Hester."

Hester had felt Rose beside her for the last minute, but she had not dared to stir for fear of disturbing the easy position of the dying child. Rose spoke in a shrill yet feeble voice, which smote upon John Morley's ear.

"I must tell her," she cried. "Robert! Hester! I must tell her."

"No, no! not now! never, now!" answered Robert.

"Would you like to see your father before you die?" asked Hester, bending more fondly over the little girl.

"I cannot," she said, with a bright glance; "he is waiting for me up in heaven. And my mother says she won't be very long. Let everybody kiss me quickly, for I am going."

She almost raised herself up on Hester's lap, and looked eagerly about her. Grant was standing before her, but she looked past him to the open doorway and the obscure passage beyond, where John Morley's white head stood out clearly in the gloom. She raised her head slowly, pointing toward him; and Rose, turning her eyes in that direction, saw the face of her husband looking toward her in this hour of his vengeance.

"Let him come first and kiss me," said the child, in her dying voice.

John Morley advanced steadily into the room, with every eye fixed upon him intently. Robert alone knowing nothing of what little Hester's words meant, for he had again bowed his head down almost to the ground at Hester's feet. Rose watched her husband; and Hester's imploring gaze never left his face. If there were any bitterness and rancor in his heart now, it would be there forever. No punishment, no remorse could satisfy him if he was not satisfied at this moment. He did not look at Rose, but his eyes were fastened upon the small, wan face resting upon Hester's arm. The little face smiled up at him, and the little hands were stretched out to him.

"You would love me too, if you only knew me," she said. "Kiss me once before I die."

He stood between his wife and Robert Waldron now; he could have laid a hand upon each of them. But he looked only at the child, his eyes fast growing dim, and with an unspeakable compassion in his heart. Resting his hand upon Hester's shoulder, and stooping over Rose's dying child, he laid a long, gentle kiss upon her lips—a kiss which meant more than any words could have said.

"My father will kiss me like that," murmured the failing voice; and Robert raised himself up to look at her once more. The last moment was come. The last kiss her chilling lips could feel had been imprinted there by Rose's husband. He groped about with his hands for an instant, as if to catch at some solid support, and then he fell forward fainting at John Morley's feet.

For an instant no one stirred. John Morley leaned heavily upon Hester's shoulder; but when Grant bent over the senseless form, he pushed him gently on one side, and stooping down he raised Robert in his arms, with a woman's tenderness of touch, and carried him into his own room and laid him upon his own bed.

Grant removed the dead child from Hester's lap, and bade her take Rose down-stairs to her father's sitting-room. Rose shed no tears, but appeared calm and almost apathetic. Hester, carrying a light in her trembling hand, led the way to the gloomy room, where John Morley's life had been wasted. There was a chilly sense of vacancy about it then, for all the every-day confusion had been carefully put into frigid order by Lawson's mother. Hester set Rose down in the old chair on the hearth, and busied herself for some time in lighting the fire, while she sat by, watching her movements with dull but tearless eyes. The rare, refined beauty of Hester's face, pale with suppressed emotions, had never shown itself as it did now. When the fire had burned up, she brought a footstool to the side of Rose, and sitting down, wearily laid her head upon her lap. The fond, daughter-like attitude, the sweetness of Hester's own face, the utter oblivion of her step-mother's sin, expressed by her silence, roused Rose from her stupefaction. She laid both her hands upon Hester's head, and hiding her face upon them burst into a passion of tears.

"Why are you so good to me?" she cried. "Why was I ever born? You would have been happier if you had never seen me, little Hetty. Oh, little Hetty! little Hetty! why did I ever come into this house to be a sorrow to you? Oh, I did not think it would all end in this! And yet you love me through it all!"

"Yes; I love you dearly, poor mother," said Hester, in her softest accents.

"Then you think God will love me in spite of all," murmured Rose.

"I am sure He does," she answered.

"And my husband?" she continued, in a voice of mingled entreaty and incredulity.

"Yes; my father loves you," said Hester; "he forgives you. He has come back knowing you were here. He is taking care of Robert Waldron now. Hush! they are coming down-stairs."

PAUL AT JERUSALEM.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 1, Acts 21: 15-26. Golden Text, 1 Cor. 9: 22. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The New Companion—His Ministration—Paul's Arrival in Jerusalem—His Visit to James—His Wonderful Narrative—Religious Scandal-mongers—Their Identification—Duty in Regard to them—The Advice of the Elders—Their Stratagem—Its Failure.

AFTER their stay at Cæsarea, Paul and his company packed up their few possessions and went on to Jerusalem. A new member was added to their little band, "one Mnason of Cyprus, an old disciple, with whom we should lodge." One who would use what he had of this world's goods in lodging the apostle and his friends, that no burden might fall upon them, and that Paul, now getting an old man, might not lose time in his accustomed search for remunerative employment which should make him independent, and enable him to preach the Gospel without charge. Thus, while Mnason might have had neither power nor opportunity to travel and preach the Gospel like Paul and his company, he could, and did, for them. How many a daughter, whose mother is much occupied in the direct work of soul-winning—in mothers' meetings, work among the fallen, house to house visitation, temperance work, or religious literature—may make her mother's way easy by taking all the little countless opportunities which occur in a house to save her mother's time! By going in to see a caller, by superintending the servants, or where there are none by doing all the work possible, so that the mother shall find it done—the direct work of soul-saving may be blessedly helped forward. A servant who was commended for her kind attention during a time of special services, said: "God has shown me that this is my part in the work which is being carried on." Mnason was "an old disciple." It is just those who have long known the Lord who are willing to take the lowest place, and either do or not do, as the Lord shall show them.

MAKE THEIR WAY EASY

"And when we were come to Jerusalem, the brethren received us gladly." Many false reports had been circulated against Paul by the meddlesome Jews who dwelt in the parts of Asia and Europe where he had travelled. But the personal presence of these men of God among the brethren banished misgivings and prejudice, the presence of God and His Spirit were with them, and the elders recognized it. "The day following Paul went in with us unto James; and all the elders were present. And when he had saluted them, he declared particularly [one by one] what things God had wrought among the Gentiles by His ministry." It was

A WONDERFUL NARRATIVE.

The Lord had wrought with him and confirmed the Word by signs following (Mark 16). The daring adventurousness of Paul's faith, led as he was by the Holy Ghost, his wonderful preservations, were indeed a token of God's faithfulness to His own Word. "Nothing shall by any means hurt you" (Luke 10: 19). He would tell them of Lystra, where he was stoned; of the prison at Philippi after being beaten almost to death, besides those other occasions of which he writes to the Corinthians. "Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I have been in the deep; in journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by nine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; in weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness" (II Cor. 11: 24-27). Speaking afterward to Timothy about all these things, he says, "But out of them all the Lord delivered me" (II Tim. 3: 11).

And then he told of church after church founded and built up with "living stones," truly converted souls. On his former visit to Jerusalem Paul had told of God's work through him in Cyprus, Perga, Antioch in Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe; now he had to tell how Europe, as well as Asia, had been opened to the Gospel. He would speak of the little beginnings in Philippi, which led to the foundation of churches there; at Thessalonica and Berea, at Corinth and Athens, and finally of the glorious work at Ephesus. The elders at Jerusalem had heard one side of the story from the bigoted Jews whose commerce led them up to Jerusalem from time to time, and who from their own side of Pharisaism or Saduceism had spoken of Paul's work. They heard now the account from a man who had no interest in justifying himself or in overcoloring anything he said—a man to whom to live was "Christ" (Phil. 1: 21), and who could say with truth, "Not I live, but Christ liveth in me;" and they glorified the Lord." Of all religious scandal is the worst. A set of busy-bodies exist in every age and in every land whose business it is to create or to foster dissensions among Christians. The Scriptural appellation of such is "diaboli" or "diabolous," translated slanderers or false accusers (I Tim.

3: 11; II Tim. 3: 3; Tit. 2: 3). The devil is the accuser of the brethren par excellence, but scandal-mongers, as the devil's instruments, are also called "devils" by the Holy Ghost. So far for them by whom the offence cometh (Matt. 18: 7). But the vital question for God's children is this: "Shall we undertake our defence, or shall we leave it entirely in the hands of God? We have no distinct command on this subject, but there is very much which bears upon it. Peter says, 'This is thankworthy, if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully. For what glory is it, if, when ye be buffeted for your faults, ye shall take it patiently? But if, when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God' (1 Pet. 2: 19, 20). He cites the example of our Lord Himself to strengthen what he says. One of our Lord's reproaches to the Pharisees was, 'Ye are which justify yourselves before men' (Luke 16: 15). Jesus, 'when He was reviled, reviled not again . . . but committed Himself to Him that judgeth righteously' (1 Pet. 2: 23). If we commit ourselves, we let ourselves go out of our own hands, we abandon ourselves. We cannot both commit our cause to another and undertake our own defence. We cannot be both in the Lord's hands and in our own. We cannot plead our own cause while we leave the Lord to plead it."

ADVICE OF THE ELDERS.

The very elders who glorified the Lord because of His wondrous works through Paul, had hardly drawn in their breath when they prescribed for him human caution, in order to defend himself against the prejudice which had been aroused against him at Jerusalem. "Thou seest, brother," they said, "how many thousands of Jews there are which believe; and they are all zealous of the law; and they are informed of thee, that thou teachest all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying that they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs." Such was the charge to be met. The real truth that Paul taught was, "He is not a Jew, which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision, which is outward in the flesh;" "There is neither Jew nor Greek . . . for ye are all one in Christ Jesus;" "In Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature" (Rom. 2: 28; Gal. 3: 28; 6: 15). Very likely the Jerusalem elders believed that a great deal of the prejudice was unfounded; they knew also that much of it proceeded from pride of heart among the unspiritual Jews; but they could not trust it to the Lord without putting their hands on and mixing human wisdom up with it. Thus they thought of by which Paul's action should justify him in the presence of the people, and their anger and indignation should be appeased. They considered the flesh in the multitude at Jerusalem rather than the present mighty power of God. They suggested that Paul should join a company of four men who had a vow that he should take the Nazarite vow, that he should purify himself and shave his head, and all may know that those things whereof they were informed concerning thee are nothing; but that thou thyself also walkest orderly, and keepest the law." Paul had no direction from God to do this—it was but the counsel of man. Probably to him it was a matter of little import whether he kept the ceremonial law or not; he would not feel condemned either in observing or not observing those rites which were typical of the real life in Christ which he knew and lived. But when it came to making use of these ceremonies to ward off persecution which the Holy Ghost had shown him was coming on him, and which he had accepted from the Lord saying he was ready to die at Jerusalem for the Lord Jesus, it looks as though he succumbed to the influence of the elders at Jerusalem, and allowed his own faith to be overpowered by their human precaution. In any case, the Lord did not allow this plan to succeed; the issue shows how futile it was.

THE foreign missionary field is as varied in its characteristics, in its needs and in its difficulties, as it is in its climate and situation. A greater difference in society cannot be imagined than exists between some of the peoples to which missionaries have carried the Gospel message. In some countries the missionary has found the people so ignorant that his first labor had to be the reduction of their language to writing. In others he has found them highly educated, possessing a literature almost as ancient as the Bible. It is obvious that the style of labor demanded must be equally varied if it is to be successful. There is but one Gospel, and the Holy Spirit applies that with the same power and the same result to the heart of the benighted savage and to the cultured mind of the Brahmin; but the human work is radically different in the two cases. It is well known that the obstacles to the spread of the Gospel are far greater in the land of culture than in the land of utter ignorance. Prejudice, social standing, and family influence are strong intrenchments around Satan's citadel which do not yield so easily as do fear and reverence for gods of wood and stone, which can be proved harmless by a blow with a hammer. In Persia, the home of cultured Mohammedanism, and in India, where caste reigns supreme, the missionary needs all his intellectual vigor, all his faith and all his patience. It was to those lands and to that difficult work that God called the man whose portrait appears on our first page this week.

The late Mr. Hoernle was born at Ludwigsburg, in the little kingdom of Wurtemberg, Germany, on November 24th, 1804, and died at Cannstatt, in the same country, on June 7th, 1882, in the seventy-eighth year of his age. His recollections of his parents, especially of his father, whom he lost when he was only eleven years old, were of a sad and melancholy nature. The time when commenced their married life was a critical period for Germany. Napoleon I. at the head of the French army had invaded the Fatherland; disaster after disaster overtook the German armies, and wherever the French advanced, their steps were marked by burning villages and bloody battle-fields. Many families, previously in easy circumstances, were, in consequence of this French invasion, reduced to great straits; and among these sufferers were Mr. Hoernle's parents. They married young; his father being only twenty-one and his mother nineteen.

The greatest of all their trials began when, soon after their son was born, a painful illness seized Mr. Hoernle's father, lasting many years. In the beginning of 1816, when this illness had reached its height, an uncle living in the town of Cannstatt offered to receive the boy into his house. His father accompanied him a short distance on his way thither, when he was prostrated by pain. Taking his son's hands, he said, "My boy, this is a very important journey for you." These were the last words he heard his father speak. The next day he died in a firm trust in his Saviour, Jesus Christ.

The fatherless lad grew up in his uncle's house and was carefully educated. In the year 1825, when Christian was twenty-one years old, a book called "Stilling's grauer Mann" fell into his hands. In one part of it the author speaks of the solemn signs of the times and the certainty of Christ's advent, and dwells on the final separation that must take place then between the good and the evil; and to this he adds a most powerful exhortation to the reader to decide for Christ while there is opportunity. Mr. Hoernle was deeply moved by this, and vowed to God that he would give himself entirely to the Lord. That book led by the Holy Spirit to the young man's change of heart.

No sooner did he fully realize the blessings of his new condition than he was moved, as all are, by an earnest desire to communicate it to others. With him the desire took practical shape in earnest prayer to God to open the way for him to go out as a missionary to some perishing land. For nearly two years he so prayed, hoping always within his heart to become a missionary. At Easter, 1827, a student of the Missionary Institution at Basle visited the house of Christian's uncle to drink the mineral waters of Cannstatt, and to him the young man confided his hope. The student recommended him to apply to

THE BASLE MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

Dr. Blumhardt, who was then the Principal of the Missionary Institution at Basle, and at that time staying in Cannstatt, had an interview with both the young man and his uncle, with the result that Christian sent in a formal application to the institution. So the first step was taken in that long missionary life, which, including four years' training at Basle, and one year spent in retirement, was to last fifty-four years.

In March, 1832, the young missionary

SET OUT FOR PERSIA.

After considerable difficulty he and two other young missionaries arrived at Shusha, on the Persian frontier, in November, having been eight months on the road. While crossing the River Terek, in the country of the Circassians, they encountered serious difficulties. An immense avalanche had fallen down from Mount Elbrouz, and had filled the valley for nearly a mile with snow, ice, and stones. The river had forced a way for itself beneath all this, but men, animals, baggage and wagons had to be transported over the snow, which was from thirty to forty feet deep, a work of considerable difficulty and danger. The wagons had to be taken to pieces, and every item of luggage carried over separately. The horses fell repeatedly (see frontispiece), and steps had to be cut for them in the ice. The poor animals were trembling with fright, but they reached the bottom safely, and all were thankful to be again in marching order and able to proceed.

Mr. Hoernle made his

in the spring of 1833, about six months after his arrival at Shusha. A friend, Mr. Wolters, accompanied him. They took neither provisions nor tents, but trusted to the hospitality of the Tartars and Armenians, and on this they did not depend in vain. Their plan was to visit all the villages and towns on the southern slope of the Caucasus. One cold night a Tartar woman entertained them in right Oriental fashion, by killing a young kid and baking "cakes," and regaling them with fruit and honey. In the Kour valley they passed one night in the open air, having arrived at the river too late to cross it before dark. The stillness of the night was broken in upon by the howling of jackals, wolves, hyenas, varied by the monotonous sound of night-birds, and the fluttering of large bats and owls. Near to the river they improvised a place to rest in, and after supper and prayer for divine protection, were soon fast asleep. The night passed safely; only once were they alarmed, and then without cause. It was soon after midnight that Mr. Wolters, awakening, saw a pair of yellow eye-balls close to him while his hand was in contact with a furry skin. He started up with the exclamation, "Hoernle! a beast! a beast!" He jumped up, his imagination full of the wolves they had heard in the evening, when they discovered, to their relief and amusement, that it was only a cat which, half perished with cold, had sought a warm quarter between the sleepers.

Mr. Hoernle, with two fellow-workers, was next instructed to remove into the interior of Persia. He travelled in company with some Armenian merchants. They crossed the Aras and spent some months at Isphahan, where, and in the surrounding country as far as Julfa, they distributed Bibles and taught. Mr. Hoernle and his colleagues then set out for Tabreez. A remarkable incident of occurred on the journey. After a very tiring ride they reached, one evening, a Kurdish village, intending to pitch their tent near it. But this the villagers would not allow. The travellers pleaded that it would soon be dark, and that they could not go further, but all in vain. On being asked to show them another place, they did so, but it was so lonely and surrounded by bushes and undergrowth that it looked "a murderous spot" in which to spend a night. However, they accepted it on account of the impossibility of proceeding further.

About midnight Mr. Hoernle awoke suddenly, and hearing voices speaking close to the tent looked out. He saw several men standing behind a hedge. He awakened one of his companions and was just about to step out of the tent to see what the men's intentions were, when he was startled by seeing a huge dog lying across the tent door, which growled at him so fiercely that Mr. Hoernle did not venture to step over him, or drive him away. The dog, he observed, was equally fierce in his demonstrations whenever he heard the men moving outside (see frontispiece picture No. 2). Somewhat reassured by this strange watchman, Mr. Hoernle sought sleep again, and when he awoke at day-break, the dog was gone. Nobody knew whence it had come nor whither it had gone. Had the Lord sent him to protect and save His servants? They were glad to believe that it was so.

In May, 1837, Mr. Hoernle left Persia, having received a call from the Church Missionary Society to labor for Christ in North India. Before taking up his new commission, however, he returned to Germany, and spent, with his relatives in Wurtemberg, nine happy months of needed rest after five years' labor. During this same interval he was married. Shortly afterward the newly-wedded couple went to England to take passage for Calcutta.

CHOICE OF A SHIP OVERRULED.

During their journey from Germany to India they saw a manifest token of God's protecting care. Two ships had been recommended to them, the Protector and the Plantagenet. They went first to the Protector. It was an old, dark-looking vessel, but as there was room and the captain seemed an experienced man they engaged two cabins, and then left the ship in the joyful hope that they would soon be able to sail. On returning to the shore, a gentleman who accompanied them pointed out the other ship, and proposed looking at that as well. They declined at first, thinking it useless, as they had taken cabins already. Being urged, however, on the score of her being a new vessel about to make her first voyage, they consented to go aboard, though more out of curiosity than with any intention of altering their plans. But hardly had they boarded the ship when they were impressed by the feeling that they ought to go in it. At once they acted upon this impression.

When the voyage in the Plantagenet was nearly over they experienced one of those sudden storms for which the coast of India is famous. It was, as usual, preceded by a treacherous calm, during which all was bustle and activity on board preparing for the approaching tempest. Hardly had the captain made the necessary preparations, when the storm broke upon them with frightful fury. The vessel was tossed about on the raging waves like a ball, every plank straining heavily, and the sea dashing over it, as if ready to swallow them up every moment. Mr. Hoernle and Mr. Schneider, a fellow missionary, with their wives, having committed themselves to God in prayer, they tried to sleep, little expecting to see another day on earth. They were, however, mercifully delivered, the good ship nobly bearing the ordeal. A few hours later the storm abated, and a favorable wind sprang up.

When they went on deck in the morning, the sun shone down upon them gloriously, and their offerings of praise and thanksgiving arose to Him who had graciously delivered them from impending death. During the course of the day they had cause for gratitude to God for His guidance in their choice of a ship. On approaching the dreaded "Sandheads" they saw pieces of timber from a wreck floating about, and among them a chest passed by them, upon which they could read the name Protector (see frontispiece picture No. 3). The ship in which they had first intended to sail had been lost in the storm, and of more than two hundred persons on board only four or five were rescued.

Arrived at Calcutta, they proceeded up the River Ganges as far as Allahabad, thence up the Jumna, to Agra, a distance of over thirteen hundred miles, in boats, at the rate of from ten to twelve miles a day. Agra was reached on February 19th, 1839, and Mr. and Mrs. Hoernle were gladly welcomed by the Rev. Mr. Moore, of the Church Missionary Society, and they at once began the work for their Lord. First, about three hundred poor, half-starved, and diseased children were consigned to their care. Then Mr. Hoernle began to preach the Gospel to the natives, and make short missionary tours. At the end of about a year more suitable premises were found at Secundra, about four miles from Agra, and thither the children were transferred.

EPISCOPAL INDOREMENT.

During Mr. Hoernle's residence at Secundra an unhappy dispute arose among his Episcopalian colleagues. Some captious person questioned his right to preach on the ground that he had never been ordained by a bishop, he having been satisfied with his Lutheran ordination. A complaint against him was formally lodged with Dr. Wilson, the Bishop of Calcutta. His reply was an indirect reproof to the dissatisfied party and was administered publicly. Dr. Wilson visited Secundra and preached there. There was a crowded congregation. When near the close of an eloquent sermon, and when every eye was riveted on the Bishop he commended to the love and sympathy of all Christians all those who had left their native country to serve Christ in India. Then suddenly turning round in the pulpit, and pointing to Mr. Moore and Mr. Hoernle, he said, "There are two of these holy missionaries; look at them! they are the servants of your Lord" (see frontispiece picture No. 4). Of course every eye was directed toward them. The Bishop's intention was to show that though in different orders he looked upon them as fellow-laborers in the same cause, harmoniously working together to extend the kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The work of Mr. and Mrs. Hoernle at the Secundra Orphanage became a means of great temporal and spiritual blessing. Their care of the destitute ones included food and clothing, school education, instruction in useful trades whereby they might in due time earn their own living; and, lastly, but chiefly, religious teaching and training. Many of those thus trained subsequently engaged in successful evangelistic labor among their countrymen. It was congenial work and Mr. and Mrs. Hoernle worked untiringly among the poor children with much success (see frontispiece picture No. 5).

In November, 1848, Mr. and Mrs. Hoernle obtained permission to re-visit Europe, to recruit their strength and energies, and in the summer of 1849 they once more greeted their beloved ones in their dear Fatherland. But the holiday soon came to an end. Leaving their six children behind them in Europe to carry on their education, the devoted heralds of the cross resolutely set their faces in the direction of India, where they arrived in January, 1851, and on the 9th of March once more found themselves at Secundra.

Two years afterward it was deemed necessary that Mr. Hoernle should foster the work of the mission in Agra; and he accordingly settled there, preaching the Gospel.

IN THE BAZAARS AND STREETS of the city, in the villages and at the melas, or fairs. He was so engaged when, in the year 1857, the dreadful mutiny broke out, which, for its cold-blooded and inhuman atrocities will stain forever the annals of the country. Happily an unexpected need had caused Mr. and Mrs. Hoernle to take a short journey, and they were temporarily absent from the city when it was seized by the mutineers.

It may be stated incidentally here for the benefit of people liable to be misled by the statements of certain popular writers of our own nationality that the English Government did not commit the cruelties with which it was charged in suppressing the mutiny. The provocation was intense, for soldiers and civilians who, having been absent when the mutiny broke out, saw on their return

A SIGHT NEVER TO BE FORGOTTEN.

The helpless women and children had been driven into a large building, and while they were caged there, the mutineers had employed common butchers to go in and with their axes chop in pieces the poor creatures. They did their work with fiendish cruelty, stripping the women naked before hacking off their limbs, and killing the children first to increase the agony of the mothers who witnessed the slaughter. The place was ankle-deep in blood when the husbands and fathers saw it. In spite of this agonizing spectacle there were no such acts of vengeance as have been alleged. Such of the guilty men as were caught were fairly tried, and the guilty were executed as they deserved. We know whereof we testify, and we explicitly state that the cruelties charged on that Government by writers who ought to know better, are wicked falsehoods.

No work could be done by Mr. and Mrs. Hoernle during that terrible time, for the Mission House and the Orphanages had been utterly destroyed. They therefore acceded to a suggestion of the Missionary Society that they should return to Europe to superintend the printing of a fresh edition of the Urdu New Testament. On their way to Calcutta, they again visited Agra, and, as may be imagined, longed intensely to see Secundra again. They felt, however, that the sight of the destruction of their former home would be too much for them by daylight. So they drove out one moonlight evening. They could never fully trust themselves to speak of what they saw and felt on reaching it. Silently they knelt down on a heap of ruins and let their tears flow freely (see frontispiece picture No. 6). A few days later they continued their journey, and on December 28th, 1858, after an absence of rather more than eight years, were once more surrounded by their children in Germany.

The edition of the Urdu New Testament, whose progress through the press he had conducted, having been finished, Mr. Hoernle and his wife set sail again for India in December, 1860. Calcutta was reached on January 31st. He proceeded to take charge of the Meeruth Mission, to which he had been appointed by the parent Committee, and the new scene of his work was reached toward the end of April, and into it he threw himself with characteristic energy and determination. From morning till night, day after day, and often till late at night, without any thought for himself he labored on; in the church, the school, the study, carrying on a large business correspondence, devising means and plans for extending his work, preaching in the bazaars of the city and cantonments (see frontispiece picture No. 7), visits to the outstations; keeping accounts; making plans for new churches, schools, etc.; and this for a period entirely single-handed, often almost worn out with weakness and fatigue and the growing infirmities of age, till, at last, in 1874, in his seventieth year, he was obliged to relinquish the greater part of the Meeruth Mission to his eldest son, the Rev. J. G. H. Hoernle, who, at his request, was appointed his successor.

As years passed by, and the difficulties of his mortal pilgrimage increased, he was conscious of a deepening desire to be "absent from the body and present with the Lord." Almost the last entry which he made in his diary, in India, was this: "Oh, it is so beautiful, so cheering, to look away from all the turmoil of this life to the dwellings of peace and love. There is my home, too; thither my spirit is drawn irresistibly. Oh, that I were there already!" (See frontispiece picture No. 8). In the year 1881, it became evident that he had reached the last stage of his long life.

In the beginning of 1881, therefore, Mr. and Mrs. Hoernle bade farewell to India, and in course of time reached Cannstatt, in Germany, the home of their childhood. In the midst of the peaceful engagements of old age, the last summons of the Great King reached the herald of the cross on June 7th, 1882, after a short illness of only a fortnight's duration. He was not quite seventy-eight years old when he "fell asleep," having spent nearly fifty years of his life in the missionary service of his Lord.

A More Humane System of Treatment for the insane should result from the publication of the report of the Alabama Insane Hospital, at Tuscaloosa, which recently appeared in the New York Herald. The superintendent, Dr. Bryce, who has six hundred and thirty patients under his care, in the course of his report mentions that two years ago, in spite of predictions of disaster, he abolished all mechanical restraints in the asylum, and did not replace them by quieting medicines, but relied solely on kind treatment. Of the system of non-restraint, Dr. Bryce now says: "I desire, after an extended trial, to record my unqualified conviction of its great value and perfect practicability, and I am fully sustained in this opinion by every physician, officer, nurse, attendant, and employé of the hospital. I can truly say that there is scarcely a feature of our general management that has not been favorably modified under its influence. Its effect upon the nurses, in making them kind, patient, and considerate, and upon the patients in making them trustful, respectful, and courteous, is simply marvellous." It may be hoped that Dr. Bryce's example will encourage other asylum managers, especially in New York State, to give the system a trial.

A Triumphant Cripple.—An Earnest Worker for the Lord narrates the following story: "One evening, as a friend and myself were sitting at our window, we noticed, coming up the street, a coarse-made two-wheeled wagon, drawn by a young girl, in which lay a crippled boy. The poor lad's whole being indicated great suffering. Day after day we watched the cripple, for every afternoon he passed our window. Several successive days passed without his coming. At last his sister came alone, and her face bore the traces of tears. We hurried to inquire what was the matter with the boy. She told us that a few days previously she had not been able to draw him, and a neighbor had offered to draw his vehicle, but not knowing how to manage it, had upset it, throwing her brother on the pavement; and since then he had not left his bed. Next morning we went to see him. As we entered the boy turned toward us with a look of the most touching gratitude. When we spoke to him he seemed too feeble to utter a word. I told him that we were not strangers, that we had a common father in heaven. 'Do you know my Saviour?' he joyfully exclaimed. We told him that we did. We visited him every day for several weeks, and one evening, his last upon earth, we went to see him. 'Lay my weary head upon your bosom, mother,' he said; 'my heart is already with Jesus.' He was calm and joyful, conscious that the hour of his departure had come. He thanked his parents for their care, and gently breathed his last. He was more than conqueror through Christ who loved him."

NOONTIDE OF LIFE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, January 25, 1885.

"Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon?"—SOLOMON'S SONG 1: 7.

REFERENCE is here made to the habit of shepherds in taking their flocks about twelve o'clock of the day, under the shadow of trees or rocks, and by cool streams, for repose. It is a noon-day scene, and typical of life at the meridian. I have received about one hundred letters of birthday greeting from all professions and occupations, and from all parts of Christendom, reminding me that I am fifty-three years of age. It is with me the warmth and the light and the vigor of a July noonday.

My discourse will speak of life at the meridian. I will tell you now, and how it seems to me when I look backward and forward. The prayer of the text is appropriate for me to offer, and for many of you to offer: "Tell me, O Thou whom my soul loveth, where Thou makest thy flock to rest at noon." Noon lay privilege. Noonday joy. Noonday reflection.

If you ask me how life seems to me now, I answer, "Very bright." I have had sad days, dark days, tumultuous days, but there is now not one cloud on my sky. My surroundings suit me exactly. My friends are kind and sympathetic and indulgent. Excepting your own, I have the best family on earth! The world is to me a most agreeable abode. I have nothing against the weather; for if it be cold I have stout apparel, and if it be hot I fly to the mountains, and if it be stormy, as it is to-day, I carry my own sunshine. I have no indictments to present against anybody or anything. After all the contests in which I have been engaged, there is not a being with whom I would not willingly—ay, gladly, shake hands. It seems to me that in some respects the hill-top in the journey of life is the best part of the journey.

While in early life we are climbing up the steep hillside, we have worries and frets, and we slip, and we fall, and we slide back, and we run upon sharp antagonisms, and all the professions and occupations have druggeries and sharp rivalries at the start. We are afraid we will not be properly appreciated. We toil on, and we pant, and we struggle, and we are out of breath, and sometimes we are tempted to lie down in the bower of lazy indulgence. In addition to these difficulties of

of life, there are those who rejoice in setting a man back and trying to make a young man cowed down. "De Witt," said a man to me as we were walking the fields at the time I was in the theological school—"De Witt, if you don't change your style of thought and expression, you will never get a call to any church in Christendom as long as you live." "Well," I replied, "if I cannot preach the Gospel in America, then I will go to heathen lands and preach it." And every young man has had somebody to meet him, as he was climbing up, and say to him: "Don't, don't—you can't, you can't—quit, quit!" Every young man has twenty disheartenments where he has one round word of good cheer. But after we have climbed to the top of the hill of life, then we have comparative tranquillity and repose. We begin to look about us. We find that it is just three miles from cradle to grave: Youth the first mile, manhood the second mile, old age the third mile. Standing on of the journey of life and in the second mile, having come up one side the hill, and before I go down the other side, I want to tell you that life is to me a happiness, and much of the time it has been to me a rapture, and sometimes an ecstasy.

I would be the worst ingrate on earth if I did not acknowledge the goodness of God and tell you this morning that the profoundest emotion of my soul is one of gratitude to God for His undeserved mercy, in that in the twenty-nine years of my professional life I have missed but one day of service through ill-health, and that omission was twenty-four years ago. Oh, how good God has been to me, while I have seen others with a hundredfold more consecration than I have had, who have staggered under burdens of pain, incapacitated for work for which they were otherwise gloriously equipped; and I must this day rear a monument to the divine goodness, as did one of old, and inscribe on it: "Hitherto hath the Lord helped me." This life has been to me and is now a great happiness; and if the atheistic theory should be true that annihilation comes after death, and the sepulchre, instead of being, as we believe it to be, simply where we rest for a night and in the morning, fully invigorated, we start out on grander journeying amid brighter prospects—I say, if the sepulchre should be the abolition of body and soul, I am nevertheless glad that I live, and that I live here, and that I live now.

There has been a great deal of wholesale

SLANDER OF THIS WORLD.

People abuse it, and the traveller on the mountain curses the chill, and the voyager on the deep curses the restlessness, and there are those who say it is a mean, old, despicable world, and from pole to pole it has been calumniated; and if the world should present a libel suit for all those who have slandered it, there would not be gold enough in the mountains to pay the damages, or places enough in the penitentiaries to hold the offenders. The people not only slander the world, but they slander its neighbors, and they belabor the sun, now because it is too ardent and now because it is too distant; but by experience coming up the hill of life I have found out when there is anything wrong the trouble is not with the sun, or the moon, or the stars, or the meteorological conditions; the trouble is with myself. Oh, I am so glad that while this world as a finality is a dead failure, as a hotel where we stop for a little while in our travelling on toward a better place, it is a very good world, a very kind world, and I am glad that the shepherd in so pleasant a place makes his flocks to rest at noon!

But having told you how life seems to me on the hill-top of the journey, you naturally want to know how it seems to me when and when I look forward. The first thing a traveller does after climbing up to the top of a mountain is to take a long breath, and then look about and see what is all around him. He sees out in this direction the winding road up which he came, and out in that direction the winding road down which he shall go. And so, standing on the hill-top of life's journey, I put my outspread hand to my forehead, so as to keep off the glare of the noonday's sun, and to concentrate my vision, and I look back on the winding road on which I have travelled, and I see far on down at the foot of that road, in the dim distance, something small, something insignificant, and it vibrates, and it trembles, and it rocks. I wonder what it is. I guess what it is.

A CRADLE!

Then I turn, and still keeping my outspread hand to my forehead so as to shade my eyes from the glare of the noonday's sun, and to concentrate my vision, I look on the winding road down which I shall travel, and I see at the foot of the road something that does not tremble, does not vibrate, does not rock—something white—and then near it a bank of the earth, and I wonder what it is. Ah! I see what it is. I guess what it is. I know what it is.

A GRAVE.

So, standing on the hill-top, having come up one side the hill, and before I go down the other side, you ask me two or three questions, and I tell you that I have learned in coming up this side of life, the steep side, the first side—I have learned that nothing is accomplished without hard work. Although I have been prospered to the last degree, I never had any good luck. I have heard people talk a great deal about a streak of good luck. In all my life I never had one streak of good luck. But I have had a good God watching me, guiding me, controlling me, helping me, forgiving me, correcting my mistakes, and He has always blessed me when I worked hard, and He did not bless me so much when I was lazy! Whether my work has amounted to anything or not I must leave to others to judge; but during the past twenty-nine years I have worked to my full capacity of endurance, and if I have gone off to rest, it was only to qualify me for hard work, and all this against the full protest of my nature, for I sometimes have felt I was naturally the laziest man that was ever born. But I am as afraid of indolence as any reformed inebriate is afraid of the wine cup. He knows if he shall take one glass he will be flung back into inebriacy. And I am afraid if I should take one long pull of nothing to do I would stop forever. So I keep busy all the time. And I say to the multitude of young people here to-day starting in occupations and professions, nothing is accomplished without work, hard work, continuous work, all-absorbing work, everlasting work.

A parishioner asked a clergyman why the congregation had filled up and why the church was now so prosperous above what it had ever been before. "Well," said the clergyman, "I will tell you the secret. I met a tragedian some time ago, and I said to him, 'How is it you get along so well in your profession?' The tragedian replied, 'The secret is, I always do my best; when stormy days come, and the theatre is not more than half or a fourth occupied, I always do my best, and that has been the secret of my getting on.' And the clergyman reciting it, said: 'I have remembered that, and ever since then I have always done my best.' And I say to you, in whatever occupation or profession God has put you, whether the world appreciates it or not, do your best—always do your best. Domitian, the Roman emperor, for one hour every day caught flies and killed them with his penknife; and there are people with imperial opportunity who set themselves to some insignificant business. Oh, for something grand to do, and then concentrate all your energies of body, mind, and soul upon that one thing, and nothing in earth or hell can stand before you. There is no such thing as good luck.

DO YOUR BEST;

I have learned also in coming up this steep hill of life, that

ALL EVENTS ARE CONNECTED.

I look back and now see events which I thought were isolated and alone, but I find now they were adjoined to everything that went before and everything that came after. The chain of life is made up of a great many links—large links, small links, silver links, iron links, beautiful links, ugly links, mythical links, solemn links—but they are all parts of one great chain of destiny. Each minute is made up of sixty links, and each day is made up of twenty-four links, and each year is made of three hundred and sixty-five links; but they are all parts of one endless chain which plays and works through the hand of an all-governing God. No event stands alone. Sometimes you say, "This is my day off." You will never have a day off. Nothing is off.

Your coming here this morning, which was not long premeditated, and may seem to you only accidental, is an event which will mean more to you than any worldly event of the last ten centuries, and which will mean more to you than the final destruction of this world, because it is going to decide where you will be after all worlds are demolished, some by collision and some by explosion, some by fracture and some by hurricane, some by frost and some by conflagration—all worlds destroyed except two, and those rolling on, the one through cycles and immensities of rapture, and the other through cycles and immensities of pang—rolling up, rolling up, rolling down, rolling down. Two worlds—the one a charred and the other an irradiated sphericity! But if you continue to ask me how the past seems, I answer it seems like three or four Düsseldorf, Louvre, and Luxembourg—their corridors interjoining. Boyhood gallery, church gallery, home gallery.

Boyhood gallery in my memory. I close my eyes and see them coasting the hillside, and flying the kite, and trundling the hoop, and gathering nuts in the autumnal forests, and then a little while after bending in anxious study over the lexicons and the trigonometries. Where are those comrades? Most of them gone. Some are in useful spheres on earth. Some died in rapture, and a good many of them perished in dissipation before thirty years of age. The wine-cup with its sharp edge cut the jugular vein of their soul. Poor fellows! They tried the world without God, and the world was too much for them. Splendid fellows! Oh, what forehead they had for brain, and what muscle they had for strength, and what gleam of eye they had for genius, and what loving letters they got from home, and how they carried off the bouquets on Commencement Day! But they made the terrific mistake of thinking religion a superfluity, and now they are in my memory, not so much canvas as sculpture—some Laocoon struggling with snapped muscles and eyes starting from the socket for torture; struggling amid the crushing folds of a serpentine monstrosity, a repulsive horror, a Laocoon worse than that of the ancients.

Salan has a fastidious appetite, and the vulgar souls he throws into a trough to fatten his swine; but he says: "Bring to my golden plate all the fine natures, bring to my golden plate all the clear intellects, bring them to me; my knife will cut down through the lusciousness; fill my chalice with the richest of their blood; pour it in until it comes three fourths full; pour it in until it comes to the rim of the chalice; pour it until the blood bubbles over the rim. There, that will do now. Oh, this infernal banquet of great souls! Aha! aha! let the common demons have the vulgar souls, but give to me, who am the king of all diabolism, the jolliest and gladdest and the grandest of all this immortal sacrifice. Aha!"

There is another picture gallery in my mind, THE CHURCH GALLERY.

the people to whom I have administered in the Gospel, and who are gone now to the better country. Belleville gallery. Syracuse gallery. Philadelphia gallery, Brooklyn gallery. Some of those figures in the gallery have frame of hosanna and hallelujah. Sweet spirits, glorious spirits, transported spirits, blessed spirits! Dying children with faces like that in Raphael's "Madonna." Octogenarians with patriarchal demeanor, and a look which makes me think that Elijah having arrived sent back his flaming equipage to bring up another passenger. Fair maidens in death looking like a transfiguration. Young men dying with anthem on the lip and flash of pearl-line portal in the eye.

Then in my mind there is

THE HOME GALLERY.

Oh, those dear faces, old faces and young faces, faces that have lost nothing of their loveliness by the recession of years, faces into which we looked when we sat on their laps, faces that looked up to us when they sat on our laps, faces that wept, faces that laughed, faces wrinkled with old age, faces all aflood with juvenile jocundity, faces that have disappeared, faces gone.

THE PATH AHEAD.

But you ask how the rest of the journey appears to me. As I look down now, having come up one side, and standing on the hill-top, and before I take the other journey, let me say to you, the road yet to be travelled seems to me brighter than the one on which I have journeyed. I would not want to live life over again, as some wish to. If we lived life over again we would do no better than we have done. Our lives have been lived over five hundred times before. We saw five hundred people make mistakes in life, and we went right on and made the same mistakes. Our life was not the first. There were five hundred or a thousand people living before us. We did not profit by their example. We went right on and broke down in the same place, and if we did not do any better with those experiences before us, do you think we would do any better if we tried life over again? No. I should rather go right on. If we tried life over again we would repeat the same journey.

"But," says some one, "don't you know there may be trials, hardships, sicknesses, and severe DUTIES AHEAD?"

Oh, yes! But if I am on a railroad journey of a thousand miles, and I have gone five hundred of the miles, and during those five hundred miles I have found the bridges safe, and the track solid, and the conductors competent, and the engineer wide awake, does not that give me confidence for the other five hundred miles? God has seen me through up to this time, and I am going to trust Him for the rest of the journey. I believe I have a through ticket, and although sometimes the track may turn this way or the other way, and sometimes we may be plunged through tunnels, and sometimes we may have a hot box that detains the train, and sometimes we may switch off upon a side track to let somebody else pass, and sometimes we may see a red flag warning us to slow up, I believe we are going through to the right place.

I have not a fear, an anxiety, this morning that I can mention. I do not know one. I put all my case in God's hands, and I have not any anxiety about the future. I do not feel foolhardy.

I ONLY TRUST.

I trust, I trust, I trust! And—for there are those here of my own age—let me say, when we come to duties and trials and hardships, God is going to see us through.

The late Willard Parker, the eminent surgeon, had brought to him for treatment. Those of you who have travelled in Switzerland know of the awful swelling that is called the goitre. The patient brought to Dr. Parker was a millionaire many times over, and they wanted the doctor to perform the surgery and to warrant the safety of the patient and his recovery, and they said they would give him a million dollars if he would warrant the undertaking. "Oh," said the doctor, "I cannot warrant anything, but I will do the best I can!" My friend said to Dr. Parker, "How did you feel when you were about to undertake that surgery?" "Well," said he, "my hand trembled dreadfully, because, you know, I am an old man now; my hand trembled dreadfully; but just as soon as the instrument touched the delicate place my nerves were steel, and without any excitement I went right through the successful operation, and with no anxieties; as soon as I began my hand was firm." And we may have a great many anxieties about what is to come in life, and we may tremble about the great responsibility, but when we come up to the right place God will steady our hand. He will take hold of us, He will give us courage, and without any perturbation we will go right through.

ALL I WANT TO KNOW

is, that God has my hand and is helping me on. And beside that, notwithstanding all the balderdash of infidels and atheists and free-thinkers in our time, I am quite certain—I am very certain—that right beyond this life there is another life. The three miles of this journey, from cradle to grave, are not an inch long compared with that other life which then will begin, and the picture gallery ahead is brighter than the picture gallery in the rear. Ay, we take the best of those pictures from the gallery in the rear, and on step-ladder of amethyst we go up, and with loops of celestial light we hang those pictures against the burnished wall of heaven. Look, look! There is Christ. Cuypp painted Him for earthly gallery, and Correggio and Tintoretto and Benjamin West and Doré painted Him for earthly galleries, but all those pictures are eclipsed by this MASTERPIECE OF HEAVEN.

Christ! Christ! There is Paul, the hero of the Sanhedrim, and of Agrippa's court-room, and of Mar's Hill, and of Nero's infamy, shaking his chained fist in the very face of teeth-chattering royalty. And here is Vashti, the profligacy of the Persian Court unable to remove her veil of modesty, or rend it, or lift it. And all along the corridors of this picture gallery I find other great heroes and heroines—David with his harp, and Miriam with the cymbals, and Zechariah with the scroll, and St. John with the seven vials, and the resurrection angel with the trumpet.

On lurched in the corridors I see the faces of our loved ones, the cough gone from the throat, the wanness gone from the cheek, the weariness gone from the limbs, the languor gone from eye. Let us go up and greet them. Let us go up and embrace them. Let us go up and live with them. We will! we will!

HILL-TOPS OF HEAVEN.

From this hill-top of life I catch a glimpse of those hill-tops where all sorrow and sighing shall be done away. Oh, that God would make that world to us a reality! Faith in that world helped old Dr. Tyng, when he stood by the casket of his dead son, whose arm had been torn off in the threshing-machine, death ensuing; and Dr. Tyng, with infinite composure, preached the funeral sermon of his own beloved son. Faith in that world helped Martin Luther without one tear to put away in death his favorite child. Faith in that world helped the dying woman to see on the sky the letter "W," and they asked her what she supposed that letter "W" on the sky meant. "Oh," she said, "don't you know? W stands for welcome." O Heaven, swing open thy gates! O Heaven, roll upon us some of thine anthems! O Heaven, flash upon us the vision of thy lustre!

HOMEWARD BOUND.

An old writer tells us of a ship coming from India to France. The crew was made up of French sailors, who had been long from home, years gone away from their families; and as the ship came along by the coast of France the men became uncontrollable, and they skipped the deck with glee, and they pointed to the spires of the churches where they once worshipped and to the hills where they had played in boyhood. But, the writer says, when the ship came into the port, and these sailors saw father, and mother, and wife, and loved ones on the wharf, and heard these loved ones call them by their names, they sprang ashore and rushed up the banks into the city, and the captain had to get another crew to bring the ship to her moorings. Thus, heaven, our fatherland, will after a while be so fully in sight we can see its towers, and we can see its mansions, and we can see its hills; and as we go into port, and our loved ones shall call from that shining shore, and speak our names, we will spring to the beach, leaving this old ship of a world to be managed by another crew, our rough voyaging of the seas ended forever.

"Rocks and storms I'll fear no more,
When on that eternal shore;
Drop the anchor, furl the sail,
We are safe within the vail."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Good Company in a Hospital.—At a recent meeting Mr. Gullacher said: "I shall never forget a woman to whom I spoke in the Infirmary. I said to her, 'You must sometimes be very weary lying here, with scarcely any one coming near you.' 'Weary,' she repeated, 'weary! no; I am never weary with such good company always with me.' Scarcely understanding her meaning I asked her what company she meant. She answered, 'I have the best of company, the Lord Jesus, and with such company one need never weary, even the Infirmary ward is like a mansion in the Father's house on high.'"

A Rum-seller's Sneer.—A Christian Man thus testified: "One night I was standing at the entrance to my house debating with myself whether I should go into the saloon and spend what money I had, or whether I should go over to the temperance meeting and sign the pledge. The rum-seller passed just at that moment, and asked me if I was coming to have a glass of beer to-night. I was just about to go away with him, when the workers from an open-air meeting came up, and the rum-seller remarked, with a sneer, 'There are the reformed drunkards!' 'Well,' I replied, 'if these are the reformed drunkards, I am going to be one of them,' and with these words I ran and pushed myself in among them. I gave myself to Jesus and signed the pledge that night, and He has kept me ever since."

An Affecting Dream.—Mr. Smith Remarks: "I do not believe much in dreams, but still I believe they are occasionally sent to us by God for a purpose. The father of a friend of mine had a dream. He dreamed that he was standing in a room which was very dirty; cobwebs were hanging all round the walls and ceiling, and the floor was covered with stains, and as he looked out at the window he thought he saw Jesus standing on the other side of the road with such a pitying look in His face. The man then began to try and sweep away the cobwebs, but the more he tried the worse they became, and when he looked out at the window again, Jesus was standing close to it with, oh, such a sad face! looking at him. He began to try and remove the stains from the floor, but it was useless. What was to be done? The harder he worked the worse matters became. At last he opened the door, and Jesus walked in, and instantly the filthy room was cleansed; no stains or cobwebs remained. Oh, friends, when you are working and trying to make yourself better, the first thing to be done is to open the door of your heart, and let Christ in."

Nelly's Return and Welcome Home.—A Christian gentleman related the following: "One night in winter as I was hurrying to our evening meeting where I reside, I noticed a very miserable, half-clad creature shrinking into the shadow of the church. I invited her to come into the meeting, which, after some pressing, she was induced to do. Sitting down in a seat near the door, she looked fearfully round, lest any one present should recognize her. When the minister began to speak, she sat silently weeping. At the close of the meeting I asked her if she had far to go. A little startled, she answered, 'I have nowhere to go.' 'Nowhere to go in such a night?' I rejoined. Amid many tears she told me a story of loving, believing, and trusting a man who had heartlessly brought her to shame. She had left her mother's house for the purpose of getting married, and that very night he left her, and she had not seen or heard anything of him since. 'And now,' she said, 'I can never return home, because I opposed my dear mother's wish.' That night she gave her heart to Jesus. I placed her in charge of some lady friends, and in a few days she yielded to our entreaties, and was willing to go and beg her mother's forgiveness. I accompanied her to the door of her mother's house; but her heart failed her when she got there; telling her to stay behind, I knocked at the door, which was answered by Nelly's mother. I inquired

'Have you a daughter named Nelly?' 'I had a daughter,' she said, 'but I have no daughter now. Nelly is not living, or I would have heard from her long ago.' 'You never heard of her death?' I inquired. 'No, no; if you know anything about her, tell me quickly, and don't break my heart.' I opened the door, and called her. When the young woman entered, her mother screamed, and, sinking into a chair, exclaimed: 'Oh, what a Saviour! Nelly's head was in her mother's lap in a moment. The scene was too sacred to look upon, and I left them alone.'"

A Presumptuous Consumptive.—Mrs. Vans, who is well known in Scotland for her evangelistic zeal, said: "A young man used to visit at my house who seemed to think nothing of the life hereafter, although he was far gone in consumption. One day I was speaking to him of death and eternity, and of his own approaching decease, but such conversations were always distasteful to him, and he vehemently interrupted me with 'Oh, don't speak to me of that, I am getting better; don't you remember my sister?' Yes, I did remember his sister; she never thought of her soul's salvation until she was on her death-bed, and there God sought and found her, and she died trusting in Him; and now her brother was thinking that it would be time enough to repent of his sins when he was there too. He little thought how near death he was. God did not give him the chance of a death-bed repentance. He left my house, but in a few minutes he came running back and cried, 'Oh, I am bleeding to death!' It was too true; he did bleed to death. An internal artery had burst, and the hemorrhage could not be stopped. In ten minutes after our conversation he was ushered into eternity, and was face to face with God."

Dip Your Crust in Your Own Gravy.—A gentleman said: "There was a man who was much given to strong drink; he sold one thing after another of his household goods until he had nothing left. One morning he came from his work, and looked about for something to eat; but failed to find anything but a crust of bread. Taking the crust in his hand, he made his way to the saloon where he spent most of his time and where he was sure of getting warmed, at any rate. Soon he was sitting comfortably in the warm kitchen. The rum-seller's wife was busily engaged in frying ham for breakfast. She had occasion to leave him alone for a few minutes, and on her return she found him dipping his crust into her pan. 'Quit that, you loafer,' she cried, angrily. 'Go home, and dip your crust in your own gravy.' The man had spent a great deal of money there and it seemed to him a mean thing to grudge him so small a matter. He quickly left the saloon and did not enter it again for months. One day, when the rum-seller's wife was standing at her door, she saw the man whom she had ordered out of her shop coming up the street with his wife, and both were respectably dressed. 'Oh, John, where have you been? We haven't seen you for a long time; come away in.' 'Well,' replied John, 'I just did as you told me; I have been dipping my crust in my own gravy. You see, I took your advice, and, thank God, my wife and children and I have all gravy to dip our crusts in now.'"

A Text in a Birthday Book.—"A Friend of mine, a captain in the army, went to visit some friends. The daughter of the house was unconverted, and often spoke against God and His holy Book, but my friend was a true servant of the Lord, and did all he could to further His cause. One day the young lady came to him and said: 'Captain Berry, will you write your name in my birthday book?' The captain hesitated, and thought, 'Is it right to put my name in the book of one who speaks so much against my Lord and Master?' and, being a man of prayer, he appealed to God, saying, 'O Lord, teach me what to do; whether I should write in the book or not.' Taking the book from her hand, he turned to the date of his birth, and beneath his name he wrote, 'Luke 11: 21.' Some time afterward the young lady came to him and said, 'Thank you, so much, Captain Berry, for putting your name in my birthday book.' 'Did you look for the text which I marked for you?' he asked. 'Certainly not; you know I never read the Bible.' The young lady wished to argue, but he knew that argument would never convince her and that her need was the influence of the Holy Spirit; so he said, 'I don't want to argue with you.' A little time afterward she said to him, 'I am glad you did not argue with me when I wanted to, because I should still have remained of the same opinion, but now I know that you are right; I have gone to the Bible and proved it for myself.' That young lady has given her heart to the Lord, and is rejoicing in His love."

PROPHETIC BIOGRAPHY.

By G. B. Taylor, Esq.

Minute Descriptions of Antichrist—Identification with the Napoleons—The Two Aspects of his Career—The Partition of the Last Empire—The Retrograde Development—An Abnormal Course—His Death and Resurrection.

As the time is manifestly approaching when Antichrist, the monster of the last days, must appear, it may be profitable to examine closely the minute description of his character and career set down by the prophet Daniel and the seer of Patmos. Very clearly did both these inspired men behold him in the visions God spread before their eyes. The family from which he would spring, his manifestation to the world, his place, the growth of his power, his tortuous policy, his hellish craft, his supreme power, and his final destruction are all set forth with a force and lucidity evidently intended to arrest attention and prepare the Church to recognize him and be on his guard.

In the eleventh chapter of Daniel's prophecy the points are especially clear and distinct. Notice particularly verses 19 and 20, which indicate his family: "Then he shall turn his face toward the fort of his own land: but he shall stumble and fall, and not be found. Then shall stand up in his estate a raiser of taxes in the glory of the kingdom; but within few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger, nor in battle." The first of these verses details the fall of no one in history so graphically as it does that of Napoleon the First. After the battle of Waterloo, he "turned his face toward the fort of his own land"—Paris; but he "stumbled" there, and "fell" (into the hands of the English); and he was not "found," being transported to the island of St. Helena. It must be remembered, in connection with this view, that Napoleon I. had actually become by his previous conquest of Syria. The next verse, the twentieth, describes almost perfectly the career and end of Napoleon the Third. He was always more a "raiser of taxes" for the "glorification of his kingdom" than a soldier bent on foreign conquest. Within a few years, however, he was deposed from his imperial dignity, and died "neither in anger, nor in battle, but peacefully at Chislehurst."

The great Antichrist next "stands up" in the "estate" in the name, prestige, and tradition of Napoleonic dynasty. And his extraordinary career is given in a remaining portion of the chapter. He will, doubtless, become King of Syria ("King of the North") before he becomes the Imperial Head of France; but in respect to both of these countries, he will, without doubt, succeed to the supremacy of the Napoleons.

THE TWO ASPECTS.

Daniel in his symbolic prophetic visions, beheld him only as a naked, unchanging, ten-horned wild-beast, careering to his end before the Son of Man and the Ancient of Days. But St. John in the Revelation beheld him in the grand state of his regalia, and with attendants; and much more minutely describes his passage through his allotted days to its fatal termination.

We may also remark that Daniel first beheld the beast immediately on its putting forth its "ten horns," and the rising up of the "little horn" among them, previously to the commencement of its aggressive career which, of course, symbolize the predicted

PARTITION OF THE LAST EMPIRE

—the Roman—into ten confederate states, Republican or Monarchical, and the rise of Antichrist as a petty ruler among them.

But St. John does not view the beast until the last "horn," the eleventh, viz., the "little horn," has changed into the last head of the beast, viz., the seventh-eighth, that which is now the acting one, the one freshly recovered from a previously received deadly wound. This figures out the fact that Antichrist, from commencing as a petty sovereign of a small state in the eastern half of the empire, ultimately becomes the federal head of the ten-kingdomed nation.

This marvellous retrograde abnormal course to "head" empire is due to the energy of the "dragon" in the person of the "beast." I say "retrograde" because Antichrist is represented as a "horn" first and a "head" afterward; whereas all the other empires are stated to be primarily "heads," and afterward as putting forth "horns," a succession which is manifestly according to nature! But about Antichrist, to impress upon us the solemn fact that the "devil is come down among us in the person of a man."

Coming to the Revelation, St. John writes: "And I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet-colored beast, full of the names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns." The beast is here fully developed, although he has a rider, a guider, a controller, which must be very galling to him. I think a feasible theory is, that a Napoleon having become the last Pope, and another the last Emperor, they share the rule between them, one assuming the political and the other the ecclesiastical supremacy. The bloody disposition of the last pope being accordant with that of the last Emperor, and being the essence of the latter's rule, he permits, for a time, the ascendancy of the papacy, in order to reduce, by the slaughter of Protestants, the volume of his foes; after which, the scarlet woman being drunk; with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus, and so incapacitated to do anything further in Antichrist's line, he turns round and dismounts her; and by the assistance of the ten Presidents whom he now makes Kings he slays all—a retributive judgment in kind—who will in turn renounce their religion, Roman Catholicism, and own Him their only God and King!

In the (perhaps very near) upheavals which will develop the ten-horn or toe-kingdoms and Antichrist as the "little horn," the papacy will have managed to obtain the ascendancy. The possessing, therefore, of that ascendancy will explain the position of the papistical woman dominating (for the time being) over the atheistic, blaspheming "beast"—Antichrist.

The Sanguinary Woman who guides the monster, for the time being, virtually Empress. We see she is not only scarlet-colored, to portray her sanguinary temper, but also "arrayed in purple," as indicative of her supreme imperial power; the forfeited temporal sovereignty of the Pontifical states being by this time reclaimed.

THE SCARLET-COLORED BEAST

is emblazoned with the "names of blasphemy," which names are soon to be transferred to the heads of the Beast, in the singular number, as "the name of blasphemy." The "names of blasphemy" on the body of the beast perhaps represent Romish and Communistic assumptions of titles that are only legitimately applied to Christ or God, while "the name of blasphemy" assumed by the seven heads, which represent Antichrist in the sevenfold Satanic might of his person and office, signifies one appalling class of thunder of blasphemy, in some as yet unheard-of-title, that completely eclipses and swallows up all the rest.

Truly the sacred word respecting Antichrist is a mystery! He shall ascend out of the Bottomless Pit, the Abyss, the abode of Demons, and shall go into perdition at the Battle of Armageddon, according to the showing of the sacred texts. No wonder that blind, carnal, rationalistic "dwellers on the earth," in contrast to "pilgrims through the earth," will wonder "when they behold the beast that was, and is not, and yet is." He (Antichrist) was when he was existing in his natural normal life. He was not, after his death by a literal sword. And he yet is after his Satanically-wrought resurrection in imitation of that of Christ, whom he will parody in every conceivable particular possible; thus becoming Christ's antithesis—the Antichrist! and thus, necessarily, a man!

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

EGYPT AND BABYLON!

From Sacred and Profane Sources. By George Rawlinson, M.A. Students of the Bible will derive much assistance from this able work. Professor Rawlinson's doctrine has always been that religion is the true key to history, and that doctrine is the basis of his work on Egypt and Babylon. He deals with the two countries separately, reversing the order of his title-page. He first notices the references to Babylon in the Book of Genesis and Kings and Chronicles. Then five chapters are devoted to the references in Daniel, and four to those of the other prophets. Egypt is dealt with in like manner, except, of course, that the Pentateuch furnishes the bulk of the most important references to that country. Professor Rawlinson has, with considerable learning and much research, furnished from profane historians and from the recently deciphered tablets the parallel accounts of the events recorded in the Bible, and has thus thrown on many passages hitherto obscure a flood of light. In these days, when the historical veracity of the Old Testament is being so virulently assailed, this testimony from independent sources, all of unimpeachable authority, is extremely valuable. To the earnest Christian the question of the truth of God's word is determined on grounds independent of human evidence, but it is exceedingly gratifying to find that even when tried by that test it stands firm and uncontradicted. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, pp. 329. Price, $1.50.

GOD AND A FUTURE LIFE:

The Reasonableness of Christianity. By Charles Nordhoff. The object this popular author had in view in writing his treatise is one that in the present state of society cannot be too earnestly sought. "Young people and many older ones, too," says Mr. Nordhoff, "are worried with doubts and fears which did not trouble the Christian world half a century ago. Science has been popularized, and some men assert, and many ignorantly believe, that there has arisen a conflict between science and religion, which is as though one should assert that there is a conflict between the multiplication table and the higher geometry." For these, and for the still larger class of the community who are engrossed in the mere worldly struggle for existence, or for wealth, and think little and seldom of religion, Mr. Nordhoff writes. He is not a theologian, but a journalist and a writer of books, a man of strong common-sense, feeling deeply that in Christianity is to be found the highest blessing attainable in and for this life, as well as for the life to come; and he possesses above most men the faculty of presenting his convictions forcibly, clearly, in the language of the day, free from pulpit phraseology, and such as a wise friend—a man of the world—would use in giving counsel on some worldly topic. Young people will like his book. It is vigorous, manly, frank, and sensible. There are in it few appeals, no threatenings, no abusive words, which are too often used in cases in which young people honestly doubt the doctrines of the pulpit.

Mr. Nordhoff treats his readers with respect, frankly prefers that they should doubt rather than be indifferent or careless. He writes for thoughtful, reasonable, intelligent young folks, on the assumption, which is a tribute to their capacity, that they only need to be convinced of the truth and value of Christianity to open their hearts to it. Commencing at the beginning with the question, "Is there a future life?" he proceeds, step by step, through the journey of doubt, which so many young people have sorrowfully travelled in the opposite direction, to the firm ground of Christian faith as the controlling and energizing principle in the conduct of life. It is long since we have seen a book so well adapted to convince an honest doubter that Christianity is the greatest and best blessing God ever gave to the world. It is published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, pp. 228. Price, $1.

"ALONE WITH GOD:"

Studies and Meditations of a Sick-Room," by the Rev. Joseph Cross, D.D., LL.D. There is a markedly hallowed tone pervading these meditations which tells of a soul very near to the Master. The aged servant of the Lord, who penned them, has words to speak which are full of the spirit that pain and suffering bring when they fulfil their intended mission. In singularly sweet and chaste language he gives expression to the thoughts which one who has long walked with God finds refreshing in hours of solitude. A strangely soothing, solemnizing influence comes over the spirit almost unconsciously as one reads these meditations, as if one were in the very presence of God. They breathe a spirit of simple, trusting faith, full of intelligence as of one who says: "I know in whom I have believed." The section on "The Christian surrendering his will" and that on "The Christian drawing nearer to Christ" are especially beautiful. We can imagine no book of modern time more fitted for the sick room, or one more adapted to the condition of the Christian sufferer nearing the grave. It speaks of peace, resignation, of acquiescence in the divine will, a calm, loving trustfulness which few in the heyday of health and strength ever attain. Published by Mr. Thomas Whittaker, 2 and 3 Bible House, New York. Price, $1.50.

THE ANCIENT HEBREWS,

by Abraham Mills, A. M., is a book probably well known to our elder ministerial readers. The later generation of Biblical students have seen little of it, for it has been many years out of print. The publishers, in an introductory note, explain how the plates from which it is printed were found by the author's widow after being so long lost that it was supposed that they had been destroyed. Some important additions, including an introductory chapter on "The World before the Flood" were then made, and ten new charts prepared, showing in parallel columns, and with a distinction of coloring, the contemporary secular events of the various periods of Jewish History respectively under consideration. The history is carried forward to the final dispersion of the Jews after the capture of Jerusalem, in August A.D. 70. The Bible narrative was followed wherever it supplied the facts, and when an hiatus occurred, the best secular authorities were examined and used, the names of the authorities being given. The object was to present in clear and connected form, such as modern historians adopt, a history of the Jewish people, with dates and names of places omitted by the sacred writers, and continuing the narrative from the point where they leave it to the close of the national life. We may say, for the benefit of those who will approve, as of those who will condemn, that there is no trace in this book of the doctrines of the new school of Biblical criticism, of which Ewald was the leader. The Biblical narrative is accepted literally, even the six days of creation being evidently regarded as six natural days of twenty-four hours, a position which Pye Smith and some other learned men abandoned. It is published by Messrs A. S. Barnes & Company, New York and Chicago.

per annum, payable in advance.

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

A wrong date will appear on the address label of some papers this week. A large number of renewals have been received since the commencement of the year, and it has not been possible in every case to change the date in type to that covered by the renewal.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Legislation Intended to Prevent Foreign capitalists from acquiring land in the United States was recommended last week by the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives. The Committee advises the passage of a bill providing "that no alien or foreigner or persons other than citizens of the United States and such as have legally declared their intention to become citizens thereof shall acquire title to or own any lands anywhere within the United States of America and their jurisdiction; and any deeds or other conveyances acquired by such after the approval of this act shall be void." It is time some such measure was passed to protect the country from the rapacity of these land monopolists who have done so much to pauperize their own country. Already twenty-one million acres of land in this country are owned by titled nobles, most of whom are Englishmen. Those who know to what straits the English rural districts have been reduced by the selfish greed of these men will heartily approve this attempt to keep their clutches off the soil of America.

The Contest for the Position of Senator for New York ended on January 21st, by the election of the Hon. William M. Everts. The caucus in which the matter was practically settled, gave Mr. Everts sixty-one votes, and his chief rival, Mr. Morton, thirty-one. The nomination was afterward made unanimous. The result is chiefly due to the bad odor of Mr. Morton's supporters. Ex-Governor Cornell and ex-Senator Platt are not popular with the bulk of the Republican party just now. Some members of the Legislature who preferred Mr. Morton to Mr. Everts voted for the latter in order to humiliate Cornell and Platt. They, uniting with the Blaine men, who were solid for Everts, sufficed to secure his nomination and election. Mr. Everts is sixty-seven years of age, having been born in Boston, Mass., in 1818. He was counsel for President Johnson in his impeachment trial and subsequently became his Attorney-General. He was counsel for the United States in the Alabama arbitration and was President Hayes's Secretary of State.

Elections of United States Senators were held in several States last week. Rhode Island selected Congressman Jonathan Chace to fill out the term of the late Senator Anthony. Mr. Chace is a Quaker and dresses in Quaker garb. He is a lineal descendant of Gov. Winthrop's secretary who came from England in 1632. In Pennsylvania, Mr. Cameron was re-elected. The Colorado Legislature elected Mr. Teller, who is now Secretary of the Interior. Mr. Vest was re-elected in Missouri. Mr. O. H. Platt in Connecticut, Mr. Voorhees in Indiana, Mr. Z. B. Vance in North Carolina, and Mr. Wilkinson Call in Florida. California elected ex-Governor Leland Stanford.

An Important Step in Relation to the Indian problem was taken by the House on January 22d. It added to the Indian bill an amendment which provides that an Indian, either on or away from an Indian reservation, who shall commit a crime against the person, or property of another Indian or any other person shall be subject to the same laws and penalties, and tried by the same courts and in the same manner as a white person who commits a like offence. The crimes named in the amendment are murder, manslaughter, rape, arson, assault with intent to kill, burglary and larceny. The amendment also provides that an Indian, whether belonging to a reservation or not, may bring suits at law or equity in civil cases in the same manner as a white person, and that Indians shall be competent witnesses in the trial of civil as well as criminal causes. This equality before the law has long been advocated by those who have most closely studied the Indian question.

An Anti-Dynamite Resolution was introduced in the Senate on Saturday morning by Senator Bayard. When the news of the dynamite explosion in London was received in Washington Senator Bayard rose and moved the following resolution: That the Senate of the United States has heard with indignation and profound sorrow of the attempts to destroy the Houses of Parliament and other public buildings in London, and hereby express its horror and detestation of such monstrous crimes against civilization. Senator Edmunds also introduced a bill to punish dynamiters in this country. The bill was prepared some time ago, but Senator Edmunds intended to revise it before introducing it to the Senate. The news of the attempt to blow up the Houses of Parliament, induced him to introduce it at once, leaving the work of revision to the Senate Committee, of which he is chairman. The bill, which is at present only a draft, makes the manufacture and exportation of explosives for use against public or private property in any other country a felony. As O'Donovan Rossa openly invites subscriptions for the purpose, this law, if passed, will render his acts punishable.

A Dynamite Outrage Surpassing all its Predecessors in boldness and recklessness of human life was perpetrated on Saturday last in London. About two o'clock in the afternoon there was an explosion in the House of Commons, quickly followed by a second in Westminster Hall, which adjoins the House, and almost simultaneously an explosion took place in the Tower of London, about four miles away from the Houses of Parliament. A lady who was visiting the Houses of Parliament, which on Saturdays are thrown open to strangers, noticed on the stairs leading to the crypt a package wrapped in an old dress, from which smoke was issuing. She called a policeman's attention to it, and he picked it up to carry it out of the building. It burned his hands, and he dropped it, when it exploded, injuring him and another policeman fatally, and inflicting serious hurts on the bystanders. Three minutes later the second explosion occurred, destroying the lobby and completely wrecking the western extremity of the House. It appeared to proceed from under the gallery set apart for the accommodation of peers when they visit the House of Commons. The greatest injury was done to the seats Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues occupy. Every window in the side of the house was broken, the glass roof was shattered, several statues were overturned, and a large hole was torn in the flooring. The historic building known as the Tower was the scene of the third explosion. The dynamite was deposited in the White Tower, which at the time of the explosion was fairly filled with visitors among whom were many children. A large hole was made in the flooring and the roof by the explosion, and a large number of the visitors were thrown down, and many of them seriously, if not fatally, injured. The children were cut about the head and face by splinters and broken glass, and presented a most pitiable spectacle. The utmost excitement prevailed. Threats were freely made of lynching the Irishmen in London, but no riot was apprehended. A few arrests were made, but it is believed that the guilty parties escaped. It is thought that they went to the Tower and the Houses of Parliament as sight-seers. If the Houses had been in session, two hundred members must have been killed.

A Desperate Battle was fought by the British forces under General Stewart and the Arabs, on January 16th, near Metemneh. The Arabs were collected at the wells of Abu Klea, and numbered about ten thousand. General Stewart's force did not exceed fifteen hundred men, all told. They formed in a square, as usual, and the Arabs charged it. For the first time the square was broken, and about two hundred Arabs penetrated it. The slaughter at that point was terrible. The men fought hand to hand, and there were heaps of slain and wounded men on the ground. Finally the Arabs retired in good order, and were not pursued. The British lost several of their finest officers, including Colonel Burnaby, the famous hero of the ride to Khiva, whom the Queen's cousin, the Duke of Cambridge, has persistently persecuted. Majors Carmichael, Atherton, and Gough, one captain and four lieutenants were among the slain. Up to Saturday, January 23d, no further intelligence had been received from General Stewart, and grave apprehensions are entertained about his safety.

The French Campaign in Tonquin is Threatened with disaster. In an important despatch received in Paris on January 23d, the Commander-in-Chief in Tonquin announces that he has before him at least eighty thousand Chinese troops, so strongly intrenched as to render any direct attack utterly hopeless. Moreover, the nature of the country to be passed over before reaching Lang-son and the Chinese frontier is such as to compel the French to attack the Chinese in front if the original plan is to be continued. Such an attack, says General Briere de l'Isle, would involve an enormous sacrifice of men with no result, and would require material of war, artillery, and means of transportation far more complete than anything the general has at hand. He asks that the troops be sent to make a diversion in his favor, which implies that his position is more serious than he reports.

A Melancholy Destruction of Life is reported from Rome, Italy. A dispatch from that city states that several villages in Piedmont and Savoy have been devastated by avalanches. Three villages in Piedmont, including the important village of Frassinio, have been buried under avalanches from the Piedmontese Mountains. The town of Chaumont, in France, capital of the Department of Haute Marne, at the foot of the Vosges Mountains, is partly overwhelmed with snow and many people there have been killed. Another fatal avalanche has occurred at Sparone, on the Dora Baltea River, a few miles south of Irrea. Fifteen persons are known to be buried under the snow at Sparone, and most of the other inhabitants are engaged in digging out the survivors. The villagers who have been made homeless are in great distress.

Dr. Talmage has Written a Letter to the editor of the Brooklyn Magazine acknowledging the birthday testimonial of letters and verses printed in the January number of that periodical. The letter will appear in the February issue of the magazine. The testimonial will also be continued in the forthcoming number, including letters which arrived too late for insertion in the January number. Among these are the names of Rev. Newman Hall, of England, Governor St. John, Rev. S. D. Burchard, Hon. A. S. Hewitt, Mr. Anthony Comstock, Rev. Charles Cuthbert Hall, Senator A. H. Colquitt, Rev. George H. Hepworth, and others.

The Thirty-eight Missionaries for the Congo, completing Bishop William Taylor's party, left New York on Thursday last by the steamer City of Montreal. One of them, Dr. Mary R. Myers, after she was on the steamer, received a telegram announcing the death of her father. The tears filled her eyes, showing how acutely she felt the bereavement, but she unhesitatingly said, "I cannot turn back." The party carried a printing-press and type and five thousand Bibles printed in phonetic text. They also take axes and tools to construct huts, a quantity of cotton cloth, and some harmonicas. A photographer went on board the vessel and took a picture of the group. The prayers of Christians of all denominations follow them in their perilous mission, in which God alone can protect them.

Mr. Moody's Convention of Christian Workers in Washington, D. C., on January 16-19, was a scene seldom witnessed in that city. Miss Lucy E. Sanford, writing to the Observer, says: "After thirty-six hours of rain, Friday morning the streets were mud, the heavens clouds, the air dense fog, and yet before nine o'clock the steps and sidewalk were packed, many leaning on canes and some even on crutches. After the long standing in the dismal dampness and rain the doors were opened and a rush made into the church. That as many church-members as possible might hear him, each week-day had three services, and fifteen hundred tickets (the seating capacity of the largest Congregational church) were given for each service. Our fire commissioners are very strict, and allow no passage to be obstructed; but, wherever possible, benches were put in, and doors were open to non-ticket holders ten minutes before service. Thus, at least, fifteen thousand different persons heard him, and the full number could not have been less than twenty-five thousand on those three days."

The Society for the Suppression of Vice held its annual meeting in New York on January 20th. The progress made during the year, as shown by Mr. Comstock's report was unusually good, especially in the field of objectionable literature. It was stated in the course of the report that since the organization of the society its officers have seized thirty-four tons of obscene matter and eight tons of gambling implements, and the report congratulated all good citizens that the year 1884 had been "an uncommonly hard one for gamblers in New York City." The aim of the society, it was stated, was to suppress and repress all evils which attack the morals of the young. There were excellent laws in existence, and the society's representatives have found but little trouble in enforcing them whenever the District Attorneys have been honest and faithful.

Christian Work in Colleges has Received an impetus during the past year from the efforts of the Young Men's Christian Associations, which have operated through the college department of the International Committee. There are, we learn from a circular recently issued by Mr. Morse, one hundred and eighty-one associations in as many colleges. During the past year, mainly through the prayers and labors of the members of the associations, seventeen hundred students made a profession of religion. Eighty-three young men converted since entering college are now candidates for the ministry, twenty-five of them having been converted during the past year. Twenty-six young men of the one hundred and eighty-two who are training for the foreign missionary field, report that they were led to decide on that sphere through their College Y. M. C. A. Pastors interested in holding meetings for prayer who would like more information on this subject, will have it cheerfully sent them from the office of the International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations, Y. M. C. A. building, corner Twenty-third Street and Fourth Avenue, New York City.

An Involuntary Voyage of Ten Miles was made by the whaling crews of East Hampton and Amagansett, Long Island, on January 20th. A school of nine whales was sighted off the coast, and the crews succeeded in harpooning three of them in the same day. The chase is said to have been one of the most dangerous and exciting ever known in the experience of the whalemen along that coast. The whales were harpooned close to shore, but, making a desperate fight for life, towed the boats fully ten miles to sea before spouting blood. Two of the boats narrowly escaped being stove. The aggregate value of the three whales is estimated at $4000. Happily, all engaged returned safely with their prize. This does not always happen in whaling or in the pursuit of other prizes; sometimes the crew of a boat has to decide whether they will cut the rope by which they hold their prey, or be dragged down. It is so in business life. A nian eagerly pursuing some coveted prize is dragged against his will into a dangerous current, when he must either relinquish his prize or go down into the world's vortex and lose his soul. Too many choose the latter course, and so prove their folly (Matt. 16: 26).

An Eagle Attacking a Boy was Killed in the fight that ensued, at Xenia, Ohio, on January 16th. A boy about fifteen years old was sent into the fields near the Soldiers' Orphans' Home to look after some cattle. He saw a large eagle perched on a tree, and being afraid of an attack from it started on a run for the institution. The bird gave chase, and soon overtook the youngster. It buried its talons in the fleshy part of his leg, but the boy was able to shake his assailant off. It then jumped upon the little fellow and bit him severely upon the arm. The boy commenced to fight the eagle, and went at it with his bare fists. He succeeded in getting a good hold upon the eagle's neck, and choked and crushed it to death. The boy was exhausted after the conflict, and had to be taken to the hospital, where it was found that he had received many scratches and bites. The body of the eagle measures four feet from tip to tip. The boy showed prudence as well as courage. He tried to avoid the encounter, but when it was forced upon him he fought bravely. In the Christian's conflicts with the evil one and with his own besetting sins that is the wise policy, and victory is assured (1 Peter 5: 8, 9).

A New Remedy for Cancer is Described in a despatch from Washington, D. C. It states that Captain John A. Duble has been treated for a cancer of the face with an application of "aveloz," a Brazilian remedy, to which the attention of the State Department was some time ago directed by Consul Atherton, of Pernambuco. Captain Duble's cancer affected the side of his nose, and, in giving the history of the case, he said his father and grandfather had both died from cancers affecting the same part of the face. When presented to the examining physicians, Duble's cancer was healed, and he was believed to be permanently cured. An eminent physician is to watch the case and make a report for a medical journal, if it turns out to be a case of true cancer. Several physicians are in doubt as to whether the trouble was cancer or lupus, an affection said to be almost as intractable as cancer. The rapidity of the apparent cure, whether of cancer or lupus, is admitted to be extraordinary. The report will be looked for with interest by the public. Sufferers from cancer, however, will feel more than ordinary interest in it. If it is efficacious they will want to use it. That is the difference between speculative and saving faith. There are many in the world who though believing that Christ is the Saviour, will be lost because they do not apply to Him. Those who know and feel their danger go to Him and are saved (Mark 2: 17).

A Lover's Timidity Lost him his Affianced wife in San Francisco recently. The Alta of January 8th reports that the preceding day a young man and the lady to whom he was engaged were driving in Golden Gate Park, when the horses took fright and rushed along the drive in frenzied speed. A bad accident was evidently in prospect, and the young man, instead of trying to check or guide the maddened horses, or even to soothe the agitated lady at his side, raised a wild clamor. "Save me! save me!" he cried, "I shall be killed;" and he became hysterical with terror. The buggy was overturned, and the lady sprained her ankle, but the young gentleman escaped uninjured. A gentleman who came to the rescue and righted the buggy was requested by the lady to drive her home, she indignantly refusing to have anything more to do with her former lover. She appears to have reasoned that it would be unwise to intrust her future to a man unable to protect her in her hour of danger. It may be hoped that, in thinking of her life beyond the grave, she may be equally careful. One who is mighty to save invites her to put her trust in Him (Isa. 63: 1).

A Despised Farm in Pennsylvania has Suddenly become the subject of eager litigation. Thirty years ago the owner of a farm in Butler County gave it to his brother on the sole condition of his living there and paying the taxes. The brother accepted it, and paid the taxes; but after residing on the farm a short time, he removed to Pittsburg, still continuing, however, to pay the taxes on the farm. No deed of gift of the farm was ever issued, and the original owner in making his will did not mention it. Both brothers died, and the heirs of the original owner of the farm made no claim to it. If they had done so, the heirs of the other brother would not have considered it worth contesting. Recently, however, oil has been found there, and one well alone is turning out nine thousand gallons a day. The question of ownership is, therefore, now an important matter, and a suit about it is being vigorously prosecuted. Both parties regret that the value of the once-despised farm was not understood earlier, when a peaceable possession of it might have been easily secured. So when the day of probation is ended will men curse their own blindness to the value of the possession God offers them now without money and without price (Luke 19: 42).

An Aristocratic Stone-Breaker was Working last week at a town in Indiana, a short distance from Indianapolis. A man was needed to break stone there on a section of the railroad, and on January 15th the section boss was surprised to see a young man arrive with authority to do the work. He wore a silk hat, varnished boots, a diamond breast-pin, and carried a gold-headed cane. The boss looked at him in astonishment, but the young man gave no explanation. However, he set to work with a will, and every day he fully performed his two dollars' worth of work. Some curiosity was aroused about his work, and inquiries were made which elicited the fact that he belonged to a wealthy and aristocratic family, but having married contrary to the wishes of his father, he was without funds to support himself and his wife, except those he might earn. He had tried in vain to get suitable employment, so had taken such as he could get, which was breaking stone. Wealth and a luxurious home were at his disposal if he would abandon his wife, but he preferred to work for her. Undutiful conduct is not to be commended, and it generally leads to misery; but we cannot help admiring the devotion of the young husband in making sacrifices for his wife. They were a proof of his love. It is such a love that Christ demands of His followers (Luke 14: 26, 27).

SERMON FOR NEW YEAR'S DAY.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.*

"And he that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new."—REVELATION 21 : 5.

Common Love for New Things—The New Year's Feast—I. The Great Transformation—The New Covenant—A New Way of Life—A New Relationship—A New Life—Response of Hallelujahs—II. An Earnest Call—A New Birth Possible—Leads to a New Life—Includes Daily Renewing—New Surroundings—Heart-Breakers at Home—Not Surprised at a Brother's Conversion.

How pleased we are with that which is new! Our children's eyes sparkle when we talk of giving them a toy or a book which is called new; for our short-lived human nature loves that which has lately come, and is therefore like our own fleeting selves. In this respect, we are all children, for we eagerly demand the news of the day, and are all too apt to rush after the "many inventions" of the hour. The Athenians, who spent their time in telling and hearing some new thing, were by no means singular persons; novelty still fascinates the crowd. As the world's poet says:

"All with one consent praise new-born gauds."

I should not wonder, therefore, if the mere words of my text should sound like a pleasant song in your ears; but I am thankful that their deeper meaning is even more joyful. The newness which Jesus brings is bright, clear, heavenly, enduring.

We are at this moment specially ready for a new year. The most of men have grown weary with the old cry of depression of trade and hard times; we are glad to escape from what has been to many a twelve-months of great trial. The last year had become wheezy, croaking, and decrepit, in its old age; and we lay it asleep with a psalm of judgment and mercy. We hope that this new-born year will not be worse than its predecessor, and we pray that it may be a great deal better. At any rate, it is new, and we are encouraged to couple with it the idea of happiness, as we say one to another, "I wish you a happy New Year."

"Ring out the old, ring in the new;
Ring, happy bells, across the snow;
The year is going, let him go;
Ring out the false, ring in the true."

This is the first day of a new year, and therefore a solemnly joyous day. Though there is no real difference between it and any other day, yet in our mind and thought it is a marked period, which we regard as set up on the highway of our life. It is only in imagination that there is any close of one year and beginning of another; and yet it has most fitly all the force of a great fact. When men "cross the line," they find no visible mark; the sea bears no trace of an equatorial belt; and yet mariners know whereabouts they are, and they take notice thereof, so that a man can hardly cross the line for the first time without remembering it to the day of his death. We are crossing the line now. We have sailed into the year of grace 1885; therefore, let us keep a feast unto the Lord. If Jesus has not made us new already, let the new year cause us to think about the great and needful change of conversion; and if our Lord has begun to make us new, and we have somewhat entered into the new world wherein dwelleth righteousness, let us be persuaded by the season to press forward into the centre of His new creation, that we may feel to the full all the power of His grace.

I. Briefly, then, here is one of the grandest truths that ever fell even from the lips of Jesus: "Behold, I make all things new." Let us gaze upon

THE GREAT TRANSFORMATION.

This renewing work has been in our Lord's hands from of old. To-day believers are not under the covenant of "If thou doest this thou shalt live," but under that new covenant which says, "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." It is not now "Do and live," but "Live and do"; we think not of merit and reward, but of free grace producing holy practice as the result of gratitude. What law could not do, grace has accomplished. We ought never to forget this bottom of everything, this making of all things new by the fashioning of a new covenant.

The foundation being made new, the Lord Jesus Christ has set before us which grows out of that covenant. The old way of life was, "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments." There they are, perfect, and holy, and just, and good; but, alas, dear friends, you and I have broken the commandments. We dare not say that we have kept the ten commands from our youth up; on the contrary, we are compelled by our consciences to confess that in spirit and in heart, if not in act, we have continually broken the law of God; and we are therefore under sin and condemnation, and there is no hope for us by the works of the law. For this reason the Gospel sets before us another way, and says, "It is of faith, that it might be by grace." Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.

I trust you will accept this most gracious and suitable way of salvation. It is most glorious to God and safe to you: do not neglect so great salvation. After you have believed unto life you will go and do all manner of holy deeds as the result of your new life; but do not attempt them with the view of earning life. Prompted no longer by the servile and selfish motive of saving yourself, but by gratitude for the fact that you are saved, you will rise to virtue and true holiness. Faith has brought us into the possession of an indefeasible salvation; and now for the love we bear our Saviour, we must obey Him and become "zealous for good works."

By grace every believer is brought into

with God. Let us rejoice in this: "Thou art no more a servant but a son, and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ." Oh you who are now children, you were servants a little while ago! Some of you, my hearers, are servants now, and as servants I would bid you expect your wages. Alas, your service has been no service, but a rebellion; and if you get no more wages than you deserve you will be cast away forever. You ought to be thankful to God that He has not yet recompensed you—that He has not dealt with you after your sins, nor rewarded you according to your iniquities. "Behold, I make all things new," says Jesus, and then He makes His people into sons. When we are made sons do we work for wages? We have no desire for any present payment, for our Father says to us, "Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine;" and, moreover, we have the inheritance in reversion, entailed by the covenant. He will never drive us from His house. Never has our great Father disowned one of His sons.

There has also been wrought in us by the work of the Holy Spirit with all the new feelings, and new desires, and new works which go therewith. The tree is made new, and the fruits are new in consequence. That same Spirit of God who taught us that we were ruined in our old estate, led us gently by the hand till we came to the New Covenant promise and looked to Jesus, and saw in Him the full atonement for sin. Happy discovery for us; it was the kindling of new life in us. From the moment that we trusted in Jesus, a new life darted into our spirit. I am not going to say which is first, the new birth, or faith, or repentance. Nobody can tell which spoke of a wheel moves first; it moves as a whole. The moment the divine life comes into the heart we believe: the moment we believe the eternal life is there. We repent because we believe, and believe while we repent.

We have, of course, that natural life which is sustained by food, and evidenced by our breath; but there is another life within which is not seen of men, nor fed by the provisions of earth. We are conscious of having been quickened, for we were dead once, and we know it; but now we have passed from death into life, and we know it quite as certainly. A new and higher motive ways us now; for we seek not self but God. Another hand grasps the tiller and steers our ship in a new course. New desires are felt to which we were strangers in our former state. New fears are mighty within us—holy fears which once we should have ridiculed. New hopes are in us, bright and sure, such as we did not even desire to know when we lived a mere carnal life. We are not what we were; we are new, and have begun a new career. We are not what we shall be, but assuredly we are not what we used to be.

I believe that Jesus Christ has in some of you not only made you new, but made to you. "Ah," said one, when she was converted, "either the world is greatly altered, or else I am." Why, either you and I are turned upside down in nature, or the world is. We used to think it a wise world once, but how foolish we think it now! We used to think it a brave gay world that showed us real happiness, but we are no longer deceived, we have seen Madame Bubble's painted face in its true deformity. "The world is crucified unto me," said Paul; and many of you can say the same. It is like a gibbeted criminal hung up to die. Meanwhile, there is no love lost, for the world thinks much the same of us, and therein we can sympathize with Paul when he said, "I am crucified unto the world."

A person shook hands with me one day this week who does not often hear me preach, and he expressed to me his unbounded delight in listening to the doctrine of the grace of God, and he added, "Surely your people must be made of stone." "Why?" said I. "Why!" he replied, "if they were not they would all get up and shout 'Hallelujah' when you are preaching such a glorious Gospel. I wanted to shout badly on Sunday morning; but as everybody else was quiet, I held my tongue." For which I thought he was a wise man; but yet I do not wonder if men who have tasted of the grace of God, and feel that the Lord has done great things for them, whereof they are glad, do feel like crying out for joy. Let us have a little indulgence to-night. Now, you that feel that you must cry aloud for joy, join with me and cry "Hallelujah." [A great number of voices cried, "Hallelujah!"] Hallelujah, glory be to our Redeemer's name. Why should we not lift up our voices in His praise?

The process which we have roughly described as taking place in ourselves is in other forms going on in the world. The whole creation is travelling, all time is groaning, providence is working, grace is striving, and all for one end—the bringing forth of the new and better age. It is coming. It is coming. Not in vain did John write, "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea." What a prospect does all this open up to the believer! Our future is glorious; let not our present be gloomy.

II. But now, in the text there is for us to consider this work of our Lord. He that sitteth on the throne saith, "Behold, I make all things new." Why should He call upon us to behold it? All His works deserve study: "The works of the Lord are great, sought out of all them that have pleasure therein." Whatsoever the Lord doeth is full of wisdom, and the wise will search into it. But when the Lord Himself sets up a light, and calls us to pause, and look, we cannot help beholding. I think that the Lord Jesus Christ especially calls us to consider this, that we may, according to our condition, derive profit from it.

* Mr. Spurgeon being laid aside by a severe cold, we publish this week his sermon delivered on New Year's night.

First, if the Lord Jesus makes all things new, then a new birth is possible to you, dear friend, though you have come here to-night in a wrong state of heart, with your sins upon you, binding you fast. There is enough of light in your soul for you to know that you are in darkness; and you are saying to yourself, "Oh, that I could reach to better things!" Why should He not make thee new? Let every thief know that the dying thief entered heaven by faith in Jesus. Let every one that has been a great transgressor remember how Manasseh received a new heart, and repented of his evil deeds. Let every one who has left the paths of purity remember how the woman that was a sinner loved much, because much had been forgiven her. I want, then, to drop into your ear—and may the Spirit of God drop into your heart—this word, you may be born again. The Lord can work in you. He that sitteth on the throne can do for you what you cannot do for yourself; and, as He made you once, and you became marred by sin, He can now make you; for He saith, "Behold, I make all things new."

A RADICAL CHANGE

Furthermore, you will say to me, "I desire to lead a new life." To do this you must be new yourself; for as the man is, so his life will be. If you leave the fountain foul the streams cannot be pure. Renewal must begin with the heart. Dear friend, the Lord Jesus Christ is able to make your life entirely new. We have seen many transformed into new parents and new children. Ask those that have had to live with converted people whether the transformation has not been marvellous. Christ makes new servants, new masters, new friends, new brothers, new sisters. The Lord can so change us that we shall scarcely know ourselves; I mean He can thus change you who now despair of yourselves. Oh, dear hearts, there is no absolute necessity that you should always go downward in evil till you descend to hell. There is a hand that can give you a gravitation in the opposite direction. He can stay the tide of your raging passion; He can make you, who were like a devil, become as an angel of God; for thus He speaks from the throne of His eternal majesty, "Behold, I make all things new." Come and lay yourself down at His feet, and ask Him to make you new. I beseech you, do this at once! "Well, I am says one; "I have taken the pledge, and I am going to be honest, and chaste, and religious." This is commendable resolving, but what will come of it? You will break your resolutions, and be nothing bettered by your attempts at reform. I expect that if you go into the business of mending yourself, you will be like the man who had an old gun, and took it to the gunsmith, and the gunsmith said, "Well, this would make a very good gun if it had a new stock, and a new lock, and a new barrel." So you would make a very good man by mending, if you had a new heart, and new life, and were made new all over, so that there was not a bit of the old stuff left. It will be easier, a great deal, depend upon it, even for God to make you new, than to mend you. What is wanted is that you should be made a new creature in Christ Jesus.

But now, beloved, farther than this. There are children of God who need this text, "Behold, I make all things new," whose sigh is that they so soon grow dull and weary in the ways of God, and therefore they need

DAILY RENEWING.

A brother said to me some time ago, "Dear sir, I frequently grow very sleepy in my walk with God. I seem to lose the freshness of it; and especially by about Saturday I get I hardly know where; but," he added, "as for you, whenever I hear you, you seem to be all alive and full of fresh energy." "Ah, my dear brother," I said, "that is because you do not know much about me." That was all I was able to say just then. I thank God for keeping me near Himself; but I am as weak, and stale, and unprofitable as any of you. I say this with very great shame—shame for myself, and shame for the brother who led me to make the confession. We are both wrong. With all our fresh springs in God, we ought to be always full of new life. Our love to Christ ought to be every minute as if it were new-born. Our zeal for God ought to be as fresh as if we had just begun to delight in Him. "Ay, but it is not," says one; and I am sorry I cannot contradict him.

Well, now, dear friends, why do you and I ever get stale and flat? Why do we sing,

"Dear Lord, and shall we ever live
At this poor dying rate?"

Why do we have to cry:

"In vain we tune our formal songs,
In vain we strive to rise;
Hosannas languish on our tongues,
And our devotion dies?"

Why, it is because we get away from Him who says, "Behold, I make all things new." The straight way to a perpetual newness and freshness of holy youth is to go to Christ again, just as we did at the first. A better thing still is never to leave Him, but to stand forever at the cross-foot delighting yourself in His all-sufficient sacrifice.

And, further, dear friends, there may be some dear child of God here who is conscious that he lives on a very low platform of spiritual life, and he knows that the Lord can raise him to a new condition. Numbers of Christians seem to live always. If you go through the valleys of Switzerland, you will find yourself get feverish and heavy in spirit, and you will see many idiots, persons with the goitre, and people greatly afflicted. Climb the sides of the hills, ascend into the Alps, and you will not meet with that kind of thing in the pure fresh air. Many Christians are of the sickly-valley breed. Oh that they could get up to the high mountains, and be strong!

I want to say to such, if you have been all your lifetime in bondage, you need not remain there any longer; for there is in Jesus the power to make all things new, and to lift you into new delights. It will seem to be a dead lift to you; but it is within the power of that pierced hand to lift you right out of doubt, and fear, and despondency, and spiritual lethargy, and weakness, and just to make you now, from this day forward, "strong in the Lord, and in the power of His might."

Another application of this truth will be this: "Oh," says one, "I do not know what to make of myself. I have had a weary time of late. Everything seems to have gone wrong with me. My family cause me great anxiety. My business is a thorny maze. My own health is precarious. I dread this year. In fact, I dread everything." We will not go on with that lamentation, but we will hear the cheering word—"Behold, I make all things new." The Lord, in answer to believing prayer, and especially in answer to a full resignation to His will, is able to make all providential for you. I have known the Lord on a sudden to turn darkness into light, and take away the sackcloth and the ashes from His dear children, for "He doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men." Sometimes all this worry is more discontent; and when the child of God gets right himself, these imaginary troubles vanish like the mist of the morning; but when they are real troubles, God can as easily change your condition, dear child of God, as He can turn His hand. He can make your harsh and ungodly husband to become gentle and gracious. He can bring your children to bow at the family altar, and to rejoice with you in Christ. He can cause your business to prosper; or, if he does not do that, he can strengthen your back to bear the burden of your daily cross.

Come, there is one more application, and that is that the Lord can convert those dear friends about whose souls you have been so anxious. The Lord who makes all things new can hear your prayers. One of the first prayers that I heard to-night in the prayer-meeting was by a dear brother that God would save his relatives. Then another with great tenderness prayed for his children. I knew it came from an aching heart. Some of you have the Lord break their hearts. You have grievous trouble because you hear the dearest that you have blaspheming the God you love. You know that they are Sabbath-breakers, and utterly godless, and you tremble for their eternal fate.

I liked what a brother said at the church-meeting on Monday night, when his brother was introduced to the church. I asked about his brother's conversion, and I said, "I suppose you were surprised to see him converted." He said, "I should have been very much surprised if he had not been." "But why, my dear brother?" I said. "Because I asked the Lord to convert him, and I kept on praying that he might be converted; and I should have been very much surprised if he had not been." That is the right sort of faith. I should be very much surprised if some of you that come here, time after time, are not converted. You shall be; blessed be God. We will give Him no rest until He hears us.

But come! Are we to be praying for you, and you not praying for yourselves? Do you not agree with our prayers? Oh, I trust you may. But, even if you do not, we shall pray for you; and if we were sure that you opposed our intercessions, and were even angry with them, we should pray all the more, for we mean to have you won for Jesus, by the grace of God, and you may as well come soon as late. We are bound to have you in the church confessing your faith in Jesus. We will never let you go, neither will we cease from our importunate prayers until we get an answer from the throne, and see you saved. Oh that you would yield on this first night of the year to Him who can make new creatures of you. God grant you may! Amen.

[Mr. Spurgeon would be exceedingly grateful if friends would endeavor to extend the circulation of these sermons. They have been so greatly used of God, both for the conversion and the edification of their readers, that he naturally desires more fruit of them. The introduction of the sermon into a new house might lead to the enlightenment of a family, and the salvation of many souls. The preacher has done his part of the work when he has studied, prayed over, delivered, and revised the discourse; it remains for friends to scatter it far and wide.]

THE great temperance physician, who has done so much to advance the cause of total abstinence, is a man whose reputation is world-wide. His profound learning and his extensive experience gave him the right to speak authoritatively on any question connected with the health of the human body and the effect upon it of articles of diet. When he became satisfied that intoxicating liquors, even in moderation, were harmful, he spoke out with no equivocal utterance, and the bottom fell out of the argument that intoxicants were necessary for health. So eminent an authority was a distinct gain to the cause, and probably there is not one of our readers who has not heard his opinions quoted by some temperance advocate. Some further knowledge of the man and his work will consequently be welcome.

Benjamin Ward Richardson is a native of Somerset, in the county of Leicester, England, and was born October 31st, 1828. He received his education at the University of Glasgow, with the view of preparing for the medical profession. In due time he graduated in medicine at the University of St. Andrew's. This took place in 1854, and it may be said in passing that, five years later, he received from the same university the honorary degree of M.A. In 1856 he became a member of the Royal College of Physicians, by examination, and in 1861 he was elected a fellow of the college. In 1867 the coveted distinction of F.R.S. (Fellow of the Royal Society) became his, and before that date he had been elected an honorary member of the Philosophical Society of America.

The facts thus briefly stated represent on his part a vast amount of hard work and of patient study, for all his distinctions were fairly won—a clear proof of which was given in 1868, when he was presented by six hundred of his medical brethren and fellows in science with a testimonial consisting of a microscope by Ross, and one thousand guineas ($5250). All these things, however, might have been pleasantly connected with the name of Dr. Richardson, and to them might have been added his discovery of the application of ether spray for the abolition of pain in surgical operations, and yet he would not have achieved the undoubted popularity which belongs to him but for one cause.

His reputation is largely based on the fact of his being what is generally known as a total abstaining physician, and that in the high position he has achieved as a medical man he has never concealed his principles, but has had the courage of his opinions under all circumstances.

MAMIE'S SACRIFICE.

"Is there no one but you in the house?" said a physician as he descended the stairs of a small cottage, addressing a child apparently about eleven years old.

"No, sir; mother and I live here by ourselves since father died."

"Have you any aunt or grandmother or friend of your mother's?"

"No, sir; not around here," said the child, shaking her head with its wealth of dark curls. "Aunt Leonard lives a long way off in Canada. She does not love mamma, and I never saw her but once since we came here."

"Well, we must do the best we can," said the doctor. "You seem to be a smart child, do you think you could make your mother some beef-tea?"

Mamie did not feel very confident of her powers in that direction, but she said she thought her mother would tell her how.

"Well," said the doctor, "you had better ask her, but do not worry her too much. She is very weak, and she must have some nourishment right away. Do your best, my dear. I will come and see you again to-morrow."

Mamie stole gently up-stairs to her mother's door, but not so quietly that the mother's quick ears did not hear her light step. "Come in, Mamie," she said, and the child went up to her mother and kissed her. The widow flung her arms around her neck and wept. Poverty had long pressed on the little home, and now sickness had stopped the little income the widow was able to earn and threatened to remove her altogether.

"Mamma," Mamie said at length, "the doctor says you must have some beef-tea. Do tell me how to make it."

"We cannot afford it, my child. I have scarcely any money left, and we shall need it to pay for the medicine the doctor has ordered. Bring me a little bread, I will try to eat that."

"Maybe the butcher would let us have a little meat, mamma, and you can pay him when you get well. I know he lets some people have it without the money. I've seen him do it, and he writes it down in a book."

"He would not do that for us, my dear, I am afraid."

"I will ask him, mamma, if you will let me; the doctor said you must have it."

"Well, my child, that would do no harm, but I'm afraid it would do no good. It is not poor people like us that the butcher sells to without money."

"I'll try, mamma; now tell me how to cook it."

The widow told her, but had no expectation of the child getting the needed meat. She had never asked for credit, but she knew too well that her modest purchases were not such as would encourage the butcher to run any risk.

Mamie hurried away on her errand, but in a few minutes she was standing outside the butcher's store with the tears running down her face. The salt shower came when the butcher coarsely refused her modest request. She went home, crying all the way, and sat down in the lonely parlor, not daring to tell her mother of the failure.

"Oh, was there no way of getting that meat that the doctor said her mother must have?" In a little work-box, wrapped in silver paper, lay a gold eagle, the gift to her of that Aunt Leonard of whom Mamie had spoken. It was her very own. She had often looked at it and had thought of the vast treasures she would buy with it when she grew up. She had polished it many a time and wrapped it up carefully, her one precious possession. Mamie thought of it now. How better could she spend it than for her dear mother? She took it out of its hiding-place, kissed it for good-by, and hurried out again to the butcher's. She made her purchase and strained her arithmetical powers to see that she had her right change, then gleefully hurried home to prepare the tea according to her mother's directions.

In about half an hour it was ready, and Mamie carried it up to her mother. But the widow was full of questions. "What did the butcher say? Was he willing to trust them? Was he kind?" Mamie broke down under the cross-examination, and finally, unable to keep her secret, told the whole truth. The beef-tea came very near being wasted under the widow's emotion. Clapping the child to her heart, she kissed her again and again, and thanked God for His great gift of a daughter's devotion.

The ten dollars slowly melted away under the good doctor's orders, but Mamie gladly spent them, delighted to see her mother growing stronger on the nourishment her little fortune supplied, and she counted it well spent.

Mamie had the pleasure, one never-to-be-forgotten day, of seeing her mother once more down-stairs looking thin and weak, but oh, so much better. Mamie is grown up now, with children of her own, and she has spent many a ten dollars since then, but she still holds to the belief that money can never bring to its possessor any pleasure equal to that it brings when it is spent for others. She has given her heart to Him who gave Himself to die that the world through Him might have life.

REES PRITCHARD AND THE WELSH GOAT.

IN Llandoverly, in Wales, the memory of the Rev. Rees Pritchard, vicar of the parish in the seventeenth century, is still held in honor and reverence. This remarkable man was educated at Oxford, and destined for the Church. He was admitted into holy orders at the usual age, and after a while appointed to the vicarage of his native town; but his character and conduct were for a considerable time utterly unbecoming his sacred office. Drunkenness prevailed in the town at that time, and to this vice he was especially addicted.

The story of his conversion is very singular and interesting. At the tavern which he frequented a large tame goat was kept, and it went in and out among the guests. On one occasion Rees Pritchard offered some ale to the animal, which, strange to say, swallowed it greedily, and soon fell down on the floor intoxicated. All present were horrified at this conduct, but Rees Pritchard himself made the affair a subject of jest, and, continuing to drink, was as usual conveyed helpless to the vicarage. The next day he was very ill, but, on the following one, went to the tavern again, and called for some ale and his pipe.

The goat, now quite recovered, stood by. When the tankard was brought, he again offered it to the creature, which, however, turned away its head in disgust, and hurried from the room.

The Goat's Example to the Dissipated Preacher.

This incident struck Rees Pritchard forcibly. "Alas! Alas!" said he to himself, "is this poor animal wiser than I? Yes, surely, having once experienced the misery of drunkenness, it refuses to incur it again, while I, who have suffered from it a hundred times, still persist in debasing myself. If I continue my present course what can I expect but wretchedness in this world and perdition in the next? But, thank God, it is not yet too late to mend.

Leaving his ale untasted, he went home to pray, and from that hour was an altered man. For more than thirty years he preached the Gospel in his native language, and composed many devotional poems, which were collected after his death into a volume, entitled the "Candle of the Welshman," a work which has gone through numerous editions, and is to this day the companion of the Bible in most of the cottages of the Principality.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

Reconciliation.

BOTH Hester and Rose knew that the critical moment was at hand. They sat in the little parlor holding each other's hands. Rose took courage from the scene she had witnessed to hope that for her, too, there would be forgiveness; but Hester knew that in her case her father would have a harder struggle. That one whom he had loved only too well, had cherished and treasured with all his heart, should have sinned against him, was a heavier blow than that dealt by Robert Waldron, a comparative stranger. But still Hester, too, hoped for the best, and encouraged Rose.

They listened breathlessly to the sound of footsteps descending the staircase. Would they come in here, both John Morley and Robert Waldron, and meet Rose face to face? She pressed her hand against her heart, praying silently to God to spare her this trial. The door was open, and they could hear distinctly all that was passing in the old-fashioned entrance-hall. Grant had come down with them, and said he would walk home with Robert. Then Robert spoke, in a troubled, scarcely articulate voice.

"John Morley," he said. "I have sinned grievously against you, and I can do nothing to atone for it to you. Yet I have suffered for my sin, and repented of it with a very bitter repentance. Can you pardon me?"

"As freely as God pardons us all," answered John Morley, in a clear tone. "Yet it may be you will have to bear the consequences of your sin all your life long. But if at any time I can help you to bear that burden, by counsel, by sympathy, by prayer, come to me and let us talk together as friend with friend. You are young yet—young, enough to do good work in the world. God bless you and give you peace!"

There was a minute's silence in the outer room, and then the house-door closed upon Grant and Robert; and John Morley's foot took a step or two toward his own forsaken parlor. Hester looked up into Rose's face, and saw it flushed and kindled with a new light. He who had forgiven Robert freely and with a blessing was coming toward her, his wife, whom he had loved with a profound passion. Neither of them moved, except that Rose leaned back in the chair, with a strange flutter of hope and joy making her tremble. He came on, entered the room, and stood just within the threshold, looking sadly toward them, as they sat together in the red firelight, upon his dishonored hearth.

"Father!" cried Hester, rising from her footstool, and going toward him as he remained motionless at the door.

"Do not go," he said, laying his hand upon her arm; "do not leave us. You have ministered between us this long time past. Stay with us still."

"But speak to her," urged Hester; "tell her that you forgive her, too, freely."

She drew him on toward the hearth, her arm pressed about him with a tender force, until he stood opposite to Rose, and looked down upon her fair face, which in the red light had borrowed some of the bloom of her girlhood. Her blue eyes, glistening with unshed tears, were raised to him in speechless entreaty; and he met their gaze with an unspeakable pity in his own.

"Child," he said, in a voice of trouble, mingled with compassion, "I have just seen you pass through a woman's keenest sorrow."

"No, no," sobbed Rose, "no, no! That was not my keenest sorrow. I shall soon go to her. I am going to die."

"Yes," he said, still looking down upon her with a strange tenderness.

"Oh," she cried, with a pitiful wail in her feeble voice, "if I could only do something to atone for it, to make you believe that I love you! I was such a silly, weak creature; I did not know then how much better your love was than this. You did love me before I was so wicked, didn't you?"

"Love you!" he echoed.

"Yes, I know it," she continued, wringing her hands. "I knew it as soon as I had forsaken you. Don't think I was ever happy. He was kind, but every word he spoke was a reproach to me. I had a little child, but she scarcely belonged to me; I could not let her live with me; I never nursed her; we never played together, like little Hetty and I used to play together, just after you married me. Do you remember? Oh, that was so happy! I feel as if I had been in heaven once, and fallen down, down into a pit of darkness. Shall we know each other in heaven, do you think?"

"I think we shall," he answered.

"Is it better for me to die than to live?" she asked, imploringly.

"God thinks it best," he said.

"If I had lived," she went on, "could you so have forgiven me that you could take me back again, quite back again to you, as your wife, whom you loved and trusted, as in the time before I deceived you? I don't think anybody could love you as I would. Oh, how I would wait and watch to please you! Could you have forgiven me so?"

"No," said John Morley, his whole heart yearning toward her, yet knowing that it was her doom so plainly read upon her face, which made it possible for him to keep her under his roof during the short span still remaining to her of life. The complication which he had dreaded when he heard that Rose was living was already disentangled. He would not be compelled to put her from him, against the softening of his own love and the urgent pleas of her penitence. He could see that a few weeks, or months it might be, remained, during which she could still be with him; he could look upon her and listen to her beloved voice without any wrong done to his own conscience. It was a great boon from the God he had distrusted.

"Child," he said—and from that time he called her by no other name—"I love you wondrously, and I thank God that He is going to call you home to Himself. I could not have taken you back living to my inmost heart, and to the wifehood which was your right once. But dying, I can shelter you here, within my own house, upon my own hearth, where Hester's mother died many years ago. And in my heart of hearts I can cherish the memory of you, coming home at last, weary of your long exile and sin, comforted by my tenderness, and passing away under my protection. Give thanks, my poor child, that your probation on earth is nearly ended."

Rose had lifted herself painfully and leebly from her chair, and stood opposite to him, listening with parted lips and beseeching eyes to his words, uttered in a voice of passionate affection. She could not altogether understand him yet, any more than she had done in those far-off times when he had seemed very high above her girlish comprehension. But she knew that he loved her and had forgiven her; he would not banish her again from the home from which she had fled, being easily tempted. As a child, whose intelligence cannot grasp all the meaning of its own fault and the pardon given to it, hides its childish tears in the bosom of its mother, Rose stretched out her arms to her husband. He hesitated for a moment, a hesitation which she did not see, and then drew her toward him, and laid her head upon his breast.

It was a pathetic sight, an ending to the trouble far different to that which Carl dreaded when he set out to search for Hester and her father. He had pictured the old man demented, with Hester in his power, ready for any desperate deed of violence. Could he have seen that aged Christian bending over the wicked but repentant wife, and looking at her with love in his eyes, he would have known that no man was ever farther from madness.

Carl obtained some relief to his anxiety on his hurried journey from France. At Paris he learned, through an interpreter, that two such travellers had passed through the day before, and had gone on direct for England. The station-master at Little Aston informed him mysteriously that there was a rumor in the town of Mr. Morley and his daughter having taken possession of their house again, and that there was certainly a lady with them, whom people believed to be no other than Mrs. Morley herself. Carl's anxiety fell from him in a moment. Hester was safe and at home again! He could not give a thought either to Rose or her husband.

Leaving his portmanteau upon the platform as a thing unworthy of his attention, he rushed with precipitate headlong haste to John Morley's house, haggard, dusty, and travel-stained, with eyes dull for want of sleep, and tangled hair falling in disorder about his careworn face. There was no difficulty in gaining admission; the house-door could be opened from the outside by simply turning the handle. He could not stay to knock. He paused no longer at the closed door of John Morley's parlor, but flung it open and strode in, with all the irresistible impatience which had been kept in check so long.

It had not been an idle day for Hester. There was no servant in the house, and though Lawson's mother did her best, and had been closely at work since the morning, many things had fallen to Hester's lot to do. Upstairs in Rose's drawing-room, sunny and pleasant, lay the dead form of the lonely little child, whose holidays had come too late to save her; and Hester's gentle hands had given to the room an air of soft tender repose, well suited to the peacefulness of little Hester's slumbers. Mr. Waldron and Robert had been in during the day to look at her for the last time; for to-morrow she was to be buried in a quiet churchyard a mile or two away from Little Aston, with John Morley and Grant alone to follow her to the grave.

In the dark parlor below, Rose had rested in the great chair upon her husband's hearth, waited upon by him with a marvellous carefulness and foresight. A singular and solemn satisfaction seemed to pervade the house. It was night again now; almost the hour when Hester and her father had stolen in home the evening before. Rose was in bed and had fallen asleep calmly. John Morley was gone to his own chamber; and Hester was alone in the parlor, watching the fire die out in the grate, and the light grow fainter about the crevices and corners of the walls. Robert had told her that Carl was gone to Burgundy in quest of her, and she was taking time now to follow him in his journey with somewhat troubled thoughts.

What would he do there, in that remote little town, where nobody knew a word of English? How could he find out what had become of them? Would it come into his mind that the curé might understand Latin, and could communicate with him in that language? Or would he wander about disconsolate and perplexed, seeking traces of her, and being unable to discover them? Of course it could not be for long; but she felt very much disturbed for him. How greatly he would be grieved that the little child had died while he was absent!

Hester's thoughts had reached this point when Carl made his abrupt entrance. He did not know what or whom he had expected to find beyond the closed door of John Morley's parlor. But he was not at all prepared to come upon Hester sitting all alone in the dim firelight, surrounded by the hush and stillness of a house which he had almost expected to find full of stir and tumult. It was several months since he had seen her, and the thought of her had grown almost a mocking and haunting fancy. Until very recently he had lived on in the belief that she was dwelling in some hiding-place very near to him, and that he might chance to cross her path any hour of any day.

For the last few days he had been in eager pursuit of her, and had lost her like a shadow. Now she sat in the dusky light, looking into the embers, but starting to her feet the instant that he strode into the room, and seeming ready to take flight again. He forgot that no word of love had ever crossed his lips to meet Hester's ear. She belonged to him by right of his great love and his great anxiety. He clasped her passionately in his arms, and laying his head down upon hers, was speechless in his great joy.

She made no effort to withdraw herself from his encircling arms, or to affect a maidenly reserve. She knew his character too well to have any doubt as to what that embrace meant. Carl was not a man whose actions are the creatures of impulse and she was sure that his next words would justify the endearing act. Presently Carl released her himself, only keeping her hand in his, as they stood side by side on the hearth, and he looked down upon her eagerly and with restrained delight. The smouldering fire shot up a friendly little blaze, whose light played about her delicate face, now tinged with a soft flush. She trembled a little; her fingers quivered in his clasp; the breath came fluttering through her parted lips. He could not break the delicious silence which had fallen upon them. Any words of his would be poor indeed compared to it.

"Carl," faltered Hester, in a tremulous voice, "little Hester is dead!"

He understood what she told him; he even felt a passing pain at hearing that the child had died so soon; but it only gave another touch like the unison note in music, to his perfect happiness. The tears shone upon Hester's long eyelashes; and he bent down and kissed them away.

"You know I love you," he said, in a tone half of apology and half of appropriation.

"Yes, I know," whispered Hester, her eyelids closed as he had left them, when his lips had been laid against them.

"And you love me?" he said.

"Yes, I love you," she whispered again.

"Hester," he said, with a man's quick jealousy, "look me in the face, and tell me that you never loved anybody but me."

"How could I?" she asked, raising her eyelids but a little, and keeping her eyes upon the ground. "You know how few people I have ever seen. You, and Grant, and—"

"Robert Waldron," he added, as she paused. "Yes; I understand; I know. I had no chance against a man like him. But then why did you not accept him, Hester? Only a few people, like your father, and me, and those who believe that there are many better and nobler and greater things than wealth, only we should have thought you had sacrificed the higher for the lower. He loved you as passionately, nearly as purely, as I do. You are free to change yet. You may leave me, and I will not utter a reproach. You will be very grand, very rich; and he said once to me that you were born for such a lot as he can give you. I am, compared to him, a poor man, and must be always poor. I have not even a home to offer you yet. I wish I had not kissed you, Hester. I beg your pardon for taking you in my arms. It was my surprise which overpowered me. Hester, why do you neither speak nor look at me?"

She had been standing beside him as he poured out his rapid words, perfectly motionless, with her eyes still bent upon the ground. The instinctive coquetry of a woman who is sure she is beloved, was playing about her heart, and teaching her the innocent artifices which go far in befooling men. She let him run on in his jealous outpouring without interposing a glance or a word; but when he stopped, she lifted up her eyes to his face, with a glance in them which he could not misunderstand.

"How foolish you are, Carl!" were the words she uttered.

Carl was afraid of stirring, lest she should take her hand from his, and sit down apart from him; and whenever she moved he held her more closely. The small flame died away, and the room grew very dark indeed, with no light except that which came through the open door from the lamp in the old house-place. They had said but very little to one another, when a clear, shrill, foreign voice caused Carl to start violently.

"Mademoiselle Hester, my angel," said Madame Lawson, "I must run away to my house for a little half hour. Is there anybody talking with you, my little one?"

"It is only Lawson's mother," whispered Hester. "I must go out to her for a minute."

She was away for several minutes, and came back with the lamp in her hand. Then Carl sighed a profound sigh. The exquisite moment was gone, and could never return.

"Oh, Hester!" he cried, with a sudden sorrow coming across his joy, "so that little child is dead! If I had not found you again, my dear love; if you had been altogether lost to me, little Hester would have been dearer to me than any one else in the world. Do you know that she loved you very dearly, and pined to see you once again? If you had but been at home in time to see her!"

"I did see her. She died in my arms," said Hester, in a sorrowful voice.

"God bless you, my Hester!" answered Carl. "Let me tell you all about it," she said, looking down shyly upon his radiant face, for he could not keep his grief in mind while he was gazing up at her. "My father and Rose are reconciled to one another!"

She told him the whole story in low, quiet, timid tones, with fitful blushes and tears, which she did not wish him to see, and which he appeared not to notice. He did not interrupt her, listening in a rapture and reverie of love, which made him willing to lie there for hours, hearing no sound but her dear voice, and seeing nothing but her dear face. Madame Lawson's little half hour proved to be a very long one; but neither of them was conscious of its length.

PAUL AT JERUSALEM.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 8, Acts 21 : 27-40. Golden Text, I Cor. 9 : 22. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Jewish Opposition Manifested—Their Accusations—Grounds of Superiority—Direct Communication with God—Not Descent nor Custom—Paul Appears in the Temple—The Signal for Attack—The Persecuting Spirit—Varied Manifestations—Paul Rescued by the Roman Captain—His Request.

THE expedient devised by the elders of the church at Jerusalem to appease the indignation of the Jews against Paul was entirely unsuccessful. There was nothing of God about it; it was a mere human plan, and, as such, came to naught. Paul's enemies were on the alert, "certain Jews from Asia" (Acts 24 : 18) were busy circulating rumors true and false about him. Wherever Paul had travelled, the barrenness and unspirituality of the synagogue-worship had been exposed by the very contrast it presented to a man who was full of the Holy Ghost, and sent of God among them. Those among the Jews at Antioch, in Pisidia, who were not open to receive the Gospel, were "filled with envy, and spake against those things which were spoken of Paul, contradicting and blaspheming" (Acts 13 : 45). At Iconium stirred up the Gentiles, and made their minds evil affected against the brethren," and there they made an assault "to use them despitefully and to stone them" (14 : 2, 5). Not succeeding in this, these representatives of the law, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," followed them to Lystra, and there succeeded in stoning Paul, and thus gave the Lord an opportunity to raise him up that the power of Christ should rest upon him, for the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead quickened his mortal body (Rom. 8 : 11).

Led by the Spirit into Europe, in the very first synagogue where Paul preached, the same bitter animosity toward him and toward the truth he taught was exhibited. "The Jews which believed not, moved with envy, took unto them certain lewd fellows of the baser sort, and gathered a company, and set all the city in an uproar;" and after succeeding in driving Paul and his companions from this city [Thessalonica], "when they had knowledge that the Word of God was preached of Paul at Berea, they came thither also, and stirred up the people" (Acts 17 : 5-13). Arrived at Corinth, Paul taught in the synagogue, but the Jews "opposed themselves, and blasphemed." Such were the "certain Jews of Asia" now in Jerusalem, who were ready to stir up the whole city against Paul.

The ostensible grounds of

against him, were very similar to those which we hear continually from the unspiritual members of a church toward those who follow the Spirit of God. The accusation was, that Paul taught the Jews who lived among the Gentiles that "they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs." The Jews claimed an essential superiority over the Gentiles. Paul admitted that they had an advantage, not because of their descent from Abraham, nor because of the covenant of circumcision now superseded, but "because that unto them were committed the oracles of God" (Rom. 3 : 2). Paul saw in the direct communication of God with man something infinitely superior to pedigree, or form, or custom, or any other thing. Away in heathen lands, where it was an impossible thing to carry out the customs and ceremonies of the Jewish religion, he could talk with God, and God with him, and with Gentiles, also, who had His Spirit. How could Paul continue to offer the sacrifices which were but a type and shadow of that sacrifice of Christ by which He stood every hour "accepted in the Beloved"? How could he teach the shadow to his converts when he had the substance to give them? With some sects it is a far greater sin to worship with some other sect than to transgress the commandments of God. With these unconverted Jews hatred, enmity, and even murder were not so heinous as the lack of observing any of the outward ceremonies of their religion. Paul taught, "He is not a Jew which is one outwardly, neither is that circumcision which is outward in the flesh" (Rom. 2 : 28), and on the other hand, "They which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham" (Gal. 3 : 7). The sin of the Jews was this, "Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost" (Acts 7 : 51). It was the Holy Ghost in Paul whom they were resisting.

After the seven days were ended, during which Paul had been occupied with the rites pertaining to the vow of the Nazirite, "the Jews which were of Asia, when they saw him stirred up all the people, and laid hands on him, crying out, Men of Israel, help!" What was the matter? What was the outrageous sin which had been committed? Hear them. "This is the man that teacheth all men everywhere against the people, and the law, and this place; and further, brought Greeks also into the temple, and hath polluted this holy place. (For they had seen before with him in the city Trophimus an Ephesian, whom they supposed that Paul had brought into the temple). And thus the whole outcry was about

A SUPPOSITION!

Suppose he had brought Trophimus into the temple? It would have been an unwise step, and an unnecessary one. But, had the multitude really understood the state of the case, they would easily have seen that a "temple of the Holy Ghost," entering into the temple of God could not defile it.

Nothing is so intolerant as religious persecution, nothing is so unreasoning. Twenty-five or thirty years ago, in many parts of England, the simple testimony of any one that he knew his sins forgiven brought upon him the most bitter scorn and contempt. When, some ten years ago, men of God were inquiring how they might live by the power of God, and be kept from sinning, a bitter and implacable animosity was aroused, chiefly among the children of God. In the present day the same persecuting spirit continues, manifested more especially against those whose bodies the Lord heals, and against those who join with them in prayer, and whose prayers the Lord answers. Generally, the main accusation is a supposition as was the case with Paul. "You believe every one is going to hell who has not been converted just as you were." This is one of the devil's suppositions. "You think you have lived three or four years without sin." Here is another of the devil's suppositions. "You think then that it is a sin to be ill." These are the supposititious charges brought against God's children now, just as the charge was brought against Paul. But to come down to the level of such accusations, and refute them, would be mere waste of time. Those who are determined to find fault will do so, with or without any ground for it. But "the Lord reigneth!" Out of all the apparent confusion of circumstances, He was drawing together such an audience of Jews to hear the Gospel from the lips of Paul as could not have been easily convened otherwise.

"All the city was moved, and the people ran together : and they took Paul, and drew him out of the temple : and forthwith the doors were shut." This was not all they wanted, "they went about to kill him." Paul, however, knew well he should not die; when he "purposed in the Spirit to go to Jerusalem," he knew that he "must also see Rome" (Acts 19 : 21), and thus he could not die until he had been to Rome. Tidings came to the chief captain that all Jerusalem was in an uproar. He was a man of energy, no doubt, for he immediately took soldiers and centurions and ran down to them." Here was the second cause of but the first cause was that God, who would not permit him to die at this time, had put it into the chief captain's heart to be thus expeditious in his movements. The presence of this man was enough; the people desisted from further lynch law.

The chief captain took Paul prisoner, commanding him to be bound with two chains, and then very naturally inquired who he was, and what he had done. This was the very question which the people could not answer; "some cried one thing, and some another, among the multitude." Out of this hubbub, the chief captain could make nothing, so he commanded that Paul be carried to the castle. This command, however, did not abate the excitement of the people, who continued following and crying, "Away with him!"

As Paul was to be led into the castle, he said to the chief captain, "May I speak unto them?" He replied in surprise, "Canst thou speak Greek? Art not thou that Egyptian which before these days madest an uproar, and leddest out into the wilderness four thousand men that were murderers?" Poor Paul! it was not very flattering, but it was to him to be judged of man's judgment; he lived and stood in the presence of God, and probably there was more of amusement than of wounded pride in his heart at this unexpected supposition. He answered calmly, "I am a man which am a Jew, of Tarsus, a city in Cilicia, a citizen of no mean city; and, I beseech thee, suffer me to speak unto the people." Above and beyond all the tumult, Paul saw the hand of God providing him an opportunity to preach the Gospel. Paul, a few moments before in danger of his life, and now only a few feet above the surging, raging multitude, was to his own consciousness, in the arms of Jesus, upheld and strengthened by a message from the Lord, which he was about to deliver to the people.

"ROCK OF AGES."

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me"
—Thoughtlessly the maiden sang;
Fell the words unconsciously
From her girlish, gleeful tongue;
Sung as little children sing,
Sung as sing the birds in June;
Fell the words like light leaves down,
On the current of the tune—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me"
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Let me hide myself in Thee"
—Felt her soul no need to hide;
Sweet the song as song could be—
And she had no thought beside;
All the words unheeding
Fell from lips untouched by care, Dreaming not they might be
On some other lips a prayer—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me"
—'Twas a woman sung them now,
Pleadingly and prayerfully
Every word her heart did know,
Rose the song as storm-tossed bird
Beats with weary wing the air,
Every note with sorrow stirred—
Every syllable a prayer—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me"
—Lips grown aged sang the hymn
Trustingly and tenderly
Voice grown weak and eyes grown dim,
"Let me hide myself in Thee";
—Trembling though the voice and low,
Ran the sweet strains peacefully
Like a river in its flow,
Sung as only they can sing
Who life's thorny paths have passed;
Sung as only they can sing
Who behold the promised rest—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me"
—Sung above a coffin lid;
Underneath, all restfully
All life's joys and sorrows hid,
Never more, O storm-tossed soul,
Never more will come wither and
Never more from billow's roll,
Will thou need thyself to hide.
Could the sightless, sunken eyes,
Closed beneath the soft gray hair,
Could the mute and stiffened lips
Move again in pleading prayer, Still, eyes, still the lips would be
"Let me hide myself in Thee."

DECEPTION IN ART.—No artist in this country is more competent than Mr. D. F. Brown (author of the Lord's Prayer engraving), to furnish a key by which any one can tell real art from deception. It is one of the first artists in the country and understands every style of picture-making. His complete description, and samples, representing real art and imitation, should be understood by every one. They are sent free to all.

ALFONSO XII, KING OF SPAIN—Scenes During the Recent Earthquakes.

ALFONSO XII., KING OF SPAIN.

His Birth, Education, and Exile—Troubles in Spain—"What is Exile?"—He Ascends the Throne in 1874—He Takes Command of an Army against Don Carlos—Incidents and Character—His Marriages.

THIS young king boasts of the following medley of names: Alfonso, Francesco de Assisi, Ferdinand, Pio Juan, Maria de la Concepcion, and Gregorio. He is the only son of the ex-Queen of Spain, Isabella II., and was born on November 28th, 1857; he is therefore twenty-eight years of age at present.

When his mother was driven from the throne of Spain, in 1868, by the revolutionary party, he fled with her to Paris. They received a cordial welcome from the Emperor Napoleon III., who on their arrival, accompanied by the Empress, hastened to pay them a visit. An incident occurred on the return of the Imperial party which subsequent events invested with sad significance. Napoleon in conversation with the Empress made some allusion to the sad interview in the presence of the little Prince Imperial, who suddenly exclaimed:

"Where are they going, papa?"

"Who?" inquired the Emperor.

"Why, the king you have been seeing."

"Louis, they are going into exile."

"Where is exile?" inquired the child.

The Emperor smiled sadly, and putting his hand on his son's head, said: "You shall know when you are bigger."

As our readers are aware, after a few years had passed away the boy had no need to ask for a definition of the melancholy word.

In Paris Alfonso went as a day-scholar to the celebrated Jesuit College of Stanislas. At that time he did not know a word of French, so that language was made his first study. He occupied a little study to himself very simply and plainly furnished, and was treated in all respects on an equality with his school-fellows.

While Alfonso was quickly learning French under his Jesuit tutor, were in inextricable confusion. The revolution which had driven the Royal Family into exile was the work exclusively of the army and navy; but the nation, disgusted with the personal character of the queen, had acquiesced in the change. But the conspirators discovered after they had succeeded so far, that dislike to the reigning family was almost the only sentiment on which they were agreed. While some advocated the proclamation of a Republic of a communistic character and a redistribution of property, others urged the restoration of the monarchy with their respective protégés for the crown. A provisional government was ultimately appointed to maintain order until the future form of government should be settled by a Cortes elected by universal suffrage.

When the Cortes assembled it was decided by a large majority that Spain should adhere to the monarchical form of government; but when the question arose as to the person on whose head the crown should be placed there seemed no possibility of agreement, and the Cortes adjourned, leaving the matter still in abeyance. After a short vacation the Cortes reassembled in November, 1869, and the discussion was resumed.

Early in the year 1870 a project was started to place on the throne of Spain Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern, a Prussian subject, distantly related to the Royal Family of that kingdom. The relations between the Courts of Berlin and Paris had for a long time been in a strained condition, and this proposal fanned the smouldering embers of jealousy and dislike into a blaze. The Emperor Napoleon declared war against Prussia, and in the struggle which followed lost his own throne.

Prince Leopold's name was withdrawn as a candidate for the Spanish throne, and negotiations were opened with Prince Amadeus, second son of Victor Emanuel, King of Italy, who was ultimately elected king by the Cortes, despite the earnest protest of many sincere Republicans. At the time of the election of this prince to fill the throne, Alfonso was also a candidate; but while Amadeus received one hundred and ninety-one votes, only two were recorded for Alfonso.

KING AMADEUS.

On the outbreak of the Franco-German War, Alfonso, then known as the Prince of Asturias, removed to Geneva, and thence to Vienna, where he continued his military studies in the Theresianum, or Nobleman's Academy. He remained three months in Vienna, and it was probably during that period that he first saw the lady who afterward became his bride. Leaving Vienna Alfonso went to England and entered as a student at the Military College at Sandhurst, where he had as fellow-students the young Prince Imperial of France and the Duke of Connaught, third son of Queen Victoria.

The Italian prince, who as King of Spain sought to restore order and harmony in the distracted country, soon found the task impracticable. He failed to win the allegiance of the Spanish grandees, and the masses of the people were inspired with that aversion to his rule which the people usually entertain for that of a foreigner. He several times narrowly escaped assassination, and weary of his hopeless effort he abdicated in the year 1873.

The abdication of King Amadeus was followed by the proclamation of a Republic, of which Castelar made himself Dictator. The Cortes, however, refused to recognize his authority, and the government passed into the hands of Marshal Serrano, who held office for about a year.

The distracted state of the country and the general lack of adhesion among the leaders and the officers of the army and navy brought about a state of anarchy. At this juncture of affairs, on December 29th, 1874, General Martinez Campos and Captain-General Primo de Rivera, supported by the army, suddenly proclaimed the young under the title of Alfonso XII.

When the news of his proclamation as King reached him, Alfonso was on a visit to his mother in Paris, whither he had gone in order to spend New Year's Day with her.

Hastening to Madrid he was most enthusiastically received on January 14th, 1875, and on February 15th, 1876, left that capital to take the command of the army which it had been found necessary to place in the field to operate against Don Carlos, his cousin, who had ever since 1873 been fighting, at the head of a large army of Ultramontane adherents, for the throne of Spain. Within a month the young king returned to Madrid in triumph. Don Carlos had been discomfited and had fled; some of his adherents, who were called Carlists, were banished, and others made submission to Alfonso.

In the same year (1876) his mother was allowed to return to Spain. Two years afterward, June 29th, 1878, he married his cousin.

THE PRINCESS MARIA DE LAS MERCEDES, Infanta of Spain, and daughter of the Duc de Montpensier. She was then in her eighteenth year. The marriage was violently opposed by the mother of the young king, and she left Madrid in fury. The Spanish Ministers were also opposed to the match, but Alfonso had loved his cousin from his boyhood, and with the determination which distinguishes men of his temperament, he insisted on having his own way. The devotion of Alfonso to his young wife was remarkable.

The happiness of the royal pair was very brief, for the young queen was stricken with typhoid fever, and died only five months after her marriage. Alfonso was overcome with grief; he shut himself up in his palace to weep over the coffin of his dead wife, and for two months refused to see any one except his secretary, and would not attend to public business. But gradually his grief was assuaged, and on November 20th, 1879, he was married to the Archduchess Christine, of Austria.

An account which has been published of

does not present a very exalted idea of his character or a hopeful one of the good results of his reign on the nation over which he is placed. A correspondent of a prominent journal says:

"His Majesty rises late, and his first care is to bathe his face carefully in Barège water to counteract the effects of a cutaneous affection which he inherits from his mother. Then, after swallowing innumerable sweet biscuits and two large cups of chocolate, he pays a visit to his stables; then presides at a Cabinet Council, signs some decrees, and spends the afternoon and evening riding or driving about the capital. When court mourning does not prevent him from doing so, the King, accompanied by his sister, goes regularly almost every evening to the theatre or opera, and every Saturday at sunset he repairs, with his sister and all the court, to the Church of Atocha to hear the service."

A life so empty and frivolous must necessarily be a useless one; but as the office of king has of late years become chiefly of an ornamental character, the kings being satisfied with reigning while their ministers govern, it is possible Spain may not suffer by the inefficiency of her king.

THE GREAT EARTHQUAKES IN SPAIN.

THE terrible earthquakes which desolated many cities in Spain during the last week of the year 1884 and the first few days of the present year, were briefly described in our news columns recently. We are now enabled to supplement those accounts, brought by cable, by the more detailed reports of newspaper correspondents who visited the scene of destruction and described the distressing condition of the country.

A correspondent at Malaga writes: "At five minutes to nine in the evening of Christmas Day, the inhabitants of this city, which numbers one hundred and twenty thousand, were startled by a shock of earthquake of an unprecedented magnitude in this place, and attended by circumstances of so unusual a character that a record of the events cannot be without interest. Without the slightest warning a slight movement of the earth was felt, followed by such as that of a heavy freight train, and then every house and building in the town was shaken to its foundations. As soon as people became awakened to a sense of their danger, intensified by the recollection of the recent terrible calamity at Ischia, a general rush was made for the doors. At eleven o'clock another less severe shock, in the same direction, was felt, and another more severe than the second at 2.30. During the remainder of the night, until sunrise, the earth continued to tremble, as many as eight or ten shocks, of more or less force, having been observed, all in the one direction and of the same undulating character.

"It would not be easy to give an account of the fear which possessed all classes in this city during

THAT FEARFUL NIGHT.

While the upper classes who had been celebrating Christmas in their family circles had hardly risen from the dinner-table, others were spending the evening at the theatres, which were both full, as is usual on feast days, and in one brief moment, when all were alike unprepared for so terrible an event, the pleasure was turned to terror. One universal cry of despair arose. Mothers screamed for their children, ladies and girls fainted and had hysterical fits, and those in the houses, like those in the theatres and cafés, rushed for the doors, and in a few seconds the whole population was

IN THE STREETS.

Indeed, so anxious were the people to get to the streets, that one man in his haste to escape from a café broke the glass doors with his fist and severed an artery in the arm, which caused his death.

"Once in the street, the universal question was, where to find shelter and safety for the night. All the cabs, omnibuses, private carlages, railway carriages, vans, and covered carts were put into requisition, and whole families lodged therein; while hundreds of people camped on the Alameda, squares, the bed of the Guadalupe River—fortunately dry at this season—and other open spaces. The effect reduced upon a family of women, children, and servants, at such a late hour of the night in which this turned into the street, harassed by the fear of a repetition of the shock, may be well imagined. In some cases, the most courageous returned to the thresholds of their houses, and sat in the halls and doorways; but one thought of retiring to rest until daybreak of the 26th. At noon on that day another slight shock was felt, and another at 3 P.M. So universally did the idea prevail that these serious shocks would be repeated precisely ten to twenty-four hours from the first, that, notwithstanding the heavy rainfall, the Alameda and other open spaces were crowded as in the previous night; and

CARRIAGES, WITH AND WITHOUT HORSES, were placed at a distance from the houses, and the better classes spent the night in them, while the poorer people found no other shelter than their cloaks and umbrellas, the carriages being only within the reach of a limited number of persons. As much as sixteen dollars was paid for a carriage without horses for the night, and for the heavy rain the whole of the population would doubtless have spent the night in the streets. A few families, however, were fortunate enough to find shelter in sheds erected for the packing of fruit, and in warehouses and wine cellars, and other one-story buildings, while the utmost House

AND THE SHIPS IN THE HARBOR were resorted to for shelter. In fact, the captain of the port issued orders that no vessel could leave during that night, and the steamer Albatros and other British ships received many millions on board. Other persons, who had sided with the town, resorted to them; some of them, however, to find that this refuge was uninhabitable. In the midst of the rain, as the dawn of the twenty-four hours approached, the image of the patroness of Malaga, Our Lady of Victories, was carried in solemn procession, headed by the bishop, from its church to the cathedral, a distance of about one mile, amid prayers and devout demonstrations of the people. (See frontispiece.)

THE DAMAGE TO HOUSES, CHURCHES, and other buildings is very considerable. A large number of houses have been ordered to be vacated by the authorities, who consider them unsafe; while there is hardly one house in which the interior wall and ceilings have not been cracked and seriously damaged. Among her buildings, two of the churches and the Custom House suffered severely. A large chimney, sixty yards high, belonging to the lead works of the Senores de Heredia, were so shaken that twenty yards have fallen down, fortunately no one was near. Many other factories and chimneys have also suffered much.

The correspondent of the London Standard gives the following description of the scene of a disaster. His communication is dated from Granada:

"I arrived here this evening, the journey being long and tedious owing to the disorganized state of the train service and by the crowds of people hurrying away from the Southern province. At Bobadilla we found several trains waiting in the station, crowded with and Granada. At the former town they have perished three severe shocks in the last twenty-four hours, one of them this morning, learned from the fugitives that the effect of these renewed shocks had been terrible, and at most of the houses damaged by the previous shocks had now fallen. At neither Malaga nor Granada had the people dared to enter their houses all night.

"As the train proceeded on its way we found the important stations of Antequera, Archidona, and Loja thronged with panic-stricken people, all anxious to take trains for the North. There was but little chance of their being able to do this, as every train which came through from the South was packed with fugitives. Pending means of getting away, considerable numbers of people had bivouacked round while others had filled the trucks and railway carriages in the sidings, in hopes that these would presently be coupled on to some passing train.

"An enormous destruction of property has taken place. An immense church at Antequera, and almost all the houses which remained standing there and at Alhama, have been levelled to the ground, but the loss of life has been smaller than might have been expected, as most of the population had already forsaken the towns and had taken refuge in the fields. About one thousand in all have perished.

"Granada is a great place for churches, and numerous processions, with crosses, banners, and lighted tapers, are moving about the streets in the frosty air. The people as they pass flock to the side, kneel, and pray bareheaded. The women sob and moan, the men mutter their prayers, and amid the deep and dismal chanting of the priests, the wails of the babes, half perished with cold, rise on the air. All the churches are open, and all night." In the country lying between Granada and the Alpajara chain of hills, and also on the sea-coast districts of the provinces of Granada and Malaga, on the other side of that chain—which appears to have been the centre of the line of force of the earthquake, the misery among the homeless villagers is terrible. The authorities are doing their best, and private charity is active, but these are unable to cope with the mass of distress and misery which exists.

THE TOWN OF ALHAMA,

on the 24th of December, contained about twelve thousand inhabitants, but the number has shrunk greatly since from deaths and flight. Of the seventeen hundred and fifty-seven houses, not two hundred can be repaired; all the rest have either fallen or are in so shattered a condition that they must be pulled down. All the five churches, the fine Casino or club, and the Town Hall are destroyed; and it may be said that the town is reduced to one great heap of ruins, from which rises an intolerable stench from the number of bodies still lying beneath it.

No bombardment, however severe, could achieve such complete and thorough destruction as has been wrought at Alhama. But terrible as was the aspect of the ruins of the town, that afforded by the human beings in it was still more melancholy. Hundreds of them, in spite of the risk of falling masonry, were scattered through the ruins. Some were searching at the spots which had once been their homes for some remains of their goods and property. In front of some of the ruins parents sat sobbing bitterly as they gazed helplessly at the masses of masonry and rubbish beneath which were lying the remains of their children. In some places women were lying together in the very abandonment of grief, too utterly despondent even to lift up their heads as we passed, or to hold out their hands for the charity which the governor was dispensing to all he met. Some threw themselves on their knees before him, and implored him to order the soldiers to dig beneath the ruins for their loved ones; while others, holding up their children and pointing to their pinched faces and famished looks, pathetically implored that assistance might be sent. A large house still standing, just opposite the Town Hall, had been turned into a hospital. Here, stretched upon straw palliasses, with scanty and insufficient covering, lay thirty badly-injured women and thirty-five men. Some of them were delirious, four were at the point of death; one of these had seen his wife, his father, and six children perish before his eyes.

As we left the town the scene was most impressive. A thousand persons of all ages and sexes were assembled outside the place to see the governor leave, cheering him, and begging him to plead with the king and country for relief. Women held up their babes, and showed him their pale faces and bandaged heads, and cries and sobs rose from the whole.

A visitor to the desolated districts on January 1st gives his impression of the scene, in which he says:

"It was quite dark, and well-nigh one hour after our regular time when we reached the Granada station, after having noticed many a camp fire and popular open-air gathering in the country around that town. We had hardly got our luggage out of the carriages when a very host of women, children, and men, some of them of the better classes, seized possession of the cars to make them their resting-place for this night.

"The fires, on closer examination, I found to be more than usually anxious to-night, because it is just a week to-day since they were unpleasantly surprised by the first shocks of earthquake. Nothing more quaint can be imagined. There, side by side, in wooden sheds and elegant, large marquees, flanked with great fires, were noble families, descendants of pure Hidalgo blood, marquises and humble tradesmen, a few paces from the sturdy gypsies, who seemed very little concerned about the much-dreaded shocks. These gatherings were picturesque in the extreme. A few paces off there was to be seen a motley array of private carriages, omnibuses, old antediluvian coaches, diligences, carts, wagons drawn up alongside in perfect harmony, as far as possible from neighboring buildings, and perfectly heedless of the fact that a shock would have sent them flying one against another. It seems that these temporary night refuges of high and low are brought there at nightfall, and their occupants sink off to their houses at daybreak and talk big as long as the sun shines, and until night brings back doubts and fears that pale the boldest of Andalusian gallants."

Further shocks of earthquake took place on January 7th, at Loja, an hour and a half distant from Granada in Spain. Shocks have also been felt as far distant as in Italy and Switzerland.

King Alfonso has personally visited the disturbed districts at considerable risk; for in several of the cities at which he stayed, the earth was still trembling, and buildings thrown out of perpendicular by the earlier shocks threatened to fall every moment. The king sought out the poor, made inquiries as to their need, and left a fund for their relief. From his own private fortune he gave $30,000; he induced the Cortes to vote a grant, and sent out an appeal for subscriptions from the municipalities and private persons. It would appear from this and other reports, such as that of the King of Italy visiting the patients in the cholera hospitals, that some of the European monarchs are reading rightly the lessons of the time, and are endeavoring to conciliate their subjects. Perhaps in some countries it may not be too late.

The narratives we have given here are only a specimen of a large number, some of which are heartrending. The agony endured by parents whose children have been crushed to death, of children whose parents have been killed, is almost inconceivable. As one reads the ghastly details and realizes the misery the earthquakes have caused, the mind is oppressed by the thought of that which, when the seventh veil is poured out, will shake the nations (Rev. 16: 18). "A great earthquake, such as never was since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake and so great." Those who are studying the prophecies and are watching the course of events know that that time of trouble cannot be far distant. The wise are observing our Saviour's injunction, "And what I say unto you I say unto all, Watch" (Mark 13: 37).

THE OLD FOLKS' VISIT.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, February 1, 1885.

"I will go and see him before I die."—GEN. 45: 28.
Grand Old People—Jacob's Bad Lot of Boys—The Sudden News from Egypt—Jacob's Quick Decision—The Strength of Parental Attachment—Memory of a Child Fifty Years Dead—Do Children Mature in Heaven?—Millard Fillmore's Father—Memorable Visits—Christian Parents' Visits—Joseph's Kindly Provision—Not Ashamed of his Rusticity—Shameful Harshness to Aged Parents—Good Unmarried Daughters—Queens of Self-Sacrifice—The Visit in the King's Palace.

JACOB had long since passed the hundred year mile-stone. In those times people were distinguished for longevity. In the centuries after persons lived to great age. Galen, the most celebrated physician of his time, took so little of his own medicine that he lived to one hundred and forty years. A man of undoubted veracity on the witness-stand in England swore that he remembered an event one hundred and fifty years before. Lord Bacon speaks of a countess who had cut three sets of teeth, and died at one hundred and forty years. Joseph Crele, of Pennsylvania, lived one hundred and forty years. In 1857 a book was printed containing the names of thirty-seven persons who lived one hundred and forty years, and the names of eleven persons who lived one hundred and fifty years.

Among the grand old people of whom we have record was Jacob, the shepherd of the text. But he had

A BAD LOT OF BOYS.

They were jealous and ambitious and every way unprincipled. Joseph, however, seemed to be an exception; but he had been gone many years, and the probability was that he was dead. As sometimes now in a house you will find kept at the table a vacant chair, a plate, a knife, a fork, for some deceased member of the family, so Jacob kept in his heart a place for his beloved Joseph. There sits the old man, the flock of one hundred and forty years in their flight having alighted long enough to leave the marks of their claw on forehead and cheek and temple. His long beard snows down over his chest. His eyes are somewhat dim, and he can see further when they are closed than when they are open, for he can see clear back into the time when beautiful Rachel, his wife, was living, and his children shook the Oriental abode with their merriment.

The centenarian is sitting dreaming over the past when he hears a wagon rumbling to the front door. He gets up and goes to the door to see who has arrived, and his long absent sons from Egypt come in and announce to him that Joseph instead of being dead is living in an Egyptian palace, with all the investiture of prime minister, next to the king in the mightiest empire of all the world!

THE NEWS WAS TOO SUDDEN and too glad for the old man, and his cheeks whiten, and he has a dazed look, and his staff falls out of his hand, and he would have dropped had not the sons caught him and led him to a lounge and put cold water on his face, and fanned him a little.

In that half delirium the old man mumbles something about his son Joseph. He says: "You don't mean Joseph, do you? my dear son who has been dead so long. You don't mean Joseph, do you?" But after they had fully resuscitated him, and the news was confirmed, the tears begin the winding way down the cross roads of the wrinkles, and the sunken lips of the old man quiver, and he brings his bent fingers together as he says: "Joseph is yet alive. I will go and see him before I die."

It did not take the old man a great while to get ready, I warrant you. He put on the best clothes that the shepherd's wardrobe could afford. He got into the wagon, and though the aged are cautious and like to ride slow, the wagon did not get along fast enough for this old man; and when the wagon with the old man met Joseph's chariot coming down to meet him, and Joseph got out of the chariot and got into the wagon and threw his arms around his father's neck, it was an antithesis of of simplicity and pomp, of filial affection and paternal love, which leaves us so much in doubt about whether we had better laugh or cry, that we do both. So Jacob kept the resolution of the text: "I will go and see him before I die." And if our friends the reporters would like to have an appropriate title for this sermon, they might call it "The Old Folks' Visit."

What a strong and unfailing thing is parental attachment! Was it not almost time for Jacob to forget Joseph? The hot suns of many summers had blazed on the heath; the river Nile had overflowed and receded, overflowed and receded again and again; the seed had been sown and the harvests reaped; stars rose and set; years of plenty and years of famine had passed on; but the love of Jacob for Joseph in my text is overwhelmingly dramatic. Oh, that is a cord that is not snapped, though pulled on by many decades! Though when the little child expired the parents may not have been more than twenty-five years of age, and now they are seventy-five, yet the vision of the cradle, and the childish face, and the first utterances of the infantile lips are fresh to-day, in spite of the passage of a half century. Joseph was as fresh in Jacob's memory as ever, though at seventeen years of age the boy had disappeared from the old homestead. I found in our family record the story of an infant that had died fifty years before, and I said to my parents: "What is this record, and what does it mean?" Their chief answer was a long deep sigh. It was yet to them

A VERY TENDER SORROW.

What does that all mean? Why, it means our children departed are ours yet, and that cord of attachment reaching across the years will hold us until it brings us together in the palace, as Jacob and Joseph were brought together. That is one thing that makes old people die happy. They realize it is reunion with those from whom they have long been separated.

I am often asked as pastor—and every pastor is asked the question—"Will my children be and forever children?" Well, there was no doubt a great change in Joseph from the time Jacob lost him, and the time when Jacob found him—between the boy seventeen years of age and the man in midlife, his forehead developed with a great business estate; but Jacob was glad to get back Joseph anyhow, and it did not make much difference to the old man whether the boy looked older, or looked younger. And it will be enough joy for that parent if he can get back that son, that daughter, at the gate of heaven, whether the departed loved one shall come a cherub or in full-grown angelhood. There must be a change wrought by that celestial climate and by those supernal years, but it will only be from loveliness to more loveliness, and from health to more radiant health. O parent, as you think of the darling panting and white in membranous croup, I want you to know it will be gloriously bettered in that land where there has never been a death and where all the inhabitants will live on in the great future as long as God! Joseph was Joseph notwithstanding the palace, and your child will be your child notwithstanding all the raining splendors of everlasting noon. What was that of the old shepherd to the prime-minister Joseph! I see the old countryman seated in the palace looking around at the mirrors and the fountains and the carved pillars, and oh! how he wishes that Rachel, his wife, was alive and she could have come there with him to see their son in his great house. "Oh," says the old man within himself, "I do wish Rachel could be here to see all this!" I visited at the farmhouse of the father of Millard Fillmore when the son was President of the United States, and the octogenarian farmer entertained me until eleven o'clock at night telling me what great things he saw in his son's house at Washington and what Daniel Webster said to him, and how grandly Millard treated his father in the White House. The old man's face was illumined with the story until almost the midnight. He has just been visiting his son at the Capitol. And suppose it was something of the same joy that thrilled the heart of the old shepherd as stood in the palace of the prime-minister. It when your old parents came to visit you. You little children stand around with great wide open eyes, wondering how anybody could be so old. The parents cannot stay many days, if they are a little restless, and especially at night fall, because they sleep better in their own bed but while they tarry you somehow feel there is a benediction in every room in the house. They are a little feeble, and you make it as easy as you can for them, and you realize they will probably not visit you very often—perhaps never again. You go to their room after they have retired at night to see if the lights are properly put out, for the old people understand candle and lamp better than the modern apparatus for illumination. In the morning, with real interest in their health, you ask them how they rested last night. Joseph in the historic scene of the text did not think any more of his father than you do of your parents. The probability is, before they leave your house they have spoiled your children with kindnesses. Grandfather and grandmother are more lenient and indulgent to your children than they ever were with you. And what wonders of revelation in the bomb sine pocket of the one and the sleeve of the other!

Blessed is that home where Christian parents come to visit. Whatever may have been the style of the architecture when they come, it is a palace before they leave. If they visit you fifty times, the two most memorable visits will be the first and the last. Those two pictures will hang in the hall of your memory while memory lasts, and you will remember just how they looked, and where they sat, and what they said, and at what figure of the carpet, and what doorsill they parted with you, giving you the final good-by. Do not be embarrassed, your father came to town and he have the manners of the shepherd, and if your mother comes to town and there be in her hat no sign of cost millinery. The wife of Emperor Theodosius said a wise thing when she said: "Husband, remember what you lately were, and remember what you are, and be thankful."

By this time you all notice what

KINDLY PROVISION

Joseph made for his father Jacob. Joseph does not say: "I can't have the old man crowd this place. How clumsy he would look climbing up these marble stairs, and walking over those mosaics! Then, he would be putting his hands upon some of these frescoes. People would wonder where that old greenhorn came from. He would shock all the Egyptian court with his manners at table. Besides that, he might get sick on my hands, and he might, querulous, and he might talk to me as though were only a boy, when I am the second man in all the realm. Of course, he must not suffer, as if there is famine in his country—and I have there is—I will send him some provisions; but I can't take a man from Padan-aram and introduce him into this polite Egyptian court. What a nuisance it is to have

POOR RELATIONS!"

Joseph did not say that, but he rushed out to meet his father with perfect abandon of affection and brought him up to the palace, and introduced him to the Emperor, and provided for all the rest of the father's day, and nothing was too good for the old man while living; and when he was dead Joseph, with military escort, to his father's remains to the family cemetery at Machpelah and put them down beside Rachel seph's mother. Would God all children were kind to their parents!

If the father have large property, and he be so enough to keep it in his own name, he will be respected by the heirs; but how often it is when the son finds his father in famine, as Joseph found Jacob in famine, the young people make it very hard for the old man. They are so surprised he eats with a knife instead of a fork. They are chagrined at his tedious habits. They are provoked because he cannot hear as well as he used to, and when he asks it over again, and the son has to repeat it, he bawls in the old man's ear: "I type you hear that!" How long must they get in a new one! How chagrined they are at his dependence of the English grammar! How long he hangs on! Seventy years and not gone yet! Seventy-five years and not gone yet! Eighty years and not gone yet! Will he go? They think it of no use to have a doctor in his last sickness, and go up to the apothecary and get a dose of something that makes him worse, and economize on a coffin, and beat the undertaker down to the last point, giving a note for the reduced amount which they never pay! I have officiated at obsequies of old people where the family have been so indifferently resigned to the Providence that I felt taking my text from Proverbs: "The eye let mocketh at his father, and refuseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it, and the young eagles shall eat it." In her words, such an ingrate ought to have a cock of crows for pall-bearers! I congratulate you if you have the honor of providing for aged parents. The blessing of the Lord God of Joseph and Jacob will be on you.

I rejoice to remember that though my father died in a plain house the most of his days, he died in a mansion provided by the filial piety of one who had achieved a fortune. There the togenarian sat, and the servants waited on him, and there were plenty of horses and plenty of marriages to convey him, and a bower in which to sit on long summer afternoons, dreaming of the past, and there was not a room in the house where he was not welcome, and there were musical instruments of all sorts to regale him; and when life had passed, the neighbors came out and expressed all honor possible, and carried him to the village Machpelah and put him down beside the Rachel with whom he lived more than half a century.

SHARE YOUR SUCCESSES

With the old people. The probability is, that the principles they inculcated achieved your fortune. Give them a Christian percentage of kindly consideration. Let Joseph divide with the old the pasture fields of Goshen and the vines of the Egyptian court.

And here I would like to sing the praises of the sisterhood who remained unmarried that they might administer to aged parents. The eternal world calls these ungallant names, and says they are peculiarly angular; but if you had had as many annoyances as they have had, Xantippe would have been an angel compared with you. It is easier to take care of five rollicking, romping children than of one childish old man. Among the best women of Brooklyn and of yonder transatlantic city are those who allowed the bloom of life to pass away while they were caring for their parents. While other maidens were asleep, they were soaking the old man's feet, or tucking up the covers around the invalid mother. While other maidens were in the mill, they were dancing attendance upon senility, and spreading plasters for the rheum back of the septenarian, and heating catnip for insomnia.

In almost every circle of our kindred there is some one whom jewelled hand after jewelled hand was offered in marriage, but who stayed on the old place because of the sense of filial obligation until the health was gone and the attractiveness of personal presence had vanished. Brutal society may call such a one by a nickname. God calls her daughter, and Heaven calls her saint, and I call her domestic martyr. A half dozen ordinary women have not as much nobility as could be found in the smallest joint of the little finger of her left hand. Although the world has stood six thousand years, this is the first apotheosis of maidenhood, although in the long line of those who have declined marriage that they might be qualified for some especial mission are the names of Anna Ross, and Margaret Breckinridge, and Mary Shelton, and Anna Etheridge, and Georgiana Willetts, the angels of the battle-fields of Fair Oaks, and Lookout Mountain, and Chancellorsville, and Cooper Shop Hospital; and though single life has been honored by the fact that the three grandest men of the Bible—John and Paul and Christ—were

CELIBATES.

Let the ungrateful world sneer at the maiden aunt, but God has a throne burnished for her arrival, and on one side of that throne in heaven there is a vase containing two jewels, the one brighter than the Kohinoor of London Tower, and the other larger than any diamond ever found in the districts of Golconda—the one jewel by the lapidary of the palace cut with the words: "Inasmuch as ye did it to father," the other jewel by the lapidary of the palace cut with the words: "Inasmuch as ye did it to mother." "Over the hills to the poorhouse" is the exquisite ballad of Will Carleton, who found an old woman who had been turned off by her prospered sons; but I thank God I may find in my text "Over the hills to the palace."

As if to disgust us with unfilial conduct, the Bible presents us the story of Micah, who stole the eleven hundred shekels from his mother, and the story of Absalom, who tried to dethrone his father. But all history is beautiful with stories of filial fidelity. Epanimondas, the warrior, found his chief delight in reciting to his parents his victories. There goes Æneas from burning Troy, on his shoulders Anchises, his father. The Athenians punished with death any unfilial conduct. There goes beautiful Ruth escorting venerable Naomi across the desert amid the howling of the wolves and the barking of the jackals. John Lawrence burned at the stake in Colchester, was cheered in the flames by his children, who said: "O God, strengthen thy servant and keep thy promise!" And Christ in the hour of excruciation provided for His old mother. Jacob kept his resolution, "I will go and see him before I die," and a little while after we find them walking the tessellated floor of the palace, Jacob and Joseph, the prime-minister proud of the shepherd.

I may say in regard to the most of you that your parents have probably visited you for the last time, or will soon pay you such a visit, and I have wondered if they will ever visit you

IN THE KING'S PALACE.

"Oh," you say, "I am in the pit of sin!" Joseph was in the pit. "Oh," you say, "I am in the prison of mine iniquity!" Joseph was once in prison. "Oh," you say, "I didn't have a fair chance; I was denied maternal kindness!" Joseph was denied maternal attendance. "Oh," you say, "I am far away from the land of my nativity!" Joseph was far from home. "Oh," you say, "I have been betrayed and exasperated!" Did not Joseph's brethren sell him to a passing Ishmaelitic caravan? Yet God brought him to that embazoned residence; and if you will trust His grace in Jesus Christ you, too, will be empalaced. Oh, what a day that will be when the old folks come from an adjoining mansion in heaven, and find you amid the alabaster pillars of the throne-room and living with the king! They are coming up the steps now, and the epauletted guard of the palace rushes in and says: "Your father's coming, your mother's coming!" And when under the arches of precious stones and on the pavement of porphyry you greet each other, the scene will eclipse the meeting on the Goshen highway, when Joseph and Jacob fell on each other's neck and wept a good while.

But oh, how changed the old folks will be! Their cheek smoothed into the flesh of a little child. Their stooped posture lifted into immortal symmetry. Their foot now so feeble, then with the sprightliness of a bounding roe as they shall say to you: "A spirit passed this way from earth and told us that you were wayward and dissipated after we left the world; but you have repented, our prayer has been answered, and you are here; and as we used to visit you on earth before we died, now we visit you in your new home after our ascension." And father will say, "Mother, don't you see Joseph is yet alive?" and mother will say, "Yes, father, Joseph is yet alive." And then they will talk over their earthly anxieties in regard to you, and the midnight supplications in your behalf, and they will recite to each other the old Scripture passage with which they used to cheer their staggering faith: "I will be a God to thee and thy seed after thee." Oh, the palace, the palace, the palace! That is what Richard Baxter called "The Saints' Everlasting Rest." That is what John Bunyan called the "Celestial City." That is Young's "Night Thoughts" turned into morning exultations. That is Gray's "Elegy in a Churchyard" turned to resurrection spectacle. That is the "Cotter's Saturday Night" exchanged for the Cotter's Sabbath morning. That is the shepherd of Salisbury Plains amid the flocks on the hills of heaven. That is the famine-struck Padan-aram turned into the rich pasture fields of Goshen. That is Jacob visiting Joseph at the emerald castle.

REMARKABLE FAITH CURES.

The following testimony is published in Thy Healer, edited by Mrs. M. Baxter:

"For three years I had been suffering from an internal illness. The doctor attended me at regular intervals, and gave no hopes of cure. I was obliged to wear a support, and was in constant pain. I often read in the CHRISTIAN HERALD of the wonderful healing at Bethesda, and longed to be relieved from the pain and misery which I had to endure. So in June, 1884, thinking I might be healed in answer to the prayers of others, I wrote to Miss Murray, who, in answer to my letter, said a lady would call upon me; and on June 20th Miss Hopwood came; she showed me the truth of Christ, the Healer of our bodies, as well as the Saviour of our souls, and that He was always ready to heal us, as to forgive us our sins, if we yield ourselves, spirit, soul and body entirely to Him. She then left me to think over all she had said, and came again June 30th, when I was anointed, and I cannot tell how happy I felt.

"After Miss Hopwood had gone, I removed the support, and thanked God for what He had done for me, and from that day I have never felt one bit the worse for it. My doctor came at the usual time, about ten days after—I told him what I had done; he looked surprised, but said nothing, thinking, no doubt, that I should soon require him again; but, thank God, I have not needed him."

A brother said: "I have suffered from consumption and for ten years. The doctor refused to give me any more medicine, saying it was no use. I was worn to nothing, my chest fallen in. I had heard of faith-healing, but could not believe it was my Father's will. However, I came here last Wednesday, almost bent double with pain. The pain of years seemed to be concentrated into a few moments. I came to meet the Lord, and He met me and healed me. The pain left me; and to make sure I was healed, I walked all the way from King's Cross to Paddington, and when I reached home, walked another mile. I went the next day to Regent Hall, walking all the way. My pain is gone, the cough has almost left me, my chest is filling out, and my wife says I am growing fat."

A FAGIN TRANSFORMED.

A MIDDLE-AGED man of most dissipated habits, who lived by training young thieves, was a sad annoyance to the superintendent of one of the Ragged Schools in the east of London. His house was a hell upon earth, and Satan had had his seat in it for many years. By cunning and duplicity this thief-maker managed to keep out of the grip of the law, and he gloried in setting at defiance the preachers of the Gospel. He proclaimed himself an atheist, and made his infidelity an excuse for his sensualism.

But the pious superintendent resolved that he would, through God's grace, effect this wicked man's conversion. He felt that nothing was impossible with God, and he had the faith which removes mountains. He had, too, the talent for combining the wisdom of the serpent with the harmlessness of the dove. His first care was to find out the cuspidities of the thief-maker's nature. Case-hardened against reproof, it was ascertained that he could yet be moved by kindness, and that the power of music had been known to melt his savage heart to tenderness.

One Sabbath afternoon the superintendent was on the watch for the wicked man. He found that he would pass down the lane where the school-house is situated about the time the school was being taught. He stood in the doorway, and at length the thief-maker appeared. As he was passing, the superintendent said, in very kindly tones, "Well, my good friend, how are you to-day?" The man stood stock-still. He could scarcely believe that the religious man, who must know his character, should address him thus. But he replied civilly, and was about to pass on, when the superintendent gently put his hand on his shoulder, and said, "Now, my friend, I know you are very fond of music—I see it in your eye—will you just step in and hear how nicely my boys sing?" He consented, and the superintendent placed him unobserved on the end of a seat near to the door. He then called all to their seats, the lesson being just over, and the well-trained boys sang the hymn:

"Plunged in the gulf of dark despair,
We wretched sinners lay,
Without one cheering beam of hope
Or spark of glimmering day," etc.

And as the melody rose in its pathetic power, he watched the effect on the countenance of the stranger. He was thankful to see that the man was pleased and interested. Then changing the subject, he lead the beautiful hymn,

"Oh, how He loves!"

And as it was being sung by a hundred voices, he seated himself quietly by the man, and opening the Bible before him, asked, "Can you read?" "A little," was the reply. "There, then, read that," said the superintendent, and he put before him such passages as these: "As I live, saith the Lord, I have no pleasure in the death of the sinner, but would rather he would turn from his evil ways and live." "Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die?" And this: "God so loved the world, that He gave His only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him might not perish, but have everlasting life."

"What does that mean?" asked the man, very earnestly. "What book is that?" And the superintendent told him it was the Bible, and meant his salvation. And the thief-maker became full of thought. That God loved him in spite of his wickedness and desired his salvation was to him astonishing.

By this time the music ceased, when another hymn—a "lament" on the death of Christ—was sung with great tenderness. This fairly overcame the thief-maker. He could stand it no longer; his heart was melted, and tears flowed. Then the superintendent, in a whisper, but faithfully and affectionately, preached Christ. Conviction, deep and earnest, was produced, and while conscience seemed to raise a thick cloud of darkness before his eyes, the devoted teacher, fearing that the devil might lead him to despair, started a song of triumph, which inspired him with hope.

The school was dismissed. But the superintendent did not leave his pupil to go home alone. He went with him, read to him, conversed with him, prayed for him, invited him to his house, and never ceased to labor and to pray until that man's soul was saved.

And, oh, it was a glorious triumph! Twenty years have passed away since the thief-maker was brought to the feet of Christ. He has been since then engaged in a responsible public situation, and has distinguished himself by his consistency and devotedness in the service of the Lord. The native force of character which made him so dangerous in the service of Satan, has made him, by the power of God's grace, most useful in the service of God. Instead of training boys to become thieves, he trains boys to become Christians, and, having had much forgiven, he loves much.

A BEAUTIFUL DEATH.

THE beloved wife of the Rev. Dr. Horatius Bonar, the eminent expositor of prophecy, passed away to be with Jesus on December 3d, after only a few days' illness. Her daughter writes: "My dear mother was conscious throughout, and very much herself, full of interest in everything, and full of love to present and absent friends. But her heart was in heaven.

"We had not told her she was dying, for we could not believe it ourselves; but she did not need to be told. 'Don't be frightened,' she said, 'if I say, 'Father, into Thy hands I commit my spirit.' And again, 'I feel as if I were just slipping away. I don't think I could feel different if I were going to die.' And again, 'Don't cry about me.'

"Near the beginning of her illness, she said to her husband, 'Pray with me, for I am in sore trouble.' But it was the only time that she seemed greatly distressed. This was the nearest approach to anything like spiritual trouble, as if the very excess of her calm and confidence perplexed her for a moment. When reminded that it was Jesus in whom she was trusting, the shade passed.

"Her son told her the text he had chosen for a little meeting: 'Being justified by faith, we have peace with God.' She fairly started with delight, and said, 'How strange, that is the only text I have been able to fix in my mind all day!'

"I wonder whether Jesus will carry me all the way, or if He'll just come and meet me at the door."

"There now, I have got relief. Do you think it was an angel that helped me?"

"She did pray for recovery; and once she said, after a good sleep: 'I think the Lord has taken me in hand Himself, and is healing me. How good He is.' She was full of thankfulness every time she thought herself a little better, and yet just as thankful and cheerful when it was not so. Either way seemed good to her.

"There could be no gloom near her; she was so glad and contented, and so full of gratitude for everything done for her. When very weary, she asked me to repeat, 'Come unto me, all ye that are weary and heavy laden.' And again, she asked for 'Calm me, my God, and keep me calm.' Many times she asked for singing. Among others, 'Though troubles assail,' 'Peace, perfect peace,' 'There are angels hovering round,' were sung. 'Jesus, Lover of my soul,' was sung to her very near the end, and even then she joined in a feeble alto.

"Drop it softly," she said, to a dear friend who was repeating holy words to her; 'say that over again, softer,' she would say. 'Then drops from heaven fell,' she whispered two or three different times in such a satisfied voice, as if conscious of the peace being poured into her soul.

"She often fancied she had seen her mother, or her children, lost long ago. While fully aware that this was only a fancy, she yet seemed to feel herself very near them.

"After talking a good deal, she sank into a sort of stupor during the last few hours. Yet she could be roused when spoken to. 'Do you know me?' was sometimes asked. 'To be sure I do,' she would say, as if surprised at this question. She seemed as if composing herself for a night's rest. 'Be quiet—hush—good night,' she said, then the pulse died away, in perceptibly, and without ever seeing death, she saw her Saviour.

"She was one who in former times has greatly feared the act of dying. 'It is terrible to die, and be laid in the grave,' she used say, with a shudder. 'The only thing that reconciles me to it is that Jesus lay there. Only a few weeks ago she said: 'I think there must be something fearful in the rending asunder of soul and body.' Yet when the hour came she not only never passed through the fainter shadow of the struggle she had dreaded, but the very thought of it never crossed her mind. 'S the Lord keeps His word: 'He that keepeth m saying shall never see death.'"

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Boys Without a Backbone.—At a recent meeting Mr. Arthur, urging young people to begin life at peace with God, said: "I was just thinking of two lads who left school with me. These two young men had no firm standing; they seemed to have no back-bone, and were into the whirlpool of life, and were very soon drifted down by it; they are dead now, and both fill drunkard's graves. If you begin we you are sure to end well. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. There is no companion and Friend like Christ, as He is the Alone All-sufficient and ever gracious Saviour."

Let Me Carry You, Tommy.—Said a Father to his little boy, as they came to a rough and difficult part of the road. "Oh, no," said Tommy, "I can manage very well by myself." But by and by he stumbled on one rock, and then on another, till he fell into a muddy pool. "Let me carry you now, Tommy," said his father, as he lifted him out of the pool. "O yes, father, please." But, oh, why will the children of God try to walk in their own strength till they bruise themselves on the rocks of sin and fall into the mire of iniquity instead of letting the blessed Master carry them in His arms?

A Dream of Hell.—Mrs. Vans said: "I once read of a man who dreamt that he was in hell. He saw a woman there with whom he used to play cards and gamble. He thought he saw him sitting playing at some game, and he said, 'You seem to be at rest.' At the mention of the word 'rest' she started up, tore her dress open and showed him her heart, which seemed to be in a mass of flames, while she exclaimed, 'Rest! rest! Oh, there is no rest here!' The man awoke. This awful vision of the night was blessed by God to his salvation. It brought him to a sense of his sinful state before God, and he fled to Jesus, where, for the pardon of his sin and in Him, as all true penitents do, he found rest and peace unspeakable, and full of glory."

A Sailor's Surprise.—A Christian Worker says: "On one occasion I was speaking to a sailor about his soul, and when I solemnly appealed to him, he replied, 'Why, I never did any real harm in my life; I don't drink nor swear nor do I remember having told a lie in my life. I have never done any real wrong; the worst thing I ever remember doing was taking another's rations at dinner when he was absent, as you would not consider that any real harm,' told him that I did; to say the least of it, it was selfish. But then we did not require to do it, great wrong to keep us out of heaven; just lead a selfish life, and that will do it. I pointed out to him the only means by which he could be saved. I led him to the cross, and he is now sitting at Jesus' feet, saved, cleansed, and taught by Him."

A Lady's Mistake Corrected.—A Christian worker says: "Over in America a lady came to a meeting, and was convinced of sin. She considered a very amiable and even a good person."

son, but now she showed the true state of her heart. She blasphemed God, saying, 'God is infinitely unjust. Why did He not let me see the true state of my carnal nature? Why does He let my brother and my sister go along in the wrong way, when they do not know any other?' About five weeks afterward she went to the minister's house with a changed face, and told him that she had been all wrong, that God was good and just, and that it was she who was unjust to God. She said, 'I never would read the parts of the Bible that told of His love and goodness, nor the warnings which He had given us; it was I who was wrong, not God; I can thank Him now, for He has shown me my true state before Him.'"

Defending a Bad Husband.—"I Went to visit a woman, whose house had the appearance of great poverty, and after I had spoken to her she said, 'Please, sir, don't tell my husband that I don't drink.' Looking round the room, I said, 'If you had not told me that you did not drink I would not have believed it; what is the meaning of these empty shelves? You have not a dish in the house, and nothing on your floor but dirt. It has certainly the look of a drunkard's home.' 'Oh, don't blame my husband,' she said, 'he was once a good man.' 'It is not the husband I am speaking of; it is the drink,' I said, 'Do you not know me?' she asked. 'No, I do not,' I replied. 'Well, you did know me when I was a little girl,' she answered. When she told me who she was I was much surprised there was such a great change. She at one time belonged to a very respectable family and married a man who was quickly going, unknown to her, down the road to destruction; but now it was too late, and she was being pulled after him."

A Sight of Queen Victoria.—"A Little Boy had a great wish to see the Queen, and with this thought in his mind he went and stood about the gate of Windsor Castle. By and by, growing tired of waiting, he tried to enter the gate, but the sentinel stopped him and asked what he wanted; and the little boy said he wished to see the Queen. The sentinel told him that was impossible, but while he was speaking, the Prince of Wales came up and said: 'Well, my little man, what do you want?' and the boy, brushing the tears of disappointment from his face, said: 'Please, sir, I want to see the Queen.' The Prince took him by the hand, and led him past one sentinel after another, until he came to the Queen's presence. The Prince told his mother that the little boy wished to see her, and the Queen spoke kindly to him, and gave him a new half-penny. What made the Queen speak so kindly to the child? Was it for his sake? No, it was for her son's sake. It is for the same reason that God receives us, and pardons all our sins, not for our sake, but for His dear Son's sake."

Executed in the Place of his Son.—A well-known evangelist relates that "during the terrible times of the French Revolution a young man of noble birth was condemned to death. One morning he, along with many others, was hurriedly brought out for execution. One after another of his companions entered the fatal box, and at last his name was read from the roll. Just as it was pronounced some one stepped quickly forward and yielded himself to the executioner, and received the sentence that had been passed on the young man. When the officers of the law came to the end of their list, this young man was still there; but now they had no warrant for his execution, and he was conveyed back to prison. In a few days a free pardon was granted to all the prisoners, and now a free man, he joyfully took his way homeward. Entering the house he rushed into one room in search of his father, but failing to find him there went to his father's study, where he noticed a letter lying on the desk addressed to himself, and, lifting it, he saw it was his father's handwriting. With the nervous hand he broke the seal and read: 'My dear son, I could not endure the thought that you should die. I have taken your place. I am old; you are young, and will bear the family name, and you do much good in the world. Your loving father.' Is not this a picture of what Christ has done for us? When we were justly condemned He came and took our place, and suffered and died, the just for the unjust, to save us from eternal woe."

THE PREDICTED DELIVERANCE.

By Rev. G. W. Pendleton, A.M.

Groaning the Common Lot—Paul's Experience—Those who Wait and Groan—Rational Beliefs—The Coming Change—The Deliverance at Death—Another Deliverance—The Body Rescued from Corruption—When the Groaning will Cease—Souls in Heaven Waiting—Deliverance Approaching.

A FRAIL and perishable nature shows that no stable source of happiness can be found in this world. From the commencement of sin down to the present time groaning over sufferings has been the lot of man. Paul was one of the chief sufferers. Joyful as was his hope, he finds himself compelled to groan over, and to travail in pain, and to look forward to the future for deliverance. Suffering in this life is the normal state of God's people. "The whole creation groaneth." "And not only they, but ourselves also, who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption (to wit), the redemption of our body."

Some argue that the whole creation means both the animate and inanimate creation, which have been effected by the fall; others, that it applies only to the new creation in Christ Jesus, and that the groaning and travelling together in pain arise from their subjection "to vanity, not willingly." But one thing is certain, that none but rational beings can rationally groan over sufferings and wait with patience for deliverance. "Even we ourselves groan within ourselves." Groan and travail in pain on account of their subjection to vanity, to sin—though not willingly—inheriting this tendency, this bias to evil, through the transgression of Adam.

Paul intimates a weariness of the world and an indifference to what it can give. "Oh, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from this body of death?" He stood in imminent danger every hour. "He had fightings without and fears within." He longed to depart and be with Christ. "He does not fret impatiently under the crosses of life, but looks forward to the manifestation of the sons of God. He takes a wider range than this world, burdened with the pains and portents of its and reaches forward to grasp a substantial good "in the house not made with hands." "I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us."

His longing of soul was after deliverance "from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God." This deliverance, he knew, was sure to come—a moral and spiritual deliverance from the bondage of corruption; a release from the servitude of sin, from the power and prevalence of all base affections. This work is wrought in all who are new creatures in Christ Jesus; all who are God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works. This deliverance from moral evil and "from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God" is complete at death. "We are confident and willing rather to be absent from the body and to be present with the Lord," "having a desire to depart and be with Christ, which is far better." "He that is dead is freed from sin." When the soul of the believer is absent from the body, it is present with the Lord. All the preparatory work to fit it for heaven is done. They are "the spirits of just men made perfect." In this state of blessedness they await the resurrection of the body. While the troubles of earth are still going on, it is said, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord; from henceforth—yea, saith the Spirit, for they rest from their labors," etc.

Then there will be

ANOTHER DELIVERANCE

—"the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body." A future deliverance at the time of "the manifestation of the sons of God"—a distinct act from that of the redemption of the soul. This is a signal emancipation of the body from corruptibility to immortality at the resurrection of the just. It is the perfecting of redemption—the last series of events carried on from the beginning of the world—the fulfilment of Christ's promise, "I will raise them up at the last day." "Our vile body will then be changed and fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body," "be delivered from the bondage of corruption." The work of redemption will be completed, the soul and body both redeemed from the power of sin and the bondage of corruption, and be introduced into the full and complete liberty of the sons of God. Then the groaning and travelling in pain on account of sin will cease, and not till then.

The Christian must necessarily feel the burden of corruption up to the hour of his dissolution; for to this time the Church of Christ on earth will be composed of wheat and tares, the wise and foolish virgins, to molest the faithful to

THE END OF THE AGE.

The church now must expect afflictions, temptations, and perils; and hence "groan, being burdened;" long for deliverance, which she shall obtain in the redemption of the soul and body. They wait with earnest expectation for this deliverance, when their dignity and glory before the fall shall be fully restored by the resurrection. Hence John says, "I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God and the testimony which they held. And they cried with a loud voice, How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost Thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?" They ask for relief from sufferings and await a coming day of vengeance on their enemies. "And they rest a little season, until their brethren shall be killed as they had been." Thus "the earnest expectation of the renewed soul, even in heaven, waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God."

The condition of the true believer in this world, and of the spirits of just men made perfect in the spirit world, is one of

and not of full attainment. If they realized all at once, the future would cease to be a matter of hope, for that which is realized need not be hoped for. So long as their hope is subjected to the deductions of vanity or a vile body, there will be a longing for complete redemption. They have received only the first-fruits of the Spirit—the earnest of the inheritance; and they do not know even what they shall be, but they expect to be like Christ, "for they will see Him as He is."

The time of

the final victory is sure—the glorious liberty of the children of God is at hand, when believers in heaven and on the earth, now waiting, shall know the redemption of their bodies. This is God's truth.

"Truth crushed to earth shall rise again,

The eternal years of God are hers."

All the inanimate creation, under the curse, subject to vanity, burdened with thorns, and thistles, and venomous reptiles, await the change, when He who sits upon the throne shall say, "Behold, I make all things new." Then the creature shall attain its true end, and shall participate in the peace of "the sons of God;" and when God, who only can rejoice in goodness, "will rejoice in his works" (Psalm 104: 31). And when this lower world shall be renewed, when "there shall be new heavens and a new earth," and when all those who have suffered with Christ and on account of sin shall reign with Him upon the new earth.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Nicaragua Treaty was Rejected by the Senate on January 29th. A majority of the Senators voted in favor of ratifying it, but not two thirds of those present. As the Constitution requires that proportion, the treaty failed of ratification. The numbers were thirty-two for ratification and twenty-three against. A motion to reconsider was made, but it is not expected that the vote will be materially changed. It was not the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that caused the rejection of the treaty. Mr. Sherman moved an amendment providing for negotiations with England for the friendly abrogation of that treaty as a prior condition to the Nicaraguan treaty being carried out. That amendment was passed; but even with that condition attached the treaty did not pass. The real objection appears to have been that that condition, by ratifying, would have embarrassed Mr. Cleveland's administration. That was the view expressed by Senator Bayard, who was supposed to express the opinions of the President-elect. The subject was not treated, however, strictly on a party basis. Members of both parties were found on each side.

President Arthur's Message, Sent to Congress on January 29th, will do something toward allaying the apprehensions excited by our participation in the Congo conference. Fears were generally entertained that in entering that conference a precedent would be established which might be used to the prejudice of the United States. In meddling with the affairs of the Eastern Hemisphere, the Government, it was thought, had opened the way for a claim on the part of European Powers to interfere with affairs on this continent. Secretary Frelinghuysen's report, transmitted with the message, declares that the Government consented to take part in the conference only on the assurance on the part of Germany that "the Powers taking part would severally reserve the fullest liberty of action with respect to the results which might be reached;" and that, in accepting the invitation, our State Department assured the German minister that the United States did so on the explicit understanding that the business to be brought before the conference was to be limited to "the commercial interests of the Congo region and Western Africa." Mr. Kasson, who represents the United States at the conference, also sends the assurance that nothing has been done that binds the United States to joint action with any other Power.

An Urgent Request for an Appropriation was made on January 28th by Secretary McCulloch, who wants $500,000 to build new vaults to hold the silver dollars. The United States Treasurer at San Francisco has twenty millions of those coins on hand, and has no room for more. The Superintendent of the Mint has thirty-three millions, and his vaults are full. The sub-treasuries in Chicago and Cincinnati are crammed to bursting, and at Philadelphia and New Orleans a similar state of affairs is reported. In spite of this practical proof that the public does not want the clumsy coins, and will not have them if it can avoid it, the mints are industriously coining two millions of them every month, and the present year promises to add twenty-seven millions to the stock. When the people elect Congressmen, it would be well to ascertain whether they are disposed to protect public property, or are determined on wasting it.

The New York Legislature Appears Disposed to go further than Congress in an attempt to prevent the dynamiters in this State plotting explosions in England. A bill was introduced last week in Albany making it felony to contribute or solicit money for the sale, transportation, or use of explosive compounds, knowing or having reason to believe, that they are intended to be used for the unlawful destruction of life or property. Even if this bill is passed, it will do little toward checking the operations of O'Donovan Rossa and his gang. The Irish people here know well the principles of these men, and will contribute as freely as ever to a fund to be used at their discretion for the purpose of liberating Ireland. The dynamite war is generally denounced by the press and the public, but the spirit of lawlessness is not recognized as the fount of all such movements. That spirit, as we know from prophecy, will continue to increase, and its operations will not be limited to England.

The St. John Controversy may be Considered closed, now that the evidence has been fully sifted. An offer was made to the Republican National Committee for Governor St. John to withdraw from the canvass on consideration of the payment of $25,000. The offer, however, was not made by St. John, nor by the Prohibition Committee, nor by any person recognized by it as its agent. It was made by a man named Legate, who, if he had received the money, could not have carried out the terms of his contract. He had no control over St. John and no influence with the Prohibition Committee. He alone was responsible for the offer, and the Republican Committee showed that it had no confidence in the authenticity of the proposal by declining it. The evidence kindly sent us by correspondents is untrustworthy and evidently biased. The facts as we have given them have been fully proved.

General Stewart's Arrival on the Bank of the Nile, telegraphed on January 28th, produced a welcome relief from anxiety. After the battle at the Abu Klea Wells, on January 17th, he continued his march, and arrived within sight of the river at daybreak the following morning, having marched all night. The enemy appeared in force between General Stewart's troops and the Nile. Early on the morning of the 19th an attack was made with a ferocity surpassing even that of the Abu Klea battle. The British forces, now materially reduced, were drawn up in a square, which the Arabs failed to penetrate. Early in the action General Stewart received a severe wound in the groin, which, even if he recovers, will prevent his taking further part in the campaign. The famous correspondent of the London Standard, Mr. John A. Cameron, was killed, as was also Mr. Herbert, another newspaper correspondent. The Arabs were eventually defeated after a severe struggle, in which the slaughter was sickening. The British then proceeded, and strongly intrenched themselves on the Nile, where they hope to communicate by steamer with General Gordon in Khartoum. Metemneh, which they intended to make their resting-place, was strongly held by the Mahdi's troops. General Stewart deemed it advisable to await re-enforcements before attacking the place. The fact that newspaper correspondents have their letters stopped by Lord Wolsley, and that the public get no news except his own despatches, leads to the impression that matters in the Sudan are more serious than he represents them.

The Dynamite Panic in London Continues, and guards have been set around all the public buildings. The police have received information that the British Museum will be the next building attacked, and precautions are being taken to protect it. Mr. Parnell's silence on the subject of the outrages is severely commented upon; he has made several public speeches since they were perpetrated, but has uttered no word of disapproval of them. A sad feature of the public indignation against the dynamiters is, that innocent Irishmen are unable to obtain work. Employers are discharging their Irish workmen, and those who are taking on new hands announce that "no Irish need apply." Forty thousand Irishmen are said to be unemployed, of whom over four thousand were discharged last week. The man Cunningham, who was arrested shortly after the explosions occurred, is held for trial. Suspicious circumstances have been discovered respecting him, and the police are confident of being able to prove his guilt. The headquarters of the dynamiters is now in Paris. The French police are rendering valuable assistance in tracing out the gang. The policeman who tried to save the Houses of Parliament by carrying out the dynamite, and was so severely injured that his life is despaired of, has been recommended to the notice of the Queen. She has been graciously pleased to give the poor man—a medal.

More Rigorously Despotic Measures have been adopted by the Russian Government. A press correspondent gives a deplorable account of the state of affairs throughout the country. He says Count Tolstol, the Minister of the Interior, is chiefly engaged in the discovery and prosecution of Nihilists. No sooner has one society of Nihilists been suppressed than another springs up. Count Tolstol is inundated with threats of death. He rarely attends the meetings of the Council. Whenever he stirs out it costs five hundred rubles for extra police protection. While Nihilism is more dangerous than ever, the persecution of the Jews is as fierce as it was a few years ago, when the European press boiled with indignation at the anti-Semitic outrages which disgraced Russia. Despotism is increasing, and the press is coerced into silence. Russia is more and more ignoring liberal ideas and is paving the way to an explosion.

Complaints of Post-Office Negligence are undergoing investigation in England. Letters from the United States are in some way delayed in the delivery. Persons writing to England to inform their friends of an intended visit have travelled by a steamer leaving New York two days later than the one by which their letters were despatched, and have nevertheless arrived before their letters were delivered. The English Post-Office officials have notoriously failed in getting the mail to the United States managed with due regard to speed, and it would now appear that the incoming mail is also at fault.

An Infamous Traffic has been Discovered in Hungary. Large numbers of girls have been recently observed leaving the country on their way to America. They were engaged by pretended American agents to come here as domestic servants, and their expenses over the frontier were paid for them. When out of Austrian jurisdiction their destination was changed. They were decoyed on board ship and carried to Egypt, where they were sold as slaves. Intense excitement has been caused by the discovery, and several persons have been arrested.

The Violation of the Sabbath by the Managers of the New Orleans Exposition, we are glad to observe, does not go on without protest. The Sunday League of Louisiana publish an address setting forth the efforts they have made to secure the closing of the Exposition on Sunday, in which they state that they applied to the management, to the exhibitors, and to Secretary Frelinghuysen and President Arthur. In response, Secretary Frelinghuysen replied, under date of October 20th, that he had consulted with the President relative to the matter, and had communicated to the Exposition management the result. The Secretary said that the necessary order would be issued, requiring the government exhibit to be closed on Sundays, and the President had expressed the hope that the propriety would be seen by the management of closing all other branches of the Exposition on that day.

Temperance Interest Centres in Ohio, and citizens everywhere are looking anxiously to that State to learn what will succeed the Scott law, recently declared unconstitutional. Mrs. Ellen J. Phinney, President of the W. C. T. U. of Ohio, says the Union intends to continue the campaign for Prohibition with energy and determination. She said recently: "We are assured that nothing can be done with the present Legislature in the way of securing better laws, but the Union will not yield that point without a determined effort to secure the passage of the Education bill and the resubmission of a prohibitory amendment during the coming session. We are not going to ask this legislation of Republicans nor of Democrats, but our appeal will be made to a General Assembly sent to Columbus to legislate for the public good and in the interests of the entire people rather than for a single party. I am convinced we shall have a stronger leverage as non-partisan women. Our motives would be impugned at once were we seeking to build up a party organization, but in our present attitude we are untrammelled."

An Interesting Exhibit at the New Orleans exposition is that of the American Bible Society, which has sent a pamphlet containing specimen verses in all the languages and dialects in which the Holy Scriptures have been printed by the American Bible Society and the British and Foreign Bible Society, numbering two hundred and forty-two. Copies of it are distributed to visitors. It furnishes a suggestive and conclusive reply to the sceptics and infidels who aver that the influence of the Bible is declining in the world. It also supplies an evidence of the fact that we must be near the time when "the Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations" (Matt. 24: 14).

The Thirty-Second Anniversary of the Young Men's Christian Association of New York was held on January 25th. The reports showed that the usefulness of the institution has increased during the past year. The year's income was $29,481.95 and the expenditure $29,391.10, of which $23,046, was spent for work in the buildings. Mr. McBurney, the indefatigable secretary of the Association, said that the World's Committee, the American International Committee, and the State Committee had met all their financial obligations, and were free of debt. The Harlem branch had gained in membership, and had spent $2,921.55 during the year. Last July lots were purchased in Harlem for this branch. The Yorkville branch had been readmitted, and was getting along satisfactorily. The Railroad Men's branch, at the Grand Central and Thirtieth Street stations, was progressing favorably. The German branch had succeeded in purchasing a house in Second Avenue, and great work is expected to be done among German young men. At the Bowery branch the applications for employment and for relief exceeded those of the preceding year. There was expended in relief $1,644.85, and 297 persons were secured employment. In the principal building, in Twenty-third Street, there were 260,660 visitors during the year, and 1491 secular gatherings were held, which included Bible classes, prayer-meetings, family prayer service, the members' monthly meetings, and the meetings of the different committees in charge of the various religious services.

The Tar and Feather Temperance Society is a prosperous organization located in a New Jersey city. On the night of December 31st, 1883, three young men sat around a tavern fire, all under the influence of liquor. As the clock struck twelve one of the young men said: "Boys, the new year is here. Now let's swear off and form a temperance society." The others, in a spirit of fun, agreed. The men were reckless, but they were in earnest, for the pledge adopted had the following penalty attached: "And any one of us who shall drink any intoxicating liquor, for any purpose whatsoever, between now and midnight of December 31st, 1884, shall be tarred and feathered." This clause becoming known, gained the club the name of "The Tar and Feather Temperance Society." It grew in numbers, and last New Year's Eve the society gave an entertainment, to which a large number of the best people of the place were invited. The hall was filled. At midnight the president announced that the pledge had expired. By a unanimous vote it was renewed for another year, and some twenty new names were added to the roll. The society's badge is a blue ribbon, with a lump of tar filled with chicken feathers attached.

Two Young Ladies Defended a Besieged house near Erie, Pa., recently. Their parents were decoyed away from home by a bogus telegram, and their only brother was away spending the evening with a friend. The house is lonely, and the two girls being alone in it were alarmed when four men wearing masks rang and demanded admittance. They determined to stand a siege rather than admit the men. They barricaded the doors and windows with furniture, and examined the locks, bolts, and bars with which the lower part of the house was secured. The burglars tried every horrible threat that suggested itself to induce the young ladies to surrender, but the heroic girls held out resolutely. The men commenced to file away the staples or bars of a lower window, which had the effect of greatly terrifying, though not of subduing the fair defenders. Their younger brother was at last on the way home, and when the girls, from an upper window, saw the glimmer of his lantern, they succeeded in attracting his attention by using a small magic lantern and acquainting him with their peril. He procured assistance, and effected the capture of two of the ruffians. We may hope that when Satan lays siege to their hearts, they may remember their experience and resist. Help can always be obtained in such a struggle from One who is stronger than he (Luke 11: 21, 22).

A Living Man Officially Dead Made an angry protest to the coroner at Kingston, N.Y., last week. Two or three months ago a man was found dead in that city, and the coroner held an inquest. A number of witnesses identified the corpse as that of a Polish peddler, who for years past sold cheap jewelry and spectacles at farmhouses in the neighborhood. A verdict was rendered that the deceased came to his death from exposure, and the body was buried. One night last week the coroner was awakened by a very angry man, who, in broken English, demanded to know why he had been declared a dead man. The man was very indignant, and declared that the coroner was trying to deprive him of his rights. The coroner at first supposed he had a crank to deal with; but when the light revealed the features of the visitor he saw it was the peddler who was supposed to have been buried some months ago. The coroner tried to propitiate the angry man, but for some time without success. At last the peddler said that if he was given a certificate with a big seal to the effect that he was neither dead nor buried, and that he had lost none of his "rights" to own property, he would make no more trouble. The coroner accordingly satisfied the man who had been declared dead, and his visitor departed with his certificate and its big seal. In spiritual matters the anxiety of the enlightened soul is in precisely the opposite direction. Nothing is so precious then as the record that he is dead to the world, and his life hidden with Christ in God (Col. 3: 3).

Clinging to a Doomed Vessel Led to the death of a sailor on January 28th. That night a storm which will be long remembered raged on Chesapeake Bay, in which the schooner Wake went down. On January 30th a party of five sailors arrived at Cape Charles City, Va., who had been on board the vessel, and narrowly escaped with their lives. After the vessel stranded they jumped into the water, and after battling with the waves for nearly an hour they reached "the flats." One man went down with the vessel. When the others left her he remained. They called to him, telling him he would be lost if he stayed, but he did not move. He stood leaning over the gunwale, idly watching the others struggling to reach the shore. At last the ship went down with the man upon her. Whether he had any hope that the ship would float, or was too timid to trust himself to the waves, does not appear; his apathy in the circumstances is incomprehensible, but it is not so surprising as that of people who are clinging to this doomed world. He may have doubted whether he would be saved in any case; but absolute security is assured to all who abandon the world and trust to Christ (John 10: 28).

A Royal Cattle-Tender has been Employed near Baltimore, Md. A despatch from that city states that Dr. Patterson has had working on his farm, near the Mount Hope Insane Asylum, a man who is a grandson of King Stanislaus of Poland. When engaged, he gave the name of Thaddeus Lewis Poriatowski. During the past two years he has been working as a cattle tender. His story is a romantic one. After the Russian-Polish war his father was banished to Siberia. The son was then an infant in arms, but was carried into exile by his mother, who soon died. The boy grew up, and with his father made his escape and reached Paris in poverty and rags. The father died. The son came to America, and after wandering around reached Dr. Patterson's farm and begged for work. He proved a good hand, and worked faithfully. It was but a few days ago that Dr. Patterson found who the man was. His story is proved by documents in his possession. Now that it is known that the cattle-tender has royal blood in his veins, he will probably be treated with considerable respect. Descendants of kings are seldom to be found in such places. The time will come, however, when it will be found that sons of the King of kings have been among us, though the world knew it not (1 John 3: 2).

How the Teeth of a Fish were Drawn is described in the American Angler. The keeper of an aquarium in Rochester, N. Y., noticed that all the fish but one bore scars of conflict. The fish were California and brook trout, and the injuries were inflicted by one of the former. It seems that one of the trout was of a sour, quarrelsome disposition, and had been in the habit of worrying the others persistently. He at first decided to kill the offending trout; but not wishing to lose it, he thought he would try to render it harmless. Procuring a pair of pinchers he took the big trout from the water and extracted its teeth, exercising as much care as possible, so as not to injure the fish. The teeth of trout are not used for the mastication of food, but are intended to aid the fish in maintaining hold of its prey. Trout in ponds and aquariums have therefore no actual need of teeth, for the reason that they are not obliged to seek their own food. The fish is now apparently well in health, and has ceased to molest its companions. It may be supposed that the trout retains its sour and quarrelsome disposition, though it is prevented exercising it. That is all the law can do with offending members of society. The divine method is more radical: it changes the disposition (1 Cor. 6: 11).

GRAPPLING IRONS.

A Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Quicken me after thy lovingkindness; so shall I keep the testimony of thy mouth."—PSALM 119: 88.

David Beset by Enemies—His Chief Concern—
I. His Intense Desire—Founded on a High Esteem of God's Word—Included Points of Virtue—Loyal to Doctrine—Obedient to Precept—Confidence in the Promises—Backed up by Memory—Support in Present Struggle—Responsible for the Future—II. His Consequent Prayer—A Wise One—Met his Condition—III. His Holy Example—Prayer from Dead Men—The Blessing in Practical Use.

WHEN David wrote this part of the psalm he was evidently beset by many enemies who sought to destroy him, and it is exceedingly important to note what part of himself he guarded with the most care. Which part of his nature did he regard as the most vital? Where did he hold the shield that he might be screened from the darts of the foe? We observe that his prayer is very little about his body, or his temporal interests. Like other men, he desired to be preserved in life and kept in prosperity; but his main prayer is not about these matters. Evidently is concerning his soul, his character, his adherence to God's Word, his steadfastness in the faith. Observe the current of his supplication—"Quicken me after thy lovingkindness; so shall I keep the testimony of thy mouth." He is not so anxious to keep his health, or to keep his house, or to keep his crown, or even to keep his life, as he is that he may keep the testimony of God's mouth. O brethren, everything is right when the heart is right, and everything is wrong when the soul is wrong. We are prospering even when we lose our wealth if we grow in grace; but we are in the direst adversity, even if we are growing rich, if we become spiritually poor. Starve your soul, and you will be wretched amid the dainties of a king's table; but let your soul be satisfied as with marrow and fatness, and a dinner of herbs will be better to you than a stalled ox. The first thing, the main thing, the chief thing, is that the heart be kept true toward God and His Word. Concerning this David prays.

I. First, in these words of David, we have that he might keep the testimony of God's mouth. This desire was founded in a high esteem of God's Word. He viewed the divine revelation as coming directly from Jehovah's own mouth. To some men this holy book is no more inspired than the plays of Shakespeare or the poems of Milton. We have in the Old Testament, they say, the sacred writings of the Jews, which deserve to be treated with great respect; and this is all. David thought not so; and, thank God, we join with David in his opinion. David speaks of God's Word, though he had but a small portion of it compared with what we have, as "the testimony of God's mouth." To me there is no explanation of those words except that which involves verbal and infallible inspiration. The inspired sentence may come down to us from the pen of David; Isaiah, or any other of the prophets, may have been the visible medium of its transmission; but the word itself has come distinctly and directly, with absolute truth and unmingled purity, from the mouth of the Most High.

This prayer of David's, springing from his great reverence for the revealed will of God, includes within it many points of virtue. I cannot explain what he means by keeping the testimony of God's mouth by any one line of things; it is a far-reaching prayer, as full as it is brief. He means, no doubt, that he desired to be steadfast in the doctrine which the mouth of the Lord had spoken. He wished to be taught of the Lord so as to know the truth, and then to be so confirmed and established in it that no wind of doctrine should carry him away from his moorings. He desired to be steadfast, unmovable, rooted and grounded in the truth of God. Such an attainment is much to be desired at this time. The things which we have learned and have received we must hold fast until our Lord shall come. He has set us in our place to keep guard over His truth; at his post. He has put us in trust with the Gospel; God grant we may not be dishonest trustees, trifling with our charge. May those especially who are teachers of others be good stewards of the manifold grace of God. Though we bring forth things new and old, let us take care that we bring forth nothing but what we find in the treasury of the Word. Brethren, this word shall never return unto God void, but it shall accomplish that which He pleases. This meaning of the prayer is worthy of solemn note in these evil days.

LET NO SENTRY SLEEP

But there is another meaning which will seem to some more practical, though indeed it is not so; for there is as much real practice about right thinking as about right acting; and for the understanding to be obedient to God is as vital a thing as for the actions of the life to be conformed to His will. We ought to be anxious to be obedient to God in all His precepts; and if we are striving to be so, our prayer should daily be that we may be preserved in the keeping of the testimony of God's mouth. David further desired that he might be preserved in perfect and unwavering confidence in the promises of God. The testimony of God's mouth is largely made up of exceeding great and precious promises. The sad fact is that sometimes His own people begin to question those promises, and if the vision tarrieth they are in unbelieving haste, and limit the Holy One of Israel. Not one of His words shall fail; nor shall one blessing which He has promised be withheld.

Our prayer is that we may keep the testimony of His mouth, and, like our fathers, may be persuaded of the promises, and may embrace them. What an instructive word is that! "Embraced them"—pressing them to their hearts, and holding them dear to their souls. Oh, never, never let us dare to suspect the faithfulness of our God. Be this your firm resolve: "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him."

This prayer then, you see, has a very wide significance, and I want you to observe that upon the very surface of the words there is an indication that this desire in his soul was backed up by the experience of the past. He desires to keep the testimony of God's mouth; and that implies that he has already received that testimony, and is in possession of it. If a man has not obtained a thing, he cannot keep it. Beloved, I would throw you back this morning for a moment upon

MEMORIES OF THE PAST.

Do you remember the place, the spot of ground where first you heard of God with your inner ear? Do you remember your beggary, your disease, your death? and how the heavenly word gave you wealth, healing, and life in Christ? Since then, how precious, how soul-sustaining, how full of deliverance, how pregnant with victory, have the words of God been to you in days of affliction and conflict!

At this day you must feel that you could not leave this precious word, for you would be leaving the fountain of living waters. What way is open to you if you turn from the way of His statutes? But, my brothers, the mercies of the past, I might even say the miseries of the past, all bind us to our God and to His statutes.

Furthermore, this desire is necessitated by

THE STRUGGLES OF THE PRESENT.

Poor David had become like a bottle in the smoke; his eyes were failing, his heart had fainted, his days were growing few, his pathway was intercepted with pits, he was persecuted wrongfully, he was almost consumed; but he adds, "I forsook not thy precepts." That was the saving clause of it all. We may be in the smoke, but we shall not be smothered; we may be persecuted, but we shall never be forsaken; we may be cast down, but we shall not be destroyed while we keep the testimonies of God's mouth. We are still in the sea, therefore let us cling to our life-buoy; we are still in the wilderness, let us daily gather the heavenly manna. Cast not away your confidence, which even now hath great recompense of reward. Stand you to it, that, be the present what it may, your choice is made; your understanding is assured, your convictions are indelible. Change as ye will, all ye that know not God; but we that know Him by long experience are inseparably united to Him. To quit the truth of God for modern notions would be to leave the streams from Lebanon for the sand of the desert, the sweet waters of Siloah for the brine of the Dead Sea.

I am sure I may add that this desire of David is well warranted by every PROSPECT OF THE FUTURE.

We do not know what troubles we shall yet experience; but we do know that He who hath helped us bears us through, and makes us more than conquerors too. That future, which extends in endless vista far beyond our mortal life, demands faithfulness of us. If we are traitors to the truth of God to-day, what will become of the next generation, and the next, and the next? At this hour we suffer for the negligences of our ancestors; error has been established by a long continuance of perversity—shall we persevere in maintaining falsehood? To-day will ye rebuild the Jericho which the Reformers threw down? Will we pull down the Jerusalem which they have built up? If so, our sons shall curse the memory of their sires. This poor world may experience great delay to her grand hope if Christian men in the present are unfaithful to the truth.

Ages hang upon the conduct of the church of to-day. Speak out the truth while you live, so that when you leave this life it may be said, "He being dead yet speaketh." Let us to-day anchor the church to sound doctrine, lest she drift further and further in years to come. Speak God's Word faithfully, for that word shall live and conquer when you are gone. He that soweth the seed of heresy and evil doctrine entails upon succeeding generations an evil and a plague, and his very name shall rot; but he that soweth the good seed shall be the father of ten thousand successive harvests. To-day we may seal the coming centuries unto the Lord, setting the impress of the truth upon them. Be ye steadfast for the truth in your own day, for you know not what perilous times will come, before the advent of the Lord Jesus. Your words and acts to-day will affect eternity itself. Thus much upon David's desire; may a like desire burn in our hearts!

II. Secondly, let us consider

HIS CONSEQUENT PRAYER.

He did not pray immediately that he might keep the testimony of God's mouth, but he offered the next prayer to it, the one which leads up to it right surely. As a man that goeth up to his chamber doth not leap up all at once, but climbeth the stairs, so doth David rise to the keeping of the Lord's word by the prayer—"Quicken me after thy lovingkindness."

This prayer is wisdom. He that saith, "I shall keep the testimony of God's mouth, for I am fully resolved to do it," had better salt that resolution with prayer, or it will rot like all things which come of the flesh. "Oh," saith he, "I am strong-minded and firmly established, and shall never be moved from the hope of my high calling." O man, thou knowest not thyself, nor the power of temptation, if thou art depending upon thyself. Put up a prayer to God that He would confirm thee, for in that way and in that only shalt thou be true to His statutes. He shall keep God's testimony that is kept by God's power, and He alone; therefore this prayer is wisdom. Moreover, as there is but one Lord and Giver of life, what more could David do than pray? He could not give himself life, and he was wise to apply to Him who alone quickeneth the dead.

This prayer was suggested, I do not doubt, by David's inward state. He says, "Quicken me." Does he mean that he was dead? Yes, comparatively. He means that he felt the power of death working in him. Before he is quite numb he cries, "Quicken me." He was not altogether dead, for dead men never pray for quickening; but he had a sense of deadness creeping over him, gradually chilling the genial current of his soul. He was dull; he was heavy; he felt lethargic, and indisposed to activity. "Quicken me, Lord," saith he. "Quicken me." The Lord hath given us some life, beloved, but that life at intervals seems to go to sleep through weariness; let us pray, "Quicken me, Lord." Are we not, the most of us, a droning, sleepy, half-quicken set? We mope and grope like men who are looking for their graves; but when the Lord comes to us He quickens us from head to foot, and then the blood leaps in our veins, our spiritual breath is full and deep, and we are fired with enthusiasm.

It is a prayer which met

DAVID'S CONDITION.

Carefully read the octave of verses with "Caph" at the head of them, and see how well it fits in at the end of each. "My soul fainteth"—"Quicken me." "Mine eyes fail"—"Quicken me." "I am become like a bottle in the smoke"—"Quicken me." "How many are the days of thy servant?"—"I seem near to death"—"Quicken me." "The proud have digged pits for me"—"Quicken me," that I may spy out their pitfalls and avoid them. "They persecute me wrongfully"—"Quicken me," Lord; for they cannot hurt me, though they pour death upon me, if Thou pour life into me. "They had almost consumed me"—"Quicken me," and then I may burn with fire, but I shall not be consumed. You see, the blessing of quickening meets all these conditions. I believe that the best preservative under trial is increased spiritual life.

Did I hear you complain, "I am very poor"? Brethren, if your soul is quickened and you become rich in faith, poverty will be a light burden. "But I am very depressed in spirit." Truly, this is sad; but if you are more fully quickened, you will shake it off as living men put from them the cements of the tomb. But you cry, "I have such hard work to do!" If you have stronger life, the task will be easier. "But I have been disappointed and defeated." You will have few defeats, or you will bear them joyfully when your spiritual life is vigorous and full. "Quicken me." Whatever your difficulty, whatever your doubt, whatever your sorrow, whatever your temptation, here is a prayer that

MEETS EVERY CASE:

"Quicken me after thy lovingkindness."

It is a prayer especially which answered to David's aim in presenting it. He prayed this prayer that he might be enabled to keep God's testimony. Now who are the people that give up sound doctrine? Why, the people who do not know the quickening power of it in their own souls, and do not live in the delightful enjoyment of it. Who are the people that give up holy practice? Why, the people that are not dwelling in the power of the Holy Ghost, and are not full of the life of God. Who are those that are tossed up and down like the locust and are shifty, and have no fixed position? Why, they are the men that have not received the fullness of life from on high. You can do a great many things with a dead man; but you cannot make him stand upright; you may try most earnestly, but a corpse cannot stand; until you put life into the body it will fall to the ground; and so if the life of God be not in you you cannot hold the truth, or maintain purity, or walk in integrity. Life is absolutely essential to steadfastness in the truth. The prayer of our text answers to David's aim: "Quicken me after thy lovingkindness; or shall I keep the testimony of thy mouth."

He presented this prayer on the right ground. Observe how he pleads the mercy and love of God. "Quicken me after thy lovingkindness."

He means, I think, that he desires to be quickened by a sense of God's love. Is there anything that puts life into a man like that? A mother finds her babe half frozen, and she warms it back to life by pressing it to her bosom; she imparts the warmth of her own heart to it until it lives again and smiles; it is just so with our God—there is no reviving us except by pressing us close to His bosom. Did I hear you say, "I will repent in terror. I will go to Moses to get revival"? I advise you not to do so, for he will use the rod most severely, and flog you back to feeling; and that is by no means a desirable method. Divine love is a sweeter and surer quickener.

THE TRUE ELIXIR OF LIFE

is love. Oh, for a draught of it!

"Thy mercy is more than a match for my heart, Which wonders to feel its own deadness depert, Aroused by thy godness I rise from the ground, And sing to the praise of the mercy I've found."

"Quicken me after thy lovingkindness."

I would close this section of my discourse by saying, it is a prayer which has a promise attached to it. It was not so in David's day; but in these latter times we have a promise which fits it as the wax the seal. When I have a lock I am always glad to find a key which fits it. Here is the lock—"Lord, I feel as if I were dead;" and here is the key—"He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." That answers the supplication as a glove fits the hand—"Though he were dead, yet shall he live." If it were possible for a believer to get between the jaws of death and stand there, the mouth of the sepulchre could not close itself upon him. "Though he were dead, yet shall he live." Plead that promise, and cry unto God, when you feel sloth creeping over you—"Quicken me, that I may keep the testimony of thy mouth."

III. We part with David, and this is the last word; in this verse we have which I commend to you. First, offer the prayer of life when you feel that you are dead. It is a strange paradox; but I put it with all my might to you. If this morning you are forced to cry, "My heart seems like adamant; my feeling is all gone; if aught is felt it is only pain to find I cannot feel; I seem to be altogether out of sorts; if the life of God be in me at all it is like a spark hidden away among the ashes, and I cannot discover it," well, then, bestir yourselves to pray. "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." Let thy groan go up from the grave's mouth. If thou canst get no further than a sigh, let thy moaning be addressed to God, let the heavings of thine anguished heart move toward thy heavenly Father.

The next thing I learn is this, that living truth can only be held firmly by living men. Some who are very sound are nothing else but sound; but we want no such allies. Some of those who hold a correct creed are very narrow, and will not tolerate a departure by a hair's-breadth from their fixed opinion; but narrowness is not strength. To know the truth and feel its power, and manifest its influence in your life, is the proof that you have grappled it to your soul as with hooks of steel. Oh, for living truth in the grip of a living man! My dear friend, if you are going to be a champion of reformation, first be yourself reformed; if you would become a defender of the faith, first be an exemplifier of it. Let Jesus reign in your soul, and then He will make you a priest and king unto Himself by His own divine power.

The next lesson is, regard God's lovingkindness as a source of life. Unhappily too many have viewed it as an excuse for death. "Oh, yes," they say, "I am one of God's chosen; I need not trouble myself about holiness or activity. I shall be saved by sovereign grace." Do you sit down and quietly cross your legs, and fold your arms, and do nothing, and then look to be rewarded for it? In all probability you will be lost at last, for you are lost already.

The man who dares to pervert truth is already a lost man; but he that knows the lovingkindness of the Lord says, "Quicken thou me, Lord." Do not get behind the door and suck your honeycomb, and say, "I love enjoyment, but I hate employment. I never try to defend the truth or to spread it, but it is very sweet to me." Ah, my dear sir, that kind of honey will poison you; the thought of it makes me sick. The right thing is to feel that the more God loves you the more you love Him; the more He does for you the more will you do for Him.

And lastly, let divine aid, whenever we seek it or obtain it, lead us to the practical use of it in obedience. "Quicken me," and "so shall I keep." I put those words together in that fashion, for they are together. That is to say, if the Lord gives quickening I will give steadfastness. The believer is ACTIVE, NOT PASSIVE.

He is acted on, but he also acts. In the first work of regeneration we are passive; that must be a pure act of God's grace; but as the child as soon as it is born becomes active, and begins to cry, so does a new-born soul prove its activity by its prayer. As the child ever after has an activity all its own in proportion to the measure of its vitality, so will it be with the child of God; he becomes more and more energetic in proportion as God pours into him more and more of the divine life.

Come, ye that lie in the dust, shake yourselves from it; ye that are at ease in Zion, bestir yourselves in the service of your Lord and Master before a heavy we overwhelms you. This is an evil day, a day in which multitudes are perishing in poverty and sin by reason of their ignorance of Christ; will ye not instruct them? This is a day of blasphemy and rebuke, in which the truth of God is cast down and trodden like mire in the streets; will ye not stand up for it? Hold you to the fundamentals of the faith, though with others the foundations are shaken. Abide like rocks in the midst of foaming billows, and defy all opposition. Stand fast in the house of your God below, and this shall be your reward above—"Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out." May the best of blessings rest upon you. Amen.

THE LATE RT. REV. JOHN JACKSON, D.D., BISHOP OF LONDON.

THE distinguished prelate of the Protestant Episcopal Church whose portrait appears on the next page died at his palace, on January 6th, after a very brief illness. On Sunday, January 4th, he took part in the mid-day service at All Saints' Church, Fulham, and administered the Lord's Supper. He complained of a pain in his side before going to the service, but was so far recovered afterward as to be able in the evening to preach the sermon at St. Paul's Cathedral. He returned home between nine and ten o'clock, and when he retired to rest he was apparently in his usual health.

On Monday morning he complained of an acute pain in his side. A physician was at once summoned, and the remedies applied afforded the patient relief, and he remarked that he felt very well, and wished to rise. Under the doctor's orders, however, he kept to his bed. The following morning his daughter went to his room and found him sleeping peacefully. She visited him again an hour later, and was alarmed at the ghastly pallor of his face. She at once sent for the physician, who came immediately, but found that the bishop was dead. He had died in his sleep.

At the afternoon service in St. Paul's Cathedral on that day, the preacher said: "It would not be seemly to enter the Cathedral pulpit this afternoon and make no reference to the awfully sudden loss which has fallen upon this church and diocese, and of which we must, most of us, have heard but a few hours ago. The lamented death of the Bishop of London creates a void which must be felt by every one, but it is especially touching to us here, for he stood so recently in this place, and was the last to stand in this pulpit."

The late bishop was the son of Mr. Henry Jackson, a merchant of London, and was born in February, 1811. He was first sent to a school at Islington, and subsequently to Reading school, then under the care of Dr. Valpy. Entering Oxford University at Pembroke College, he took his B.A. in 1833. In 1835 he was ordained deacon, and priest a year later. For the next ten years Mr. Jackson was head master of a grammar school, and preached at a church in the neighborhood. In 1846 he was transferred to St. James's Church, London, and during his seven years' occupancy of that rectory came to be favorably known in London as a preacher.

In 1853 Lord Aberdeen, then Prime Minister of England, made Dr. Jackson Bishop of Lincoln, and to this work he devoted his energies for the next sixteen years. By his indefatigable labors he succeeded in thoroughly organizing the work of the church. In 1869 Dr. Longley, the Archbishop of Canterbury, died, and Mr. Disraeli, who was then Premier, promoted Dr. Tait, who was then Bishop of London, to the Archbishopric of Canterbury and transferred Dr. Jackson to London. There he found an excellently organized system in full working order, and he stimulated all good work, notably that of the Bishop of London's Fund for the erection of new churches, by earnest personal effort. While a regular attendant in his place in the House of Lords, the late bishop rarely took part in the debates. He ruled his diocese with conspicuous tact and good judgment, and the appointments he made met with general approval.

LIGHT FOR THE HAREMS.

WOMAN'S ministry has found for itself a grand sphere in Christian lands, and is fully recognized as exercising a potent and winning influence in reaching many classes. If this, however, be so in Christendom, how much more so in those Eastern climes where ancient prejudice and custom have raised barriers which effectually prevent the male missionary carrying the light of the Gospel to fully one half of the population? And these customs of seclusion and jealousy shut out not only the spiritual message, whose importance they may easily fail to see, but also the help and healing by the medical art; so that woman, in all lands and people the chiefest sufferer from sickness and pain, is in the lands of which we speak practically cut off from effective scientific medical aid. And even in those comparatively rare cases in which the physician is consulted, it is usually under conditions which entirely prevent the diagnosis of the symptoms so necessary to correct treatment.

From these facts come the imperative necessity, first, of lady missionaries, the women who should carry the message of mercy to the women of the East; and, secondly, of lady medical missionaries, who in harems and zenanas may minister to their secluded sisters those remedies and appliances of the medical art hitherto beyond their reach.

Each of these ministries is deeply important; none can fail to rejoice that pain should find alleviation; distress, relief; the weakness and weariness of sickness yield to resources of science; and all again will rejoice that in the gross darkness of heathen superstition the word of Gospel teaching should find a hearing by means of ladies brave enough and loving enough to penetrate the zenanas; but when these are united, when she who brings bodily healing brings also the message of mercy, when she who years over a blinded soul is enabled to administer to suffering bodies relief and quiet, then the double ministry—woman's double ministry to woman—becomes a service of untold worth to the prisoners of the East.

These considerations have led to the establishment of an institution called the Zenana Mission School, in which Christian ladies receive a medical education. When properly qualified they go out to Turkey and India and are permitted to enter the harems, from which men are rigorously excluded. Their medical knowledge secures their admission when there is illness, and affords them opportunity to speak to the women of Christ and the Gospel. Six ladies were thus educated and sent out last year. One of these is Miss Bose, a native Indian lady, a highly intellectual and thoroughly devoted lady. She belongs to the highest caste, and knowing, as she said, "the bitter case of her women and of the poor little ones in the native houses," she resolved not only to become a missionary, but to undergo such training as would enable her to be a medical missionary; for, said she, "they are dying unhelped; they are suffering no one knows how terribly; and there are none to help them, none to heal them; they have no medical treatment, for the native treatment is worse than useless."

Now she who so deeply felt her sisters' need has gone to their help, having undergone the full course and the most rigid examination, in which her answers exhibited accurate and extensive knowledge of the subject, and she passed her examination with the highest credit. Miss Bose has now been placed by the municipal authorities in charge of a dispensary fifteen miles from Unrisur, where she will have abundant opportunities for rendering the medical and spiritual help she longed to give.

Miss Palmer, another fully-trained student, has now her own dispensary near Madras. She has won her way among the natives, and found ready entrance among the Brahmin ladies.

THE SILENT PREACHER.

No man can estimate the good that may be done by scrolls of Scripture texts, which, at a very slight expense, can be hung in places where they are sure to be read. Many instances are on record of comfort, consolation, or direction having been given by them at a time of dire need. But it is very certain that many more such cases have occurred of which the public has never heard.

A Christian friend says: "I have seen these scrolls in all kinds of places, silently doing the work of the Great Author of the Bible. Lately I saw one hanging at the foot of the bed on which a dear friend was dying. She was too weak to read her Bible. But as often as she turned her eyes to the foot of the bed, there, in large type, which she could read without trouble, the comforting words of her Redeemer met her, and His words illumined the darkness of her dying hour. I have seen them in hospitals, where persons have been tossing on beds of pain, moaning under severe accidents, and sighing for relief of mind more than from freedom of bodily suffering. Without note or comment these words of Scripture have been doing, and are doing at this hour, a mighty work; teaching us constantly, that when the words of man's wisdom are powerless, "the word of God is quick, and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart."

Mrs. Mary Howitt, in one of her charming ballads, narrates how one of those scrolls of Scripture truth was made the means of bringing blessing into the soul of a poor, desolate woman who saw it in a railroad depot. She had walked a long distance from the farmhouse where she lived, to the depot to take the midday train, only to find on her arrival that she was five minutes late.

Tired and vexed, the poor creature went into the waiting-room. What was she to do with herself for two hours! Like "a caged beast" she paced the room with an angry fire burning in her bosom. All at once, however, her attention was arrested by text in a scroll hanging upon the wall. She read: "Woe is me, for I am undone;" and then the gracious promise, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow."

These words were a message to her soul from Him who inspired them. All at once the blackness and sinfulness of her past life flashed before her, and in the silence of that deserted waiting-room, she put up a prayer for mercy!

"With her sins arraigned before her,
She could only weep and cry,
'Lord, unless Thy mercy save me,
I must surely, surely die!'"

The prayer of the desolate and broken-hearted woman was heard, and the long hours of waiting were spent in rapt communion with Him who is able to save unto the uttermost all those who come to Him through Jesus Christ. The time passed quickly, and she was surprised when the cry of "All aboard!" struck her ear. She took her place on the cars; but scarcely had an hour elapsed when an accident occurred, and many passengers, "fainting, bleeding," were thrown out. Only one, however, was killed, and that one the poor woman who had missed the midday train!

THE SINGING COBBLER OF HAMBURG.

ONE fine summer evening, while crowds of people passed through the streets of Hamburg, a shoemaker, sitting before his shop door, was busily engaged with a shoe. He rested from his work, singing a psalm in old German, scarcely lifting his eyes from his sole, which occupied his whole attention, and quite indifferent to the crowd that passed before him, when a young man stopped suddenly and addressed him: "Well, my friend, you seem quite happy and contented?" The speaker was a student. His features and complexion showed that he was of Jewish race. The cobbler lifted his eyes and answered cheerfully:

"Happy and contented I am, in truth, sir; why should I not be so?" "I don't know; but all are not as you. Your poverty might distress you. I suppose you have only to provide for yourself?" "You are mistaken there, sir," he answered; "I have to feed a wife and seven children with the work of these hands. I am a poor man, it is true; but I can sing while I do my work." "I must confess," said the young man, "that I am very much surprised to see a poor fellow like you so contented with his lot." "Stranger," said the cobbler, putting down his work and taking hold of his arm with a serious expression—"stranger, I am not so poor as probably you may think. I am a son of the King."

The Singing Cobbler of Hamburg.

A week passed by, and the student, having again occasion to pass down the same street, found the cobbler sitting in the same place, singing as cheerfully as before. The youth, in passing, lifted his cap with a sarcastic air, exclaiming, "Good morning, Mr. Prince." "Stop, my friend," said the cobbler, putting down his work; "a word of explanation, if you please. You left me so suddenly the other evening because you thought I was mad." "I must say I believed it," answered the other. "Well, my friend, I am not mad. What I said I said in earnest. I am a son of the King, and I can sing you a song about my royal lineage."

The young man thought he might as well listen; it could do no harm; the cobbler was evidently half if not wholly insane, and showed it in a way common enough by claiming to be of royal blood. So he composed himself to listen. The cobbler sang a hymn on the petition, "Thy kingdom come." When he finished, he asked the young man if he understood it; but he seemed still to be under his old impression.

"I must, then," said the cobbler, "explain to you in detail concerning the kingdom of Christ and the glory of the King, though if, as I judge, you are a Jew, you should be familiar with it." He showed him how things written in the law of Moses, in the prophets, and in the Psalms, about Jesus Christ, have been fulfilled. How all power in heaven and earth was committed to Him, and how He actually established a kingdom which shall never be destroyed, and uniting in holy fellowship Jews and Gentiles, and how the subject of this glorious kingdom is a child of God, a joint-heir with Christ, the King.

"Now," said the cobbler, taking the hand of the young Jewish student who sat beside him, "now, my friend, you see how I could say, 'I am a son of the King,' and why I am happy and contented. It is because I know Jesus. I believe in Him, and I love Him. And it is the sacred Scriptures which tell me that all things are mine, whether life or death, or things present, or things to come; all are mine, because I am Christ's."

The young Jew listened silently to this long talk and his mind was busy. To him, as to a large number of his race, the truths of the Bible were but little known. He studied Kant and the philosophers rather than Moses and the prophets. The fact that a poor man, whose hard life might be an excuse for being discontented, was really happy, and assigned his belief in Christ as the cause of his happiness, was startling to him. Philosophy might make him a stoic, but it could not make him happy. The cobbler had the best philosophy evidently.

"How did you learn all this?" he asked.

The cobbler stooped forward, opened a drawer under the bench on which he sat, and produced a New Testament. "From that book," he said, briefly, "I was miserable and discontented as any one could be until I read that. I'll give it you if you will study it. It will teach a learned man like you as well as it has taught an ignorant man like me."

The young Jew accepted the book with thanks, and promised to study it. He kept his word, and was brought into the light. At the end of his university career he acknowledged that to no professor, to no writer was he so indebted as to the poor cobbler and the New Testament.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

The Crime Confessed.

MADAME LAWSON, who was prone to avoid the daylight, which she declared not worthy of its name in England, proceeded homeward in the dusk, without meeting with any molestation. She had not paid her son and the garret any visit since the return of John Morley and Hester the night before; and Lawson had failed to come down to his work-room, where indeed he had been but little during the last three months, though Mr. Waldron had continued to pay him and his mother the same wages he had formerly received from his employer. Madame experienced no anxiety on his account.

Madame Lawson ascended the long flight of stairs briskly, feeling nearly equal to the difficult feat of singing as she mounted. No light whatever glimmered through the numerous chinks in the door, by which the fresh air was apt to find inconvenient admission. Good! Her son was gone to bed; and there would be nothing to do but to look round. She lifted the latch, and entered the dark room, humming a merry little song. Probably her son had left the match-box and the lamp upon the table, and she groped her way to it. Her fingers feeling about the small table came in contact with something cold, clammy, and motionless. She laid her hand upon it, and found it was a hand, which neither stirred, nor grew warm at her close touch. Another movement in the dark of her groping fingers brought them to the bowed head of her son, with the cold, damp brow resting upon the table. Then she shook him, and called loudly into his ear; but he did not answer. The next moment she felt sure that he was dead.

Lawson's mother sat down in the dark to think, not caring to light a candle now. She was a foreigner in a foreign land; and only knew three persons to whom she could communicate this horrible surprise. If she were to rush down-stairs screaming, and making an alarm, she would have all the neighbors crushing into her room, to whom she could say nothing, and who could say nothing to her. She was sorry for her son; and a few tears stole down her smooth old face unseen by any eye. But how did she know what the laws of England would require of her? It was possible, that being a stranger or of a different religion, they might demand the revenge of justice from her. Oh, that she had never quitted Burgundy! What would become of her now? What was she to do?

After a few minutes' very troubled reflection, she decided that she could do nothing but go and tell Hester. Rose was asleep; and Robert Waldron's residence she did not know. She raised herself slowly and with difficulty, as if old age had given her its first unkind touch. It seemed necessary now to unlock the garret-door, lest any intruder should go in; and with trembling fingers she took the key out of the wards within, and put it into the key-hole on the outside. She had not lighted a lamp, or looked round her room, and she left it in undisturbed quiet and darkness. Then she went down the long, narrow staircase slowly, and out into the court, and down the street, with her terrible story. It was a black shadow creeping across the glorified hour of Carl and Hester's betrothal.

Mme. Lawson was about to enter John Morley's house, when a man who had been loitering on the opposite pavement strode quickly across the road and stopped her. She started with a half-uttered shriek, but Robert Waldron's voice quickly pacified her alarm.

"Good-evening, madame," he said; "I was waiting here to see you coming out, or going in. How are they all to-night?"

"Oh, Milord Waldron!" she cried, clinging to him entreatingly; "come with me, come! He is dead, my son Jean! You know my son? I come from finding him dead and cold, and I said I must go and tell Hester. But you will come, is it not so, Milord Waldron?"

"Calm yourself," said Robert, in a soothing tone. "Certainly I will return with you, madame. Tell me your story tranquilly as we walk along. Did you say your son was dead?"

He walked up the street beside her, listening to her breathless and incoherent account, and thinking she was very probably mistaken, and that Lawson's drugged sleep was only a little more profound than usual. On the ground-floor of the house he procured a light, and went on up the stairs which he had so often trodden for Hester's sake. He entered the room, and stood still for a moment to look about him. Lawson was sitting in the same chair and place where Hester had found him the night before, but his face was buried upon his arms on the table. Robert put the light down beside him, and touched his hand. There was no doubt that he was dead. A faint scent of laudanum pervaded the room, and the box which had held his favorite drug lay open and empty at his feet.

There was a shock to Robert Waldron's sensitive temperament in this discovery, which formerly would have made him eager to throw upon some one else the uncomfortable burden. But a great change, a new birth, had been effected in him. He touched the dead hand again solemnly and reverently; and then turned to the forlorn old woman, who stood at his side, trembling from head to foot.

"Yes," he said, gently, "yes. Your poor son is dead. But be comforted; I will take care of you. He must have died sleeping; he did not suffer much, and he was no longer young. He was not many years younger than you, madame."

"I was seventeen when he was born," answered his mother, wiping her eyes. "Oh, Milord Waldron, send me back to Burgundy. I wish you would carry me back to Burgundy at once."

"You shall go," he said. "I will send you back as soon as possible. But now you must take a note for me to the doctor. You know Mr. Grant's house?"

"Oh, yes, yes!" she replied, eagerly. "I will run; and then must I come back here?"

"No," said Robert, seeing how much she dreaded it; "you may go to Hester; but do not tell her a word—not one word—to-night."

Lawson's mother did not delay her departure, and Robert was soon left alone in the room with the dead man. He scarcely knew why he had not gone himself for Grant; and yet at the first moment of discovery it had seemed wrong to abandon the room again with its solitary and lifeless occupant, and he could not ask the frightened mother to stay in it. It was cold and dark. The hidden face of the corpse was something appalling. Robert shivered as he looked round him, and his memory grew very busy with his past visits here. Of all the places in the world, this poor garret was the one where he had seen Hester oftenest. And now in her stead there was a silent corpse, whose face he could not see, and whom he shrank from touching.

He looked, however, more steadfastly at the dead man, and saw that there had floated to the bare floor at his feet several sheets of paper, closely covered with writing. Robert stooped to gather them together, and carried them to the light. They were written in English, and could not be any special communication to his mother. Rather, no doubt, they were intended as some explanation of his deed. The poor wretch might have destroyed himself intentionally, and these lines would give his reason.

Standing at the other side of the table, with Lawson's corpse opposite to him, Robert Waldron put the scattered leaves together, and read their narrative. The first page was dated nearly four months back, on the night when John Morley fled from Little Aston; and the rest had been written at various times since, sometimes only a few words being inserted in trembling characters, while at others the writing was clear and firm, and proceeded smoothly, as if the writer had found pleasure in his task. This was what he read:

"To-night I, Jean Lawson, begin to write my confession, which will clear all other persons of blame concerning the events which have happened in my master's house. Nobody will ever know how I have loved Hester. She has been my daughter, my queen, my goddess. I remember her mother, my master's wife, whose name was Elinor, coming into my work-room one day. She carried a tiny, white creature in her arms, and she said, 'Lawson, this is my little girl, and I wish everybody in the world to love my baby.' She smiled upon me like an angel; and I made a vow on the bended knees of my soul that that little child should be dearer to me than any other creature in heaven or earth. After that my master's wife died."

"My master was too much wrapped up in his grief to take notice of his young child. He left her in the hands of a careless nurse, and I used to hear the baby's cries up into my workroom. Then I would run down and carry her away with me, and the nurse was content enough. I made her a cradle of an old box, which I swung to the beams by ropes, and there the baby slept sometimes, while I sang and hammered away at my work. She soon learned to love the red and gold bindings, and, as soon as she was old enough she would sit for hours at the end of the press, watching me lay on the gold leaf, and color the margins. I taught her the A B C.

"My master was getting rich very fast. Well, that was good; that was what I wanted. There was not much spent in the house, and every year we put by a good large sum. I worked early and late, and never asked for more wages. Other masters came and said, I will give you twice, three times as much; but I never dreamed of leaving John Morley. We were gathering a dot for Hester, that she might be rich, and marry well. She was seven years old; I was forty-three; and my master was thirty-five. We both worked hard and spent little. Good! she would be very rich by the time when we must look out for a husband."

"If I shut my eyes now I see Hester again, as she was when she was seven years old. She began to take thought for her father, for the house, for me. Already she was a little woman. Sometimes she laughed, and made me laugh; but she was never merry and mischievous like other children. She had grown up too much with elderly people, who were always grave and often unhappy. But the child was not unhappy, that I swear. There was no truth in that plea of my master's for bringing another woman into his wife's place."

"About this time I began to see Hester's mother, whether in vision or reality I cannot tell. But she came now and then, a faint, bright, thin appearance, as of shining mist, with her face in it, and sometimes a hand, with the finger pointing. I saw it as often by day as by night. Hester could never see it, though she would go so near as to touch the shining mist. I did not know whether to like this appearance or not at first; but I grew accustomed to it, and then I loved it, and I always worked better when it was there. I suppose nobody in all the country round could do work like mine. But if I had taken higher wages from my master that shining cloud would have vanished away. I have seen Hester, in her play, touch the shadow hand without knowing it."

"But one day I went down to my master's room with some finished work, and there was a girl with him, a laughing, giddy, flaunting girl, who was standing close beside him. I felt all at once a horrible dread and hatred creep through me. Something said, either in my ear or only in my heart, 'That woman will be John Morley's second wife!' They had not seen me, and I stole away with the cold sweat upon my face. After that the appearance was as of a woman in great sorrow, who looked at me with trouble in her eyes. But what could I do?"

"It was a dreadful misfortune to happen. If my master had died, there was a little fortune for Hester, and I would have managed to carry on the business for her. But another wife, and other children, maybe! I saw Hester about to become a step-child, a forlorn little drudge, forgotten and neglected by her father."

"I loathed that woman; I abhorred her. I hated the jingle of her piano and her loud singing, which reached me up in my quiet room, and scared away the shining vision. Then the money kept flying like sparks from an anvil. She must have her silks and satins and laces, and a drawing-room, and more servants. My master was befuddled by her. I saw Hester would come to poverty. She was not unkind to her; she even made believe to love her, and whenever the child came to see me, we heard her shrill, hateful voice calling, 'Hester, Hetty!' Perhaps it was because she no longer played there, that her mother never came to my work-room."

"But I saw her once again, and I told Hester of it. I saw her sitting by my fire, with her head bowed down upon her hands, as one in very sore trouble of mind."

"Then my master's second wife brought disgrace upon him."

"I thought I could not hate her more than I had done, but I hated her a hundredfold more after that. I saw my master the night after she left him go into Hester's room in the dead of the night, ready to take her life and his own. I had stayed in the house for very fear of that, to save the child. I remember striking a boy a heavy blow for saying that Hester was her daughter.

Ten years or so after that I saw the man who had been our ruin prowling about our house, and I stole back to my room for one of the press-pins. He walked up and down, with his head bent, until he came close to where I stood in the entrance of the side-passage, and I struck him, as I would have set my heel upon any venomous snake. He fell in an instant, and I hurried home. My mother was come to live with me then. I cleaned the press-pin with ashes, and carried it back the next morning. I was not altogether sorry that I had missed killing him.

But I missed killing her, too. My hand betrayed me a second time. It came about in this way: I was staying late on the Saturday night, and my master was gone out of the house, when all at once I heard the old jingle of the piano coming up to my room. I knew it could be no one else save her. I had waited for this hour many years. I took my press-pin again, and crept down-stairs through the old printing rooms into the other part of the house. The drawing-room door was ajar, and I looked in. She was sitting at her piano, with her back toward me, and she did not hear me go in. I thought she was dead after I struck her; and I felt glad that I had revenged Hester, my master, and myself. Then I went home.

Hester came in just now. They are come back, she and her father, and are going down to their own house, though they know she is there. I shall never enter it again. Sometimes I think it would be well for me to go, as my mother wishes me, to Burgundy; but then I have no money. We are all poor; my master, Hester, and myself. I am writing this to explain to my master, and to any other persons he may think fit to show it to, how all these things have come about.

"I did everything for the sake of Hester, who has been as the apple of my eye ever since I saw her first, a small white creature, in her mother's arms."

A GOOD DEFENCE.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 15, Acts 22: 1-21. Golden Text, 1 Pet. 3: 15. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Paul's Unprepared Address—His Tribute to his Enemies—His Account of his Conversion—Indifference to his Testimony—The Risen Jesus a Proof of Jewish Guilt—Paul Recounts his Healing—Claims God's Authority for his Course—Jewish Clamor—Paul in Prison.

PAUL, standing on the stairs of the castle, where he was to be imprisoned, having obtained leave from the chief captain to speak unto the people, beckoned unto them with the hand that he might be heard. "And when there was made a great silence, he spake unto them in the Hebrew tongue." Paul had no time to think over what he should say to this angry multitude. But another was thinking for him. Paul had given himself up entirely to the control of the Holy Ghost; and as God the Holy Ghost is never at a loss, Paul knew that the words of Jesus would be fulfilled, "It shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak. For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you" (Matt. 10: 19, 20).

SPEAKING BY THE HOLY GHOST. Paul addressed them as "Men, brethren, and fathers." He had nothing against them, the enemy was all on their side, and his heart's desire and prayer for them was that they might be saved (Rom. 10: 1). To him they were fellow-men, for whom Jesus Christ had tasted death; brethren, as being equally of the flesh; fathers, as being many of them of ripe age, as well as of superior ecclesiastical position to himself. God ordered it that Paul should be heard and understood. He said: "I am verily a man which am a Jew, born in Tarsus, a city in Cilicia, yet brought up in this city at the feet of Gamaliel, and taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers, and was zealous toward God, as ye all are this day." We see here how the Holy Ghost led Paul to give his enemies credit for all he could; he appealed to them as being brethren, fathers, and zealous toward God. There was no sickly flattery in this, it was simple fact, and Paul was glad to admit it. The natural man always seeks to detract from his enemies in every possible way; it is Jesus who teaches us to love our enemies. Whenever, in speaking of those who have injured us, we mention anything we know against them, however true it may be, we are not speaking by the Holy Ghost. Paul came down to where his audience was, for God had taught him to make himself

"ALL THINGS TO ALL MEN," to the Jews "as a Jew that [he] might gain the Jews; to them that are under the law, as under the law, that [he] might gain them that are under the law" (1 Cor. 9: 20-22). He did not simulate anything, but instead of speaking from his present experience, he showed how, in his past experience, he had gone over the very ground they were now treading: "And I persecuted this way unto the death, binding and delivering into prisons both men and women. As also the high-priest both bear me witness, and all the estate of the elders; from whom also I received letters unto the brethren, and went to Damascus, to bring them that were there bound unto Jerusalem, for to be punished."

Not one of these zealous Jews had gone to greater lengths of zeal than the former persecutor of the Christians who now stood before them. The witnesses to this fact were none other than their own high-priest and their own high court of jurisprudence! This was uncontested. What, then, could have so changed such a man? He spoke for himself, "And it came to pass, that, as I made my journey, and was come nigh unto Damascus about noon, suddenly there shone from heaven a great light round about me. And I fell unto the ground, and heard a voice saying unto me, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? And I answered, Who art Thou, Lord? And He said unto me, I am Jesus of Nazareth, whom thou persecutest. And they that were with me saw indeed the light, and were afraid; but they heard not the voice of Him that spake to me."

A more circumstantial account could not have been given, and it was open to any one who doubted the truth of this statement to search out the names of Paul's companions on this journey. No record has ever reached us of an attempt made to deny Paul's account of his conversion. Yet his hearers remained unconvinced! So it is to this day. God's witnesses to His converting grace are everywhere; some few are convinced that the living God is at work, and they yield themselves to Him; but the great mass of mankind live on still as though there were no God, or as though, if there were, He were too far off or too indifferent to hold any real communication with them, and they do not want to be undeceived. If Paul were speaking truth, and the Son of God had revealed Himself to him, then it was the bounden duty of Paul to acknowledge and to preach Him; but also if Jesus was the Christ, the multitude to whom Paul was preaching were equally

BOUND TO ACKNOWLEDGE HIM.

Paul went on with his narration: "And I said, What shall I do, Lord?" thus showing how completely he had yielded himself to his newly found Messiah. All the unbelief of his audience did not hinder him from saying all he had to say. Many perhaps thought him quite deluded, but he spoke as led by the Spirit. "And the Lord said unto me, Arise, go into Damascus; and there it shall be told thee of all things which are appointed for thee to do." Nothing could be more practical or straightforward; nothing was colored, nothing imaginary. But if this was true, if Jesus really was risen, if Jesus did thus speak from heaven, how guilty were those who had crucified Him! This Jewish audience could not listen with indifferent ears, for every word was a condemnation of them.

The apostle went on to relate the circumstances of his HEALING.

When led by the hand into Damascus, totally blind, Ananias, whom he had intended to bring bound unto Jerusalem, "came unto me, and stood, and said unto me, Brother Saul, receive thy sight. And the same hour I looked up upon him." (There must have been witnesses in Jerusalem who could prove whether this was fact or not.) "And he said, The God of our fathers hath chosen thee, that thou shouldest know His will, and see that Just One, and shouldest hear the voice of His mouth. For thou shalt be His witness unto all men of what thou hast seen and heard. And now why tarriest thou? arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord."

This is one of God's descriptions of a true conversion, to know God's will, to see and hear Jesus, and to be His witness. Nothing here about frames or feelings, it is a falling back before God, the will yielding before His; it is silence to God, that He may speak; attention to Him, that He may manifest Himself, and thus to become His witness. Many of us are intent on being the witnesses to our own progress, holiness, or consistency of life: every glance which rests on us in any way falls short of seeing Jesus. "We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord;" and so we manifest not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord (II Cor. 4: 5).

Having thus testified to his conversion, in which he had no part but to yield himself to God, and to receive Jesus, Paul went on to tell of to Jerusalem after his conversion (Acts 9: 26-30). "And it came to pass, that, when I was come again to Jerusalem, even while I prayed in the temple, I was in a trance; and saw Him saying unto me, Make haste, and get thee quickly out of Jerusalem; for they will not receive thy testimony concerning me." Believing Jews as well as unbelievers were afraid of Saul of Tarsus at the time of which he speaks (Acts 9: 26). Oh, how lovely is the apostle's defence of his enemies! he makes all the excuse he can for them. "I said, Lord, they know that I imprisoned and beat in every synagogue them that believed on Thee; and when the blood of thy martyr Stephen was shed, I also was standing by, and consenting unto his death, and kept the raiment of them that slew him. And He said unto me, Depart; for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles."

Paul gave no other than the direct authority of God for the course which he had pursued; he stated no reasonings of his own mind, no arguments of others. He had to do with God, and this was just what the people did not understand. They were at home in questions of doctrine, in ordinances and ceremonies, forms of worship, and shades of opinion, but was unknown to them. They did not wait to inquire whether there was ground for what Paul said; their national pride was at stake that Paul should suppose, even if God had sent him, that it could be right to offer salvation to the Gentiles! This was the heinous sin for which they believed Paul worthy of death. They gave him audience unto this word, and then lifted up their voices, and said, "Away with such a fellow from the earth; for it is not fit that he should live." In their undignified rage they cast off their clothes—i.e., their outer cloaks—and threw dust into the air. This led the chief captain to command that Paul should be brought into the castle and put to torture "that he might know wherefore they cried so against him." Paul had served as the instrument of the Holy Ghost in thus bearing his testimony; he might have said with his Master, "For this cause came I unto this hour" (John 12: 27), and now he was ready "to be bound . . . for the name of the Lord Jesus."

PRINCE EDWARD, Grandson of Queen Victoria—Sandringham Hall, the Seat of the Prince of Wales.

PRINCE EDWARD,

GRANDSON OF QUEEN VICTORIA.

The Future King of England—The System of a Limited Monarchy—Gradual Decadence of Regal Power—The Power Practically held by the People—Conditions of Perpetuity of the System—Prince Edward's Birth and Early Life—Naval Discipline—Birthday Festivities—Letter from Mr. Gladstone—A Mark of Royal Sympathy with the People.

ON Thursday, January 8th, the royal family of England celebrated the twenty-first birthday of the young man who is second in the line of succession to the throne. According to the constitution, the Queen will at her death be succeeded by her eldest son, the Prince of Wales, and he by his eldest son, Prince Albert, Victor, Christian, Edward, who on January 8th attained his majority. To those accustomed to the freedom of choice existing under a republican form of government, it seems marvellous that a free and intelligent people should consent to have at their head a family in which the eldest son should of right succeed to the highest place. That no matter whether he be a wise man or a fool, a good man or a scoundrel, he is made king, and holds the office as long as he lives. Practically, however, the system in England entails fewer evils than might be expected to result from it.

THE POWER OF THE PEOPLE

has been steadily growing during the last three hundred years, and, one by one, the monarch has found it prudent to submit to lose his prerogatives, until now the power of the monarch is far less than that with which we intrust our President. The present Queen, who has been on the throne forty-eight years, has never ventured to veto a single bill, and has not made a single appointment in the civil service. Every bill has to be signed by the monarch before it can become law, but in no case has she refused to sign a bill passed by the two Houses of Parliament.

That docility has not, of course, been attained without some

TERRIBLE STRUGGLES.

But the people have been determined, and every step they have gained toward freedom and self-government they have held and made it a point from which to advance to a still firmer footing. King Charles I., aided by unscrupulous favorites, attempted to rule as other European monarchs did, according to his own will, without consulting the wishes of his people; but the people rose in their might, drove him from his throne, and eventually, finding him a man so utterly given to lying that his most solemn oath could not be trusted, they cut off his head. A very wise proceeding, which has had a wholesome influence on all his successors. King James II. made an attempt to over-ride the liberties of the people on the religious side, and again the people rose. He had the prudence to get himself out of the country in time, so he saved his head, but he lost his throne. Since that time the monarchs have never ventured to place themselves dangerously in antagonism to the people. Many laws have been passed of which they have individually disapproved, but they have never thwarted the people's will. The real power is in the hands of the Prime Minister and his colleagues, who are the men in whom the representatives of the people have confidence. If at any time the members of the House of Commons, who are directly elected by the people, pass a resolution declaring that they have lost confidence in the Premier and his Cabinet, their resignation follows as a matter of course.

Very justly in these circumstances the monarch is

RELIEVED OF RESPONSIBILITY.

So completely is the fact recognized of the throne having lost its power, that the very form of censure used by Parliament directly refers to it. If the foreign policy or colonial policy is to be condemned, the words of the motion in which the condemnation is expressed are not censure of the monarch, but censure of the monarch's advisers, thus implying that the monarch followed the advice given by the persons constitutionally intrusted with that duty. Thus, being divested of power and responsibility, the monarch occupies a less dangerous position, and the people possess the rights of self-government as completely as they do under a republic.

It is true, the question may arise as to the utility of having a monarch at all if the people govern themselves. That is a question that is undoubtedly often before the minds of advanced thinkers; but the English people are conservative in disposition, disinclined to radical changes, and are, as a rule, in favor of maintaining the existing order of things so long as they do not involve wrong or inconvenience. Should some king arise who, like the late Prince Albert, desires to secure and enlarge the prerogatives of the sovereign, and should obstinately set himself to oppose the clearly expressed will of the people, the existence of monarchy in England would be in peril. It is, therefore, of some moment to the people what the disposition is of the man who, in the natural order of things, will some day wear the crown.

There is also an immense

exercised by the sovereign. A glance at the state of society during the last century shows that the character of the king or queen affects in no slight degree the character of the people. The loose morals of George IV. became the fashion in court circles, and penetrated down to the lower ranks of the country gentry and the middle classes, while the decorous domestic circle of Queen Victoria has set a wholesome example to the people, which has been productive of a decided improvement in the public morals over those of the times of her uncle.

The young man who now comes prominently before the public as the future king, is to be known for the present, until his father becomes king and he in his turn becomes Prince of Wales, as

PRINCE EDWARD.

He was born on January 8th, 1864. He and his brother George, who is eighteen months younger, were educated under tutors at home. When the elder of the two boys had attained his fourteenth year they were both sent to sea as the best means of giving them needed discipline and detaching them from the enervating influences of court life. Current report has it that their father, who is remarkable for his easy and generous disposition rather than for his wisdom, saw that the boys needed a firmer hand than his own if they were to grow up creditably—in fact, that they were in serious danger of being spoiled if they remained at home with an indulgent father, a fond mother, and servile courtiers.

They were therefore entered as naval cadets on board the Britannia training ship at Dartmouth, for a two years' course of instruction, their father giving peremptory orders that they were to be treated in every way as the other cadets, and that they were to be relieved of no duty nor receive any indulgence on account of their royal blood. The young students stuck to their work, and honored every branch of discipline by prompt and cheerful obedience. Their studies embraced Algebra, Euclid, Trigonometry, Natural Philosophy, Latin, French, Drawing, Essay Writing, Navigation, Nautical Astronomy, the uses of Instruments and Charts, and Seamanship. The proficiency they evidenced upon examination gained for them six months' time, when they were transferred to the Bacchante, on which ship they continued the studies of the profession with as much assiduity as though they would have to depend upon it for their livelihood.

The Bacchante was commissioned at Portsmouth on July 15th, 1879, and the princes' names were entered on August 4th, and they joined her on September 17th, the same year. She shortly afterward set sail for calling at Palermo, Messina, Malta, Gibraltar, Madeira, and the West Indies. Upon the return home of "the sailor princes" in 1879, the Prince and Princess of Wales were so pleased with the instruction their sons had received, that it was decided to again utilize the Bacchante on a similar service; and as soon as her defects were made good she proceeded on a cruise to Australia and China, with the princes on board; and after an absence of seven months the trip ended, and the Bacchante once more arrived in England. Since then Prince Edward has studied at the University of Cambridge. The prince has the reputation of being modest and genial, conscious of his responsibilities, and conscientious in discharging his duties. Respect both for his father—who is ever ready to spend himself on behalf of benevolent objects, and has honorably held aloof from political intrigue—and for his excellent mother—who has for a score of years more than retained the popularity which her grace and beauty excited when the Princess Alexandra left her Danish home to become "a daughter of England"—would alone invest the occasion of the prince's twenty-first birthday with unusual interest for the English people.

THE CELEBRATIONS

connected with the festival were, by the wish of the Prince of Wales, limited to the home. There was not a general holiday through the country, as was expected, but those who desired to congratulate the young man went in person to Sandringham, the family residence (a picture of which appears on the first page), or wrote or telegraphed to him there. The festivities were purely local, such as any country gentleman would provide for his friends and tenants on the occasion of his eldest son's coming of age. They commenced on Thursday morning with the reception of deputations. First of all came the tenants of the estate, among whom the Prince of Wales is deservedly popular. In reply to their address, Prince Edward, in a voice promising "unusual oratorical power," said that he could only hope to merit their good opinions in the future by pursuing the path of kindness, good-will, and generosity which his parents had followed.

A deputation from the city of Norwich next entered the room, and, in reply to their address, the Prince of Wales assured the civic authorities that it had been the earnest wish of the princess and himself to emulate the bright example set by the Queen and the late Prince Consort, "not only to princes, but to all those who seek for domestic contentment and happiness." Prince Edward then stepped forward, and, after expressing his thanks for the cordial greeting given to him that morning, remarked that part of his education had been acquired while visiting British colonies, and that the Queen had no more loyal subjects than the English beyond the seas. Addresses were also presented from Lynn, Cambridge, and the Lynn Grammar School, and appropriately acknowledged.

Refreshments having been served to the members of the deputation, the royal party went to the porch of the house, in front of which the school children of Sandringham and West Newton, the laborers and keepers, were assembled. The girls' scarlet cloaks, the men's wideawakes, ornamented with scarlet bands, and the keepers' green velvet jackets made the scene picturesque enough; and in response to their greetings Prince Edward said heartily and simply, "Thank you, very much, kind friends." Then slowly defiling through the park gates was to be seen Mr. John Sanger's "gorgeous procession," with the usual knights in armor, elephants, and camels. (See frontispiece.) This immensely delighted the villagers and the children. A photograph of the scene having been taken, the laborers sat down to a substantial dinner in a tent outside the park, and the little folks were regaled with buns and oranges.

THE BIRTHDAY PRESENTS,

which were exhibited in the hall, were very numerous, and among them was a golden bowl from Her Majesty and a golden inkstand from

Mr. Moses Montefiore. Each of the deputations referred to above brought, we may add, rare and beautiful gifts. In the evening the scene was illuminated, and a ball, for which five hundred invitations had been issued, was held. Congratulatory addresses were also sent. Sandringham from various boroughs in the kingdom, and in the metropolis, on Thursday, were were illuminations at the West End. By nothing, however, will this interesting celebration be more remembered than by the following LETTER FROM MR. GLADSTONE.

High Prince Edward received on Thursday morning, and which we doubt not he will regard of greater value than all the gifts: "SIR: I am the oldest among the confidential servants of your Majesty. I cannot allow the anniversary to pass without notice which will to-morrow bring your Royal Highness to full age, and thus mark an important epoch in your life. The hopes and intentions of those whose lives lie, like mine, in the past are of little moment, but they have seen much, and what they have seen suggests much for the future. There lies before your Royal Highness in prospect the occupation, I trust at a distant date, of a throne which, to me at least, appears the most illustrious in the world, from its history and associations, on its legal basis, from the weight of the cares it brings, from the loyal love of the people, and on the unparalleled opportunities it gives, in so many ways and in so many regions, of doing good to the almost countless numbers whom the Almighty has placed beneath the sceptre of England. I fervently desire and pray—and yet cannot be a more animating prayer—that your Royal Highness may ever grow in the principles of conduct, and may be adorned with all the qualities which correspond with this great and noble vocation. And, sir, if sovereignty has been relieved by our modern institutions of some of its burdens, it still, I believe, remains true that there has been no period in the world's history at which successors to the monarchy could more efficaciously contribute to the stability of a great historic system, dependent even more upon love than upon strength, by devotion to their duties, and by a right example to the country. This result we have happily been permitted to see, and other generations will, I trust, witness it anew. Heartily desiring that, in the life of your Royal Highness, every private and personal may be joined with every public blessing, I have the honor to remain, sir, your Royal Highness's most dutiful and faithful servant, W. E. GLADSTONE."

To this wise letter the young prince sent the following cordial and respectful reply: "DEAR MR. GLADSTONE: I wish I were better able to answer your very kind letter—conveying, as it does, not only the best of good wishes, but carrying with them reflections on the past, and advice for the future, for which I wish to thank you. I assure you the letter shall have that attention which words from yourself must deserve. It admirably describes much which demands my most earnest thought on this, perhaps, the most important birthday of my life. Believe me, I am very grateful for your remembrance of me this day, and that, among the many offerings which have reached me, I prize nothing more than the letter you have so kindly written, for which pray accept my most sincere thanks. I am glad to believe that your health is restored, and I trust your many friends will have no cause for renewed anxiety on your behalf."

"With my most kind remembrances to Mrs. Gladstone, believe me, yours very sincerely, ALBERT VICTOR."

The Prince of Wales has wisely decided not to ask Parliament to find an establishment for the young prince. He has an abundance of tact and knowledge of the spirit of the times. Life is very hard for the majority of the English people at present, and they naturally feel far more kindly toward the Prince of Wales for his sympathy with them, which he shows in declining to add to the burdens they already bear.

INCIDENTS OF GOSPEL WORK IN CHINA.

MR. D. THOMPSON, of Chung-king, Si-ch'uen, says in a letter to Mr. Hudson Taylor, the founder of the China Inland Mission: "Surely it is a cause for praise and thankfulness that we are so well spoken of, and so widely known as we are through saving so many lives from opium poisoning in this city. One would think that in time the number would lessen, but it is not so. In February I attended

THIRTEEN CASES OF OPIUM SUICIDE, of whom I saved six, four died, two proved to be only drunk, and another was doubtful; six were male, and seven female. In March I attended twenty-four cases, in April eighteen, and in May twenty-one. Total in March, April, and May, sixty-three. They were male and female, rich and poor, and of all ages. I reported as saved in March fifteen, dead four, I not having been called in time. Of the eighteen cases in April fifteen were reported as saved, two died, and about a babe eight months old I am uncertain; the nurse had by mistake given it two pills taken by opium-smokers when wishing to give up the habit. I believe these pills are two thirds opium. The child went to sleep, and would not wake up, so the mother called the nurse, who said she only gave the child its medicine, and brought the pills to show the mother, whereupon the mistake was discovered. I was called, and hurried along as fast as possible. We got the poor babe awakened, and poured some medicine down its throat, which, after a short time, took effect; but it was very ill. After doing all I could, I left, asking them to call and let me know whether he died or not, but they never came. In May fifteen were saved. These came under our immediate notice, but there must be a very large number of whom we do not hear who fill a suicide's and a heathen's grave—nothing of a Saviour. May I ask your prayers for this sad work, that as I go day by day into so many houses to save the natural life, the words spoken and the tracts left may be blessed to the salvation of many?

THE EVANGELIST'S WORK

has been carried on in the shop on the street for over three years. If we have not seen as much fruit as we should like, yet the day-by-day testimony which has been borne will, we hope, prove to have been a good seed-sowing, by ultimately yielding an abundant harvest. The shop is not a large one, but it will accommodate from sixty to seventy, and we generally get it full. Many show by their faces that they are taking in the Word. Some prove their interest by coming day after day; and though the audience is a changing one, many stay from the beginning to the end of the service. The rule is for our two evangelists to go about 3 P.M. and open the door, conversing with many who may step in. I generally go about 4 P.M. and stand at the door to invite passers-by in, until we have a good gathering. I preach a little every day, and really sometimes have returned home at 6 or 6.30 so full of joy that I could not eat. When God's Holy Spirit has been present, the poor people had seemed unwilling to retire, wishing to hear more of

THE "OLD, OLD STORY."

Many times have I felt as happy in soul as if I had been at an English meeting. I cannot tell how much they understood, or how much they took away and would remember, but nevertheless the Holy Spirit has been present, and we dare not limit His power.

"I should like to see a number of these shops all over this large city, having a man in each to sell religious books and tracts, and to speak to callers in a kind and conversational way. One might have a day for visiting each, and preaching or speaking to inquirers. Some of God's dear children who themselves cannot come to this land would doubtless be glad to pay the rent of a shop and the wages of a man. The rent might be twenty-five dollars, and the wages one or two dollars per week, and who knows how many might be eternally saved? I am praying for something of this kind, for oh! we must do so little, and

TIME FLIES SO VERY FAST.

Pray for us in the field; we do not forget those at home who give us their prayers as well as their money; and the prayers of those who cannot give money are a great help and blessing to us, for we need both."

REMARKABLE FAITH CURES.

LUMBAGO CURED.

MRS. H. A. WILLETS, of New York, gives the following testimony, which the Rev. A. B. Simpson prints in Word, Work and World: "In the fall of 1882 I lay suffering severely with lumbago. I had been sick about eighteen days, under a doctor's care, and a woman waited upon me, as I was unable to move without a groan. I tried to stand with the assistance of a cane, but was very crooked, and suffered terrible pain. I had almost made up my mind I had to be a cripple the remainder of my days. I never thought much about faith for healing the body; not but what I knew God was able to do so. I was left alone in the evening, October 8th, during church service. I opened the Bible to read, and as I read the Word it came into my mind to ask the Father to give me something that would comfort me in my affliction. The Book was open at the sixteenth chapter of John; my eyes rested on the twenty-second verse, 'And ye now, therefore, have sorrow, but I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you.' So I kept on reading until I came to the thirty-first verse, 'And do ye now believe,' and all of a sudden it came to me how He said He could make the crooked straight. Then I commenced to agonize in prayer for faith, and, as faith increased, I clutched it until I knew God had answered prayer. I arose from my chair and stood upon my feet, just as erect as I do now. My prayer was turned to praise. When my husband arrived home we had a grand time singing the doxology, and my heart was filled with His love."

AT BETHSHAN

A sister told how God had led her to trust Him for which was rapidly spreading, instead of undergoing an operation, which the doctor considered essential to the saving of her life. For a time her faith was tried, but it never failed; she knew in whom she was trusting. At last the healing commenced. The cancer began to decrease rapidly, and was now nearly well.

Miss Medland said: "I went last Friday to the London Hospital to see a young man, who was lying there with a badly

FRACTURED LEG.

A weight had fallen on it, breaking the bone in two places, besides crushing the leg. All who know anything of a fractured limb will know that while the broken bones are reuniting there is great pain. The young man told me that the Lord had shown His power and love by keeping Him from pain in answer to his aunt's prayer. He had only had about five minutes' pain altogether, and that was during the setting of the bones. Since then he had felt none. He was full of thankfulness to his loving Father. His happy face, free from all traces of pain, spoke for itself."

Mr. Simpson said: "For about seventeen years my life was a misery to me through

INDIGESTION.

The doctor said it was ulcer in the stomach. Though I went to about twelve doctors I found no remedies that could cure me. I went one day out of curiosity to a faith-healing meeting at Exeter Hall. But what I heard there led me to be anointed. I returned home to give up every medicine, and leaving off my diet of milk, took ordinary food. I was at the time a walking skeleton. I improved in strength, and my healing was complete. But oh, the physical blessing was nothing in comparison to the deep blessing I received in my soul! I cannot praise God sufficiently for it."

DOWNFALL OF CHRISTIANITY.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached last Sunday Morning, February 8, 1885.

"The sun shall be turned into darkness."—Acts 2: 20.

Christianity the Rising Sun of our Time—Efforts to Extinguish it—A Frozen World—Not a Joke—Blasphemy a Punishable Crime—Abuse of Free Speech—What the Infidels Propose—What they will Achieve if they can—I. The Degradation of Womanhood—Her Condition in Non-Christian Lands—II. The Demoralization of Society—A Coward's Whistling—An Infidel's Death—The Overthrow of Churches—Asylums—Cemeteries—Attempt to Scale Heaven—Civilization Turned Back—Missionaries Recalled—Where the Infidel Road Leads—Infidelity an Inevitable Failure.

SOLAR eclipse is here prophesied to take place about the time of the destruction of ancient Jerusalem. Josephus, the historian, says that the prophecy was literally fulfilled, and that about that time there were strange appearances in the heavens. The sun was not destroyed, but for a little while hidden. Christianity is the rising and men have tried with the uprolling vapors of scepticism and the smoke of their blasphemy to turn the sun into darkness. Suppose the archangels of malice and horror should be let loose a little while and be allowed to extinguish and destroy the sun in the natural heavens. They would take the oceans from other worlds and pour them on this luminary of the planetary system, and the waters go hissing down amid the ravines and the caverns, and there is explosion after explosion, until there are only a few peaks of fire left in the sun, and these are cooling down and going out until the vast continents of flame are reduced to a small acreage of fire, and that whitens and cools off until there are only a few coals left, and these are whitening and going out until there is not a spark left in all the mountains of ashes and the valleys of ashes and the chasms of ashes. An extinguished sun.

A DEAD SUN.

A buried sun. Let all worlds wail at the stupendous obsequies. Of course, this withdrawal of the solar light and heat throws our earth into a universal chill, and the tropics become the temperate, and the temperate becomes the Arctic, and there are frozen rivers and frozen lakes and frozen oceans. From the Arctic and Antarctic regions the inhabitants gather in toward the centre and find the equator as the poles. The slain forests are piled up into a great bonfire, and around them gather the shivering villages and cities. The wealth of the coal mines is hastily poured into the furnaces and stirred into rage of combustion, but soon the bonfires begin to lower, and the furnaces begin to go out, and the nations begin to die. Coto-paxi, Vesuvius, Etna, Stromboli, Californian geysers cease to smoke, and the ice of hail storms remains unmelted in their crater. All the flowers have breathed their last breath. Ships with sailors frozen at the mast and helmsmen frozen at the wheel, and passengers frozen in the cabin.

ALL NATIONS DYING.

first at the north and then at the south. Child frosted and dead in the cradle. Octogenarian frosted and dead at the hearth. Workmen with frozen hand on the hammer and frozen foot on the shuttle. Winter from sea to sea. All-congealing winter. Perpetual winter. Globe of frigidity. Hemisphere shackled to hemisphere by chains of ice. Universal Nova Zembla. The earth an ice-floe grinding against other ice-floes. The archangels of malice and horror have done their work, and now they may take their thrones of glacier and look down upon the ruin they have wrought.

What the destruction of the sun in the natural heavens would be to our physical earth, the destruction of Christianity would be to the moral world. The sun turned into darkness.

Infidelity in our time is considered a great joke. There are people who will gather to hear and to hear Christ assailed with quibble and quirk and misrepresentation and badinage and harlequinade.

If a lecturer in Brooklyn Theatre last Sunday night is accurately reported, he said, among other things: "When we compare our God with men He is not much of a God. When Christ was here He was forgiving and half human; but now He is God; and instead of saying, 'Father, forgive them, they know not what they do,' He sends them to eternal fire. It is wonderful the difference office makes with some people" (laughter), the reporter says. The Lord Jesus Christ, who came to carry our sorrows, maligned in the presence of the city of Brooklyn!

Is there any such thing as blasphemy? If there be, is there any law against it? These are tremendous questions which I ask of the legal fraternity and of the judges of the courts in Brooklyn, and through them the Legislature of the State of New York. There is such a thing as blasphemy, and there is a law against blasphemy, and it is

A PUNISHABLE CRIME.

I hold in my hand a book entitled "Religion and the State," by Rev. Dr. Samuel T. Spear, the ablest ecclesiastical lawyer of our time; and had he entered the legal profession instead of theology, would long before this have been upon the bench of the Supreme Court at Washington. In this book he gives a compilation of authorities upon this subject of blasphemy. (The preacher here gave the opinions of the Supreme Court of many of the States and of the United States, showing blasphemy a punishable offence.)

Now, I say, let the law against blasphemy be erased from the statute book, or let it be executed. "Oh," says some one, "don't you believe in

FREE SPEECH?"

Yes, I believe in all styles of righteous freedom—free driving of horses, but no right to run over other people; free use of knives, but no right for assassination; free use of gunpowder, but no right to destroy the lives or the property of others; free speech, but no freedom for obscenity, or false speaking, or blasphemy. Freedom to do right, and according to law, but no freedom to do wrong and against the law.

Oh, it would have been the grandest drama ever enacted on the stage of Brooklyn Theatre if, last Sabbath night, my friend Patrick Campbell, chief of police, who believes in God and in Jesus Christ, had walked on the platform, followed by a platoon of officers, and had put his hand on the shoulder of that blasphemous lecturer and had said: "In the name of the common law, in the name of the State of New York, in the name of the city of Brooklyn, this infamy must stop, and stop here, and stop now."

Now, I say, if there be, and there is, a law against blasphemy, let that law be erased, or else let it be executed. There will after a while arise in the United States a municipal authority somewhere tall enough to look over all political considerations and strong-armed enough to execute the law against blasphemy, and then we shall have no more of the outrageous utterances of last Sabbath night in Brooklyn Theatre, and the carrion stench of leprous infidelity will be fumigated from the atmosphere.

I propose this morning to take Infidelity and Atheism out of the realm of jocularity into one of tragedy, and show you and what, if they are successful, they will accomplish. There are those in all our communities who would like to see the Christian religion overthrown, and who say the world would be better without it. I want to show you what is the end of this road, and what is the terminus of this crusade, and what this world will be when Atheism and Infidelity have triumphed over it, if they can. I say, if they can. I ate it, if they can.

In the first place, it will be the complete unutterable

DEGRADATION OF WOMANHOOD.

I will prove it by facts and arguments no honest man will dispute. In all countries and cities and States and nations where Christian religion has been dominant, we condition has been ameliorated and improved and she is deferred to and honored in a sand things, and every gentleman takes care before her. If your associations have good, you know that the name of wife, mother, daughter, suggest gracious surroundings. I know there are no better schools and seminaries in Brooklyn or in any city of this country than the schools and seminaries for our young ladies. You know that while woman may suffer in England and the United States, still more of her rights in Christendom than elsewhere else.

Now, compare this with woman's condition lands where Christianity has made little advance—in China, in Barbary, in Bornatary, in Egypt, in Hindostan. The Burn sell their wives and daughters as so sheep. The Hindoo Bible makes it disgrace and an outrage for a woman to listen to or look out of the window in the absence of her husband, and gives as a lawful ground for divorce a woman's beginning to eat before husband has finished his meal! What those white bundles on the ponds and rivers in China in the morning? Infanticide follies infanticide. Female children destroyed because they are female. Woman harnesses a plough as an ox. Woman veiled and barricaded in all styles of cruel seclusion. Her life a misfortune. Her life a torture. Her life a horror. The missionary of the cross to the heathen lands preaches generally to two groups—a group of men who do as they please and where they please; the other group is hidden and carefully secluded in a side-moment, where they may hear the voice of a preacher, but may not be seen. No refine. No liberty. No hope for this life. No hope for the life to come. Ringed nose. Cramped. Disfigured face. Embuted soul.

Now, compare those two conditions. far toward this latter condition that I should woman go if Christian influences withdrawn and Christianity were destroyed is only

A QUESTION OF DYNAMICS.

If an object be lifted to a certain point not fastened there, and the lifting power withdrawn, how long before that object will drop down to the point from which it started? If that lifting power be withdrawn she falls clear back to the point from which she was resurrected, not any lower because there is no lower depth. And yet, I have read in the newspapers that last Sabbath night, notwithstanding the fact that the only salvation of woman from degradation and woe is the Christian religion, and that only influence that has ever lifted her in the social scale is Christianity—I have read notwithstanding all that, there were present at that wholesale bombardment of Christianity, and that long-protracted insult to Jesus Christ. I make no remark in regard to those persons. I make no remark in regard to them. In the silence of your own soul observe their

If Infidelity triumph and Christianity be thrown, it means the

DEMORALIZATION OF SOCIETY.

The one idea in the Bible that atheists and infidels most hate, is the idea of retribution. It is the idea of retribution and punishment away the idea of retribution and punishment from society, and it will begin very soon to integrate; and take away from the minds of the fear of hell, and there are a great many who would very soon turn this world into The majority of those who are indignant the Bible because of the idea of punishing men whose lives are bad or whose are impure, and who hate the Bible because of the idea of future punishment for the reason that criminals hate the penitentiary. Oh, I have heard this brave talk about fearing nothing of the consequences of the next world, and I have made up my mind to merely a coward's whistling to keep my courage up. I have seen men flaunt their allies in the face of the community, and I have heard them defy the Judgment Day and the idea of any future consequence in sin; but when they came to die they did not until you could hear them for nearly a week, and in the summer night the neighbors would not endure the horrors. I would not want to see a railroad with five dead Christian people on a board going down a drawbridge into a watery grave. I do not want to see five hundred Christians go into such disaster, but I tell you that I could more easily see that than I for any protracted time stand and his pillow were of eider-down and underpinned of vermilion. I have never been able to use my nerves for such a spectacle. It is something at such a time to see an infidel in the countenance. I just looked in upon a minute or two, but the clutch of his fist diabolic, and the strength of voice was so great, I could not endure it. "There is no hell; there is no hell," but that night when I went into the dying room of my infidel neighbor, there was something on his countenance seemed to say, "There is, there is, there is!"

mightiest restraints to-day against theft, timidity, against libertinism, against all sorts of mightiest restraints are the tribulations of eternity. Men know that they can escape the law, but down in the earth's soul there is the realization of the fact they cannot escape God. He stands at the head of the road of profligacy and He will not let the guilty escape the idea of retribution. The punishment out of the hearts and minds of it and it would not be long before Brooklyn, New York and Boston and Charleston and New Orleans became Sodoms. The only restraints left are the evil passions of the world to-day are restraints.

pose now these generals of Atheism and Infidelity got the victory, and suppose they allied a great army made up of the mass of the world. They are in companies, in regiments, in brigades—the whole army. Forward, march! ye great army of infidels and atheists, flying before, banners flying behind, inscribed with the words: "No God! No Christ! No punishment! No restraints! No Bible! Do as you please!" They turned into darkness. Forward, march! ye great army of infidels and atheists, and first you will attack the churches. Away with the houses of worship! They have been leading there so long deluding the people with lies in their bereavements and sorrows. These churches ought to be extirpated; they do so much to relieve the lost and bring the wandering, and they have so long upheld the idea of eternal rest after the paroxysm of this life is over. Turn the St. Peter's and Paul's and the temples and tabernacles into club-houses. Away with those churches! Forward, march! ye great army of infidels and atheists, and next you will scatter the Sunday-schools—the Sabbath-schools filled with tanned, bright-cheeked little ones who are singing songs on Sunday afternoon, and getting into religion when they ought to be on the street playing marbles, or swearing on the nons. Away with them! Forward, march! ye great army of infidels and atheists, and next of all they will attack Christian asylums—the institutions of mercy supported by Christian philanthropies. Never mind the blind eyes and the deaf ears and the crippled limbs and the weakened intellects. Let paralyzed old age pick up its own food, and orphans fight their own way, and the half reformed go back to their evil habits. Forward, march! ye great army of infidels and atheists, and with your battle-axes hew down the cross and split up the manger of Bethlehem.

On, ye great army of infidels and atheists, and now they come to and the cemeteries of the earth. Pull down the sculpture above Greenwood's gate, for it means the resurrection. Tear away at the entrance of Laurel Hill the figure of Old Mortality and the chisel. On, ye great army of infidels and atheists, into the graveyards and the cemeteries; and where you see "Asleep in Jesus," cut it away, and where you find a marble story of heaven, blast it, and where you find over a little child's grave, "Suffer little children to come unto me," substitute the words "delusion" and "sham," and where you find an angel in marble strike off the wing, and when you come to a family vault chisel on the door: "Dead once, dead forever."

But on, ye great army of infidels and atheists, on! They will ATTEMPT TO SCALE HEAVEN.

There are heights to be taken. Pile hill on hill and Pelian upon Ossa, and then they hoist the ladders against the walls of heaven. On and on until they blow up the foundations of jasper and the gates of pearl. They charge up the steep. Now they aim for the throne of Him who liveth forever and ever. They would take down from their high place the Father, the Son, the Holy Ghost.

"Down with Him!" they say. "Down with Him from the throne!" they say. "Down forever! Down out of sight! He is not God. He has no right to sit there. Down with Him! Down with Christ!"

A world without a head, a universe without a king. Orphan constellations. Fatherless galaxies. Anarchy supreme. A dethroned Jehovah. An assassinated God. Patricide, regicide, decide. That is what they mean. That is what they will have, if they can, if they can, if they can.

CIVILIZATION HURLED BACK

into semi-barbarism, and semi-barbarism driven back into Hottentot savagery. The wheel of progress turned the other way and turned toward the dark ages. The clock of the centuries put back two thousand years. Go back, you Sandwich Islands, from your schools and from your colleges and from your reformed condition to what you were in 1820, when the missionaries first came. Call home the five hundred missionaries from India and overthrow their two thousand schools, where they are trying to educate the heathen and scatter the one hundred and forty thousand little children that they have gathered out of barbarism into civilization. Obliterate all the work of Dr. Duff in India, of David Abeel in China, of Dr. King in Greece, of Judson in Burma, of David Brainard amid the American aborigines, and send home the three thousand missionaries of the cross who are toiling in foreign lands, toiling for Christ's sake, toiling themselves into the grave. Tell these three thousand men of God that they are of no use. Send home the medical missionaries who are doctoring the bodies as well as the souls of the dying nations. Go home, London Missionary Society. Go home, American Board of Foreign Missions. Go home, ye Moravians, and relinquish back into darkness and squalor and filth and death the nations whom ye have begun to lift.

Oh, my friends, there has never been such a nefarious plot on earth as that which Infidelity and Atheism have planned. We were shocked a few days ago because of the attempt to blow up the Parliament Houses in London; but if Infidelity and Atheism succeed in their attempt, they will dynamite a world. Let them have their full way, and this world will be —a habitation with just three rooms: the one a mad-house, another a lazaretto, the other a pandemonium. These infidel bands of music have only just begun their concert—yea, they have only been stringing their instruments. I to-day put before you their whole programme from beginning until close. In the theatre the tragedy comes first and the farce afterward; but in this infidel drama of death the farce comes first and the tragedy afterward. And in the former the atheists and infidels laugh and mock, but in the latter God Himself will laugh and mock. He says so. "I will laugh at their calamity and mock when their fear cometh."

A HABITATION OF THREE ROOMS

From such a chasm of individual, national, world-wide ruin, stand back. Oh, young men, stand back from that chasm! You see the practical drift of my sermon. I want you to know

WHERE THAT ROAD LEADS.

Stand back from that chasm of ruin. The time is going to come (you and I may not live to see it, but it will come, just as certainly as there is a God, it will come) when the infidels and the atheists who openly out and out and above board preach and practice Infidelity and Atheism will be considered as criminals against society, as they are now criminals against God. Society will push out the leper, and the wretch with soul gangrened and ichorous and vermin covered and rotting apart with his bestiality, will be left to die in the ditch, and be denied decent burial, and men will come with spades and cover up the carcass, where it falls, that it poison not the air, and the only text in all the Bible appropriate for the funeral sermon will be Jeremiah 22:19, "He shall be buried with the burial of an ass."

A thousand voices come up to me this morning saying, "Do you really think Infidelity will succeed? Has Christianity received its death-blow? and will the Bible become obsolete?" Yes, when the smoke of the city chimneys arrests and destroys the noontide sun. Josephus says about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem the sun was turned into darkness; but only the clouds rolled between the sun and the earth. The sun went right on. It is the same sun, the same luminary as when at the beginning it shot out like an electric spark from God's finger, and to-day it is warming the nations, and to-day it is gilding the sea, and to-day it is filling the earth with light. The same old sun, now at all worn out, though its light steps are hurried and ninety million miles second, though its pulsations are four hundred and fifty trillion undulations in a second. Same sun with beautiful white light made up of the violet and the indigo and the blue and the green and the red and the yellow and the orange—the seven beautiful colors now just as when the solar spectrum first divided them.

At the beginning God said, "Let there be light," and light was, and light is, and light shall be. So Christianity is rolling on, and it is going to warm all nations, and all nations are to bask in its light. Men may shut the window-blinds so they cannot see it, or they may smoke the pipe of speculation until they are shadowed under their own vapor; but the Lord God is a sun! This white light of the Gospel made up of all the beautiful colors of earth and heaven—violet plucked from amid the spring grass, and the indigo of the southern jungles, and the blue of the skies, and the green of the foliage, and the yellow of the autumnal woods, and the orange of the southern groves, and the red of the sunsets. All the beauties of earth and heaven brought out by this spiritual spectrum. Great Britain is going to take all Europe for God. The United States are going to take all America for God. Both of them together will take all Asia for God. All three of them will take Africa for God. "Who art thou, oh great mountain?" before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain." The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it. Hallelujah, amen!

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Deadly Jungle Tree.—A Christian Worker said at a recent meeting: "Travellers tell us that in the jungles of India there grows a beautiful red plant; it attains to a great height, and is very seductive and fascinating. Insects and small birds are attracted by it, but all that eat of it must die, because it is a deadly poison. If you were to go to the root of that tree you would see thousands of insects and small birds lying there quite dead. Such are the attractions of sin; it sometimes looks well, and people are attracted by it, but all who indulge in it must surely die."

Percentage Deducted in Heaven.—The Rev. Mr. Ross said: "I remember on one occasion Dr. Bonar sending me a tract written by himself. It was about a Christian worker who had seen a vision. He thought he was lifted up to heaven, and when he got there he had a large percentage taken off his good deeds, which he had done in the world, for self and self-approbation, and doing good deeds because other people did them, or to please himself. One thing after another was taken from him, until he was very much afraid he would be weighed in the balance and found wanting. He awoke and knew he had been guilty of doing these things which he had seen in the vision; but God gave him grace to turn from self altogether, and work purely for the love of Christ."

A Troublesome Bad Temper.—A Christian worker related: "At the end of one of our open-air meetings I spoke to a woman who was a Christian. She said: 'Before my conversion I had a very bad temper, but since then it was all gone, as I thought, until yesterday morning, when I was getting the children ready for school. I then lost my temper with them, and it all came back as bad as ever. My husband, who had given up going to the saloon through my example, came in and found me out of temper. He went straight there to get his breakfast, a thing which he has not done for a long time. And this morning I asked the Lord to keep me from losing my temper. Rather tremblingly I began to prepare the children for school, scarcely trusting myself to speak, but for all my doubts and fears God heard my prayer, and I have again cause to thank Him for delivering me.'

How Nelly Accepted Christ.—The Rev. Mr. Ewing said: "Mr. Nettleton, a great American preacher, who is said to have been the means of the conversion of thousands of souls, was once paying a visit to a friend. The daughter of the house was not a Christian. One day Mr. Nettleton said to her, 'Nelly, are you afraid that I am going to speak to you about your soul?' 'Yes,' was the short reply. 'Well,' he said, 'as I don't want to make my visit to your father's house unpleasant to you, we will come to an agreement about it. I'll agree not to speak to you about your soul for a whole year, until I come back again, and I will ask your father and your friends not to speak to you upon the subject.' 'But,' she said, 'I may die within a year.' 'True, we will just make it a week.' Still the same difficulty arose. Would it do to wait a week? 'Well, let us leave it until tomorrow,' he said. But still that would not do. 'Nelly, shall we settle it just now?' he asked; and there and then they both went down on their knees before God, and settled the great, important question, and Nelly accepted Jesus as her Saviour."

A Storm Cloud Under the Feet.—The Rev. Mr. Ross said: "Last summer a party of travellers were visiting Switzerland, and one morning they set out about three or four o'clock to see the sunrise on Mont Blanc. They had not proceeded far when a violent thunderstorm burst upon them, and so alarmed the party that they wished to return at once. But the guide said, 'No, the storm is descending; if we go on we shall soon be through it; trust me and follow me.' Some of the party demurred, and returned to the shelter of the hostelry, but a few trusted and followed their guide. As they continued their ascent they had to pass through the thundercloud, and very dark and terrible it was as the lightning played around them, and the thunder echoed among the mountains, but the guide had but one word for them, 'Trust me and follow me.' Very soon they stood above the cloud, and looked down on the storm as it raged in all its fury in the valley where their friends had remained. And now the first rays of the sun began to flush the snowy peaks, and a great solemnity fell upon them. No one had courage to break the silence, full of the awful grandeur and sublime beauty of the scene before them, and when at length one of their number spoke, his first words were, 'It is well worth all we have come through.' So, dear Christian friends, when trials and troubles darken your path here, by faith catch one glimpse of your dear Master's face, and you too will say, 'It is well worth all we have come through.'

Looking Through the Mists.—Dr. Cameron says: "I once visited an invalid woman. She had been confined to bed for a long time, and when I spoke to her, she said: 'I think the Lord has forgotten me altogether.' The eye of faith had grown dim through bodily weakness, and I replied to her, 'Did you ever go down the river and see the lighthouse?' She said she had. 'Well, suppose you lived on the opposite side from it, and one day the mist came down, and it grew so thick that you could not see the lighthouse on the other side; would you believe it was there?' 'Oh, yes,' she said, 'because I had seen it before.' And there is another thing would make you believe, I said, 'you would hear the shrill whistle coming from the lighthouse warning mariners of danger. In the same way you should believe that the Lord is still near you; that He has not forgotten you, although a cloud has come in between you and God; if you will but listen, you will hear His voice speaking to you; the mist will soon roll away if you will look right at Him with the eye of faith.' She did look, and beheld Jesus as reality to her as ever."

A Child's Life Saved through Prayer.—Mr. J. W. Forbes remarked: "About a week ago a woman came to me at the close of one of our meetings and asked me to come and see her baby, who she thought was dying. 'But,' she said, 'I would like you to come and pray for it.' 'Willingly,' I said, and went; but when I entered the house, and saw the little emaciated form of the child, with sunken cheeks and hollow eyes, I thought it had not many hours to live. The young mother's grief was fearful to witness, for it was her first and only child. She was but a few months a Christian, and this was a hard trial for her to bear. Seeing the agony of the poor mother, I turned to her, and said: 'Have you faith to believe that your child can be restored to you again?' Looking at me with the tears streaming down her face, she hesitated for a moment, and then replied: 'Oh, sir, I do believe it.' Her faith was strong, mine was very weak. But I said, 'Let us pray,' and all in the room knelt down in prayer, and I pleaded for that child's life. I felt that God would answer that prayer. With a few words of comfort to the mother I left the house. God has heard and answered that prayer; the little child, as far as we can see, is restored to life and health again, and a happy mother has returned thanks to God for its recovery."

The End of Maggie's Teasing.—At an Evangelistic meeting a lady lately said: "I once began a sewing class for the young women of a village in which I was residing, for the purpose of keeping their evenings employed. At first the attendance was small, but as time went on the class increased. There was one girl who was a great trouble to me; she came for the purpose of annoying me by teasing the others while they were at work. One night while I was engaged in reading to them she was very troublesome, talking continually to the girls who sat near her. I was unwilling to put her out, so laying down my book, I said, 'Maggie, I will give you time to talk if you will give me time read afterward.' She was rather taken by surprise at being thus addressed, and I expected see her leave the room; but she sat still without making any disturbance for the rest of the evening. I thought that that would be the last Maggie there; but, to my surprise, she came the following night and sat perfectly still, and when all the other girls had gone she kept her seat. 'Well, Maggie,' I said, 'do you want to speak to me?' 'Yes,' she replied; 'if you will let me come to your class I will never disturb you again.' I spoke to her long and earnestly, at that night she decided to give herself to Jesus and receive Him as her Saviour. Whatever Maggie did she did with all her might, and she became as great a power for good as she has been for evil."

THE TEMPLE IN THE MILLENNIUM

By Frank H. White.

The First and Second Temples Eclipsed
Ezekiel's Temple to be Actually Built—Return of the Shechinah Glory—No Ark in —Position of the Temple—The Name of City.

I HAVE long felt that the typical meaning many parts of the Tabernacle of Moses, and the Temple of Solomon, pertaining, as they do, to the future of Israel as a nation, will be better understood by that people in a coming day when the veil shall be uplifted from the hearts, and when, in unbroken unity, they shall worship Jehovah in the beauty of holiness and all that see them shall acknowledge that they are the seed the Lord hath blessed (Is. 61: 9). If this be so of the Tabernacle at Temple of old, how much more of the Temple of Ezekiel?

At the best, we must say, "Now we know part only." For the full understanding of the Scriptures we must wait till the day dawn, when the shadows shall have fled forever, and "we know even as we are known."

While there are many difficulties connected with a literal interpretation of Ezekiel's vision, difficulties which I believe will only vanish with its fulfilment, they are few indeed compared with those which belong to what may be called the spiritualizing theory of interpretation.

That we have symbolism in the temple Ezekiel is admitted. But are we on this point to deny

ITS LITERALNESS?

The tabernacle of Moses, the temple of Solomon abundant in symbols, but had they on this account no literal history? Were they mere ideographs? Can we think that when Ezekiel told to write or pattern the form in the sight of the people, it was not with a view to its ultimate material construction?

In seeking to determine the question of the fulfilment of Ezekiel's vision, we shall do well notice what is declared to be the

at the time of its fulfilment. And in doing so we shall, I think, be forced to the conclusion that it answers exactly to that which is elsewhere described as pertaining to millennial times. For example, in the latter part of thirty-ninth chapter of the prophecy, where we have the introduction, so to speak, to the visions of the chapters which follow, we read: "Therefore, thus saith the Lord, Now will I bring again the captivity of Jacob, and have mercy upon the whole house of Israel," etc., in chap. 43: 7. The vision is seen as relating to a time when "God will dwell in the midst of His people forever, and the house of Israel shall no more defile His holy name."

Further, it is seen to be the time of the

to the land. The visions of Ezekiel as described in the first part of his prophecy, which he saw from the banks of the river Chebar (chap. 1), contain a striking contrast to those which he beholds when brought into the land of Israel and set up on a "very high mountain." The most prominent feature in the first series of viions is the departure of the glory, the visible symbol of Jehovah's presence, first from off the cherubim to the threshold of the temple, where it fills both the house and court (Ezek. 10 : 3, 4).

From the threshold of the temple the glory ascends and stands above the cherubim (ver. 18). Finally, he beholds the glory leave the city and stand upon the Mount of Olives, that mount whence the Lord of glory ascended, and upon which His blessed feet shall again stand when He returns!

Before the departure of the glory the prophet is shown the abominations of Jerusalem, on account of which God had withdrawn from it His presence. The picture also given in the middle chapters of Ezekiel's prophecy of the state of the city and people at this time is fearful indeed.

By the same gate from whence the glory departed it is seen returning. "Afterward He brought me to the gate, even the gate that looketh toward the east, and behold the glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east, and His voice was like a noise of many waters, and the earth shined with His glory; and the glory of the Lord came into the house by the way of the gate whose prospect is toward the east" (Ezek. 43 : 1-4).

It has been truly said, "the solution of this usually thought intricate and difficult prophecy is the departure and

RETURN OF THE SHECHINAH.*

That Ezekiel's temple receives the returning glory, proves its futurity. (The second temple had no Shechinah.) Moreover, this determines the time of its erection. The return of the glory is inseparable from the return of Him who is Himself the "Glory of His people Israel," and in whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. The destruction of Solomon's temple followed the departure of the Shechinah. The destruction of both city and temple followed the withdrawal of the glory in the person of the Lord Jesus. Answering to the return of the glory as seen in Ezekiel's later vision, Christ will come again from heaven in like manner as He went away, and as King of Israel reign over a repentant, restored nation; a people "all righteous," who shall no more defile His name with their abominations.

No mention is made of the Ark of the Covenant in Ezekiel's temple. The type is wanting; the Antitype supplies its place. Jehovah Jesus dwells in the midst of His people—as the symbol of His presence. A full display of His Divine glory is ever before them. "And it shall come to pass when ye be multiplied and increased in the land in those days, saith the Lord, they shall say no more, The ark of the covenant of the Lord; neither shall it come to mind; neither shall they remember it; neither shall they visit [miss] it; neither shall that [the ark] be done or made any more" (Jer. 3 : 16).

No veil is spoken of, nor any day of atonement; neither is any candle-stick or lamp-stand mentioned in Ezekiel's temple. The Lord Himself will be the light thereof. Israel's "true light" will then have come, and the glory of the Lord have "risen" upon His people.

Perhaps the most remarkable fact about the temple, as seen by Ezekiel, is

ITS POSITION.

It is not in the city or its suburbs, but in that portion of the oblation (or that part of the land allotted to sacred purposes) called "Most Holy." The entire oblation is about fifty miles square. "All the oblation shall be five and twenty thousand reeds. Ye shall offer the holy oblation four-square, with [including] the possession of the city" (Ezek. 48 : 20; 45 : 1).*

This is further divided into three portions, to each of which is ascribed a different degree of sacredness. The northern or upper division, which is called the "most holy oblation," is set apart for the priests, the sons of Zadoc. "The priests, the ministers of the sanctuary, who shall come near to minister unto the Lord; and it shall be a place for their houses, and an holy place for the sanctuary; and the sanctuary of the Lord [the temple] shall be in the midst thereof" (Ezek. 45 : 4; 48 : 10). The middle portion of the oblation is set apart for the Levites. This is called the "holy oblation." It was of the same dimensions as the priests' portion—viz., twenty-five thousand reeds, or about fifty miles in length, west to east, and ten thousand reeds, or twenty miles in breadth, north and south. The lower or southern part of the oblation, a strip of twenty-five thousand reeds, or about fifty miles in length, east and west, and five thousand reeds, or about ten miles in breadth, north and south, is thus described: "And the five thousand, that are left in the breadth over against the five and twenty thousand, shall be a profane [or common] place [i.e. not strictly sacred to priests] for the city and its suburbs, and the city shall be in the midst thereof" (chap. 48 : 15).

The city will have

named according to the twelve tribes of Israel, beyond which, extending for a little more than two hundred and fifty reeds, or a half mile, will be its suburbs. There are no cities of refuge in the millennial arrangement of the land of Israel. But the year of jubilee is to be observed (Ezek. 46 : 17). The name of the city from that day shall be "Jehovah Shammah." "The Lord is there." It will be "the city of the Great King, beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth" (Ps. 48 : 2). Seeing the establishment of the millennial city and temple in the land of Israel is inseparably bound up with the glory of Christ, with whom we are heirs, and joint heirs, the promise thereof should act upon our hearts to excite expectation and to animate hope. The glories of the millennial reign on earth form a part of the joy resulting from the travail of Christ's soul as Redeemer; they are the fruits of His sufferings, the reward of His pains. He who refused to take the kingdom of this world from Satan, as the price of His obedience, shall possess the sovereignty thereof as the reward of His obedience. That He shall reign, whose right it is, is our solace now in view of all the disorder and confusion which prevail in the earth.

Oh, let the glories of this prophecy teach us to fasten our thoughts more upon the sure things of God, as those who look for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God (Heb. 11 : 10), into which all the redeemed shall be ultimately gathered. The city which Abraham looked for and John saw coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. Ezekiel's city is an earthly one, and will pass away. This will be a heavenly city and eternal, and shall never pass away; while its chief glory will be that God is there. "God Almighty and the Lamb are the Temple of it" (Rev. 21 : 22). Just so, the chief glory of the millennial city, the earthly Jerusalem, will be as its name indicates, "Jehovah Shammah—the Lord is there."

THE WALL OF SNOW.

In a small cottage on the southern shores of the Baltic lived a pious widow named Bertha Schmidt; and a pretty picture in summer was that little dwelling, peering out from the embowering vines. Now and then it happened one could get a glimpse of the good old dame herself sitting in the open door—in her high-backed chair, and her Bible in her lap. The picture was one of quiet happiness. But it was not the aged widow herself who had gathered all the pleasant things about her cottage-home. This was the work of Karl, her only son, who lived with her, and supported her by working at the trade of a carpenter.

Karl was a noble fellow, and he had a heart as tender as it was strong; yet he was now twenty-eight, and was not married. He was indeed a good son. He had long been engaged to a worthy maiden, but he would not marry her until he felt he could do so without lessening the comforts which the infirmities of his mother made necessary. But Karl had prospered, under the blessing of heaven, and he was now about to marry his betrothed and bring her to their little cottage-home. It was winter, and the widow's house did not look very picturesque, divested of its summer drapery. But all was bright within; the narrow windows were full of Karl's choice flowers, transferred to neat boxes of his own handicraft. The Russian stove sent forth its genial glow, and the aged widow sat waiting, with a placid smile, the entrance of her children. And now the merry bridal group return from church, and the evening passes joyfully away.

But fearful was the change which morning brought. A hostile army was approaching the city of Stralsund, and might be looked for at any hour. In every house there was gloom—in every heart fear and trembling. The day passed away in dreadful suspense, and night closed in over the still watching, praying, fasting city. As night deepened there came on a terrific storm of snow and wind, which made the scene still more desolate and fearful. But how is it within the widow's cottage? Karl had for a while busied himself with barricading the doors and windows, so as to offer some obstruction to the rude soldiery, and had done the best he could to defend his mother and his bride. Then he sank down into gloomy silence, while his young wife sat by him pale and trembling; but the aged widow sat with her eyes fastened upon her book, and seemed lost to all around her. At length she raised her eyes, and a bright smile beamed upon her countenance, as she repeated these lines:

"Round us a wall our God shall rear,
And our proud foes shall quake with fear!"

"What! dear mother," replied Karl, "is your faith as strong as that? Do you really expect God will build a wall round our poor hut, strong and high enough to keep out an army? I wish I could believe it till the hour comes; it is terrible to wait in this state of mind."

"Has not my son read," replied the mother, "that not a sparrow falls to the ground without our Father? that faith has stopped the mouths of lions, and turned aside the edge of the sword?"

Karl made no reply, and the little family again sank into a sad silence. Just at midnight there was a lull in the storm, and they heard the great clock striking the hour of twelve. At the same moment the faint sound of martial music caught their watchful ears in the opposite direction; the fatal time had come. The little family drew closer together, and as the aged mother returned the pressure of her son's hand, she again repeated:

"Round us a wall our Lord shall rear,
And our proud foes shall quail with fear!"

The music drew nearer, mingled with a confused sound of trampling and shouting. Soon shrieks were heard; the crackling of flames, and the crash of falling houses, told them that the work of plunder and destruction was going on. But no hostile foot invaded the widow's dwelling; it stood quiet and unharmed amid the uproar, as if angels were encamping round it. At length the tumult died away—the storm ceased—and a death-like silence fell upon the scene.

After waiting several hours, Karl ventured to uncloset a shutter; but the light came dimly through the snow, which was heaped to the very top of the window. He cautiously opened the door, but here again a wall of snow met his view, and he was obliged to cut his way into the open air. When he had done this he stood silent with astonishment and awe at the sight before him. Huge drifts of snow had completely encircled the cottage, and made it in appearance a mere mound of snow! They had indeed been hidden by "a wall," and had dwelt safely in the pavilion of the Most High. Karl led his aged mother out to behold her "wall of faith." The pious widow wept as she looked up to heaven, and gently exclaimed—"Faithful is He who hath promised; He also hath done it."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Danger of a National Financial Crisis becomes more ominous as each Treasury statement is issued. The gold which the Government is bound to keep to redeem its obligations is steadily dwindling, and now amounts to less than half of its reserve. On February 1st it had nominally a reserve amounting to forty per cent on its outstanding liabilities. Over twenty-one per cent, however, was in silver. The coinage of 2,382,200 silver dollars in January, for which gold was paid, tended to produce this critical position, and the drain will continue. The time cannot be far distant when the Government will have to pay in silver, and gold will be at a premium.

How long this impending crisis can be averted depends on how soon the coinage of the silver dollar is suspended. The public debt was reduced during January by $9,420,046.

President Arthur Sent a Message to the House, on Tuesday, February 3d, calling attention to the gift, by Mrs. Grant, through the generosity of Mr. Vanderbilt, of the swords and civil and military testimonials to the nation in perpetual trust. The President asks for full and signal recognition of the gift on behalf of the nation at the hands of its representatives, and that they accept the trust and provide for its safe custody. The President in the same message delicately referred to the pending legislation for the benefit of General Grant, and urged the passage of the Senate bill which would relieve him from the embarrassment in which he would be placed by the passage of the bill favored by the House.

The Action of the House on the Dynamite explosions in England appears likely to be indefinitely postponed. On February 2d, Mr. Perry Belmont moved a resolution requesting the Secretary of State to forthwith inform the House whether any representations have been, either formally or informally, made to this Government by the British Government, growing out of the use of dynamite in London. He is asked, if such representations have been made in writing, to transmit to the House complete copies of all communications that have passed between the two Governments on the subject, but if the representations or communications have been verbal, then a statement of their tenor and purport. By the time the required information is given, the House will probably discover that it has no time left in which to deal with the subject.

New Charges Against General Swaim were preferred by the Quarter-master at Washington, on February 6th. The Judge-Advocate-General is charged with defrauding the Government of forage and straw, issued to him to be used by horses which he pretended to own, and then sold by him for his own benefit. The Depot Quarter-master supplied the forage on Swaim's requisitions. The decision of the court, which has been for a long time investigating the accusations of fraud brought against General Swaim, has not been announced, but it has been placed in the hands of the President, and it is said to be in at least one count adverse to the accused.

Apprehensions of a Dangerous Riot were prevalent in Pittsburg, Pa., last week. Large numbers of the workmen in the city are unemployed, and there have also drifted into the city unemployed miners from the Monongahela Valley, coke-workers from the Connellsville district, and iron-workers from all parts of the State. The men are discontented, and wild threats of violence are freely uttered. These would not have been heeded had it not been that Most and four other well-known anarchists have been observed working among the men; also that cases containing fifteen hundred guns and revolvers arrived in the city and were quietly distributed. Manufacturers hope that there will be no outbreak, but they admit that any little dispute which at another time might be amicably adjusted would, if it occurred now, precipitate riots worse than those of 1877.

The Shooting of O'Donovan Rossa on Monday, February 2d, caused much excitement on both sides the Atlantic. The crime was committed by an English lady named Yseult Dudley, whose antecedents prove that she is of unsound mind. She wrote to O'Donovan Rossa offering to contribute money to the dynamite fund, and asking him to come to her in the Stewart Building, where she was waiting in a telegraph office. They went out into the street and Mrs. Dudley stepped behind Rossa and shot him in the back. He fell to the ground, and Mrs. Dudley fired the other barrels of her revolver at him as he lay. None of the bullets except the first struck him. The woman was arrested, and Rossa was taken to a hospital, where it was found he was not dangerously hurt, and he is now recovering. Mrs. Dudley is evidently a dangerous maniac who ought to be confined in a lunatic asylum. We are sorry to notice in the newspapers, and in private conversation, a generally expressed regret that she did not succeed in killing Rossa. Such comments are wicked and pernicious. They directly encourage lawless people to commit crime. Rossa is not entitled to sympathy, as he openly defends acts like that of Mrs. Dudley, and advocates, if he does not plan, cowardly murders; but, whatever he may have done, and whatever punishment he may deserve, his assassination would be an outrage on the law. It ought to be clearly understood that "removers" of the Guiteau type, who seek to serve society by killing people, will not be tolerated in the United States. Mrs. Dudley's act was a crime for which she ought to be punished, unless she is mentally irresponsible.

James G. Cunningham, the Man Arrested in the Tower of London, and charged with complicity in the dynamite explosions, has been examined in the police court. His record while in England was produced, and it increased the prejudice against him. The Government prosecutor stated that Cunningham arrived in Liverpool from the United States last November. He was traced to London, where he resided in the Eastern District. He was then in possession of a large brown trunk, which since the explosions has mysteriously disappeared. Previous to the outrage in the Tower he moved to new lodgings and changed his name. Persons connected with the Tower observed him loitering about the entrance to the building, and identified him as having been among the usual throng of visitors a few days before the explosions. When he was arrested he prevaricated, gave a fictitious address and a false account of himself. In his lodgings a dynamite was found which was like those used in other dynamite explosions. The public prosecutor also stated that the evidence he had obtained led him to expect that he would be able to substantiate a charge of high treason against the prisoner, which is a capital offence. The van in which the man was taken to court was strongly guarded, and elaborate precautions were taken to prevent a rescue.

Khartoum has Fallen into the Hands of the Mahdi. On Thursday, February 6th, General Wolseley telegraphed that Colonel Wilson, who after General Stewart was wounded, assumed command of the British force at Gubat, attempted to communicate with General Gordon on January 28th. The expedition went by the Nile, and when opposite Khartoum were surprised to find the guns from the city open fire upon them. They could see that Khartoum was in possession of the Mahdi's army, and that the palace which General Gordon occupied was gutted. They were unable to learn what had become of General Gordon. They ascertained, however, that the Mahdi captured the city two days before their arrival. It is reported that it was taken by treachery. Colonel Wilson returned to the Gubat camp, which he reached with difficulty, his boats having been wrecked. General Stewart's camp is now surrounded by the Mahdi's troops, and is in imminent peril. His rescue will be a work of much difficulty. In England extreme anxiety prevails. The people are indignant against the Government which neglected to send an expedition for Gordon's rescue until the difficulties were almost insurmountable, and when the expedition was dispatched caused a fatal delay by neglect of the commissariat department. That assistance should have reached Gordon two days too late has caused intense chagrin. Mr. Gladstone is denounced in strong terms, and it is predicted that if General Gordon is found to have been killed, Mr. Gladstone and his Cabinet will be driven ignominiously from office.

A Rising of the whole Moslem World is believed to be imminent as the consequence of the Mahdi's triumph over the British. The London correspondent of the New York Times reports ominous observations recently made by Sir Robert Morier, who was for a long time British Minister at Madrid. A fortnight ago on hearing the news from Abu Klea and Gubat, Sir Robert said: "You don't feel as I do the vast importance of these victories. Having lived for a long time in Spain, I know Morocco pretty well. Two years ago the controlling party there was all ready to join the Mahdi's movement. The victory of Tel el Kebir alone stopped them, and prevented a general uprising of Islam all over the north of Africa. A week ago we were again in the same position as before Tel el Kebir, and the whole Moslem world was on fire with determination to leap on us if we stumbled. These victories, and the consequent relief of General Gordon, come none too soon, but they will suffice again to stop the movement." The other day the gentleman who related this conversation met Sir Robert Morier after the Khartoum news had been received, and all he said was: "I fear 'tis the beginning of the end."

Renewed Oppression of the Poles is Reported by a Polish prince through the columns of the New York Herald. A law was promulgated some months ago forbidding them to own land, and they were consequently obliged to sell at ruinous prices to the Russians, the object being to Russinize the country. When the Russians obtained the estates they were too ignorant to manage them; they therefore leased them to Polish tenants, who held them at rental until last month. A new order has now been issued forbidding the Poles to occupy or manage the estates. No cause is assigned for this new act of tyranny, which will cause extensive distress.

A Disastrous Railroad Collision Caused a Fire on Saturday which has destroyed a large part of the city of New Brunswick, N. J. A special freight train carrying a large quantity of oil, and having several cars in which were twenty-two valuable horses, was being backed to a siding to allow the regular fast freight train to pass. By some oversight, either through a man not having been sent back with a red lantern to warn the regular train, or by a mistake in the signals, the second train drove through at full speed and collided with the forward train. Instantly, the oil was ignited and poured in a blazing stream through the city, setting fire to factories, warehouses and private dwellings. Help was requested from Trenton and Elizabeth, which was promptly rendered. It was too late to save the factories, but it was hoped that the more distant parts of the city might be saved.

Mr. Joseph Cook's Recent Visit to Utah has impressed him with the formidable power and increasing influence of the Mormon Church. In the prelude to his recent lecture he thus stated the convictions he had formed: "Political dictation throughout Utah is universal where national authority is not feared. Danger from this source is apprehended even in Oregon. The work of schools and churches is efficient, but not sufficient. Persecution exists and would be more common if it were more safe. A school teacher has heard bullets whistle about her head three times. Some of these teachers take their lives in their hands every day. The power of the leaders may be declining at Salt Lake and some other places, but the doctrine of blood atonement is still held. The leaders will fight sooner than reform, for some of them have great wealth. It is a land speculation to a great extent. The young people do not know the meaning of morality. Recruiting in other lands should be discouraged by all the power which the Church and State in this land can exert upon those of other lands, and recruits should not be permitted to land."

Mr. Moody Held Conferences at New Brunswick, N. J., last week, and devoted one day to the students at Rutgers College, where a revival of religious life is in progress. All the meetings were crowded to excess, and it was found necessary to have the admissions by ticket and to hold the meetings in the large Opera House. Mr. Moody was invited by the Committee of City Missions, of which Dr. Gates, the President of Rutgers, is Chairman. The ministers of all the churches joined in the invitation and co-operated in the work. While Mr. Moody was in Richmond, Va., he invited ten gentlemen to dine with him, and before going to dinner frankly told them that he wanted them to erect a much-needed building for the Y. M. C. A. They at once subscribed $15,500 for the purpose, and the balance will be raised.

Mr. Thomas Harrison's Meetings in Chicago are said to have been widely blessed. One report says that in a little more than two weeks over two hundred and fifty have professed conversion. Every member of the church appears to be aroused, and the people have a mind to work. A large number of young men and women were converted.

The Reading of the Bible in the Common schools has been declared constitutional in Iowa. The Supreme Court of that State recently gave judgment on a case submitted to it, deciding that the reading of the Bible and singing of sacred songs in common schools are not prohibited by the clause in the constitution which forbids the levying of taxes for the support of any place of worship.

A Revival Throughout Central New York has followed the Week of Prayer. At Auburn, especially, there has been manifest tokens of blessing. Numerous additions have also been made to the churches at Seneca Falls, Geneva, Rome, and a few other places on the east. Many small towns adjoining these larger ones, and lying along the Central Road, have also been greatly blessed, as Fairville, Rose, Ontario, Clyde, In Canandaigua, as at Auburn, the Baptist, Methodist, Congregational, and Presbyterian churches began Union Meetings with the Week of Prayer, which are still in progress—the pastors taking their turns in preaching. So far, about two hundred have given hopeful evidence of conversion, and there is no abatement of interest or attendance.

A Dynamite Outrage was Perpetrated in New York early in the morning of February 1st. Shortly after midnight an explosion was heard in Grand Street which shook the whole neighborhood. A policeman ran to the spot from which the noise proceeded and found that the windows of a large dry-goods store had been smashed to atoms and the stores on the other side the street were much injured. An explosive compound supposed to be dynamite had been placed on the sidewalk close to the windows and exploded. No clue to the guilty parties has yet been obtained, but the proprietors of the store think that the motive for the act had its origin in some trouble they have recently had with their employes. The outrage was evidently done to malice rather than a spirit of mischief. Its chief significance to the public consists in the fact that it is another evidence of the dangers menacing society. The spirit of lawlessness, which is a predicted characteristic of the last days of this dispensation, is rapidly growing, and the number of those who "despise government," is largely increasing (II Pet. 2:10).

Substantial Damages were Awarded last week by a jury in the Court of Common Pleas in New York, to a lady who was lamed by falling into a hole in the pavement in Fourteenth Street. The hole was made in front of a house, the occupier of which used it for getting in his coals. A man was shovelling coal at the time of the accident, but the lady was looking another way and did not see the open hole. The judge ruled that the lady was not guilty of negligence, as she was not bound to see that there was no yawning coal-hole in front of her. The judge was right, but pedestrians will act wisely in looking to their steps. Even the damages awarded in this case will be poor compensation for the injuries the plaintiff sustained. Especially in a metaphorical sense is circumspection necessary. In the paths of life Satan has spread his pitfalls expressly to cause the unwary to fall (Prov. 4:25-27).

A Frozen Man was Saved by a Dog on Staten Island last week. A mounted policeman named O'Toole, who is always accompanied on his rounds by a Newfoundland dog, was riding through the outlying districts of Stapleton on Wednesday, when the dog darted up a dark lane and began barking loudly. The officer thought nothing of the dog's action until he had gone some distance and heard the dog still barking. He turned back, and went to see what detained the animal. A few rods away the dog was found beside a prostrate man, who had been overcome by the extreme cold. The man was helped to a house near by, and warmed. He would undoubtedly have been frozen to death but for the intelligence of the dog. He was utterly powerless to help himself. There are everywhere numbers of men who are spiritually in the same helpless condition; but too many Christians fail to do as the dog did; they pass them by without concern, instead of trying to save them (Heb. 6:2).

No Return Trips were Permitted on a Line in Oregon during the snow blockade, if credit may be given to a statement made by one of the passengers, and published in the Tacoma News. The passenger, a lady who had her two children with her, says that she and the children were in the blockade eleven days, though there were others who were there much longer. The snow was from twenty to eighty feet deep, and every day the west-bound train brought new passengers to the point of the blockade until about two hundred were gathered. The trains on arriving landed the passengers, and went back empty, allowing no one to return, though a number wanted to do so, offering $100 for the privilege;

but the train men were acting under orders and would not allow it. Nor were they allowed to write or telegraph to any one. One of the railroad men said "it would hurt the road." In every other respect they did all they could for the passengers. They built a large dining-room, and made them quite comfortable. It is very probable that the railroad man was right in his opinion. If the passengers had been allowed to return or to telegraph home, the communication would have "hurt the road," as no one would care to run into such misfortune. The answer to Dives in our Lord's parable, however, implied that in a far more terrible case such warning would have done no good (Luke 16:27-31).

A Lover's Argument is Described in the reminiscences of Peleg Johnson, by the Hon. A. Payne. It seems that Mr. Johnson, soon after the death of his first wife, made an offer of marriage to another lady. She said to him: "Mr. Johnson, my friends think that it is not proper for me to receive your attentions so soon after the death of your wife." To this suggestion he replied: "I have been a constable for more than thirty years, and during that time I have been in constant attendance upon the courts of this State, and I think I ought to know something about law, and I can tell you that when a woman has been dead and buried four months she is just as dead in the eye of the law as if she had been dead a year." The good lady was convinced by the argument, though it affected the question of legality and not the objection as to propriety, which was the one she had made. The principle, however, laid down by the lover was sound, and it has its spiritual application. Young Christians are often kept back from the full light by their inability to realize it (Rom. 7:6).

Rattlesnake Poison is Apparently to take its place in the pharmacopoeia. A druggist in the course of an interview with a reporter, said: "A well-stocked drug-store must be supplied with a great variety of medicines now if its proprietor fills prescriptions for all schools. One day we had a call from a homoeopathic physician for rattlesnake virus. The doctor had been called in to see a patient who was soon to die of cancer, and who had taken ordinary opiates until they seemed to have but little effect. We did not have the medicine, but the next time I saw the doctor he said that he had obtained it, and that twenty minutes after taking a very low dilution of the virus the sufferer sank into a sweet sleep." This effect is not peculiar to the rattlesnake virus; other poisons, which in larger potions cause death, will, when administered in minute and diluted doses, act as an anodyne. The discovery has been of great benefit to physical sufferers, but it has done much harm in spiritual matters. The agonized soul of the awakened sinner has often been lulled to rest by a spiritual anodyne and has drunk more deeply to its own eternal destruction (Jer. 51:39).

An Amusing Evidence of Ignorance was given recently by a sexton's wife. Her husband had charge of a little country church in western Pennsylvania. During the recent cold snap he was ill, and on Saturday was unable to prepare the church for the next day's services. His wife undertook the task, and, impressed with her husband's instructions that the temperature of the building should reach a certain degree upon the thermometer, she plied the furnace to that end. When the mercury touched the mark, to relieve her husband's anxiety, the simple woman carried the instrument to their home, distant about a quarter of a mile, and proudly exhibited the evidence of her faithfulness. She did not know, or had forgotten, that in the outer air the mercury would so fall that her husband could not learn from it the temperature of the church. Unhappily, those who regard the conduct of members of churches as an indication of the spiritual temperature of the church often notice a similar variation. But Christian life is at a low ebb when its fervor is reduced by contact with the atmosphere of the world (Titus 3:8).

THE ASCENSION AND THE SECOND ADVENT PRACTICALLY CONSIDERED. A Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And while they looked steadfastly toward heaven as he went up, behold, two men stood by them in white apparel; which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven."—ACTS I : 10, 11.

The Golden Chain of Events—The Fifth Link—The Four Chief Events Pointing to the Second Advent—The Ascension—The Amazed Disciples—God's Messengers to them—I. A Gentle Chiding—Difference between Looking and Gazing—A Mother's Touching Action—A Swinish Religion—People who Need the Chiding—II. A Cheering Description—The Same Jesus—III. A Practical Truth—Reasons for Work—Jesus is Coming—Not a Spiritual Coming—A Woman's Unnecessary Apology.

FOUR great events shine out brightly in our Saviour's story. All Christian minds delight to dwell upon His birth, His death, His resurrection, and His ascension. These make four rounds in that ladder of light, the foot of which is upon the earth, but the top whereof reacheth to heaven. We could not afford to dispense with any one of those four events, nor to make it profitable for us to forget, or to under-estimate the value of any one of them.

Each one of those four events points to another, and they all lead up to it:

THE FIFTH LINK

in the golden chain is our Lord's second and most glorious advent. Nothing is mentioned between His ascent and His descent. True, a rich history comes between; but it lies in a valley between two stupendous mountains; we step from alp to alp as we journey in meditation from the ascension to the second advent. I want you, therefore, as in contemplation you pass with joyful footsteps over these four grand events, as your faith leaps from His birth to His death, and from His resurrection to His ascension, to be looking forward, and even hastening unto this crowning fact of our Lord's history; for ere long He shall so come in like manner as He was seen go up into heaven.

This morning, in our meditation, we will start from and if I had sufficient imagination I should like to picture our Lord and the eleven walking up the side of Olivet, communing as they went—a happy company, with a solemn awe upon them, but with an intense joy in having fellowship with each other. Each disciple was glad to think that His dear Lord and Master who had been crucified was now among them, not only alive, but surrounded with a mysterious safety and glory which none could disturb. The enemy was as still as a stone; not a dog moved his tongue; His bitterest foes made no sign during the days of our Lord's after-life below.

The company moved onward peacefully toward Bethany—Bethany which they all knew and loved. But they have come to a standstill, having reached the brow of the hill. The Saviour stands conspicuously in the centre of the group, and, following upon most instructive discourse, He pronounces a blessing upon them. He lifts His pierced hands, and while He is lifting them and is pronouncing words of love, He begins to rise from the earth. He has risen above them all to their astonishment! In a moment He has passed beyond the olives, which seem with their silvery sheen to be lit up by His milder radiance. While the disciples are looking, the Lord has ascended into mid-air, and speedily He has risen to the regions of the clouds. They stand spell-bound with astonishment, and suddenly a bright cloud, like a chariot of God, bears Him away. That cloud conceals Him from mortal gaze. Though we have known Christ after the flesh, now after the flesh know we Him no more. They are riveted to the spot, very naturally so; they linger long in the place, they stand with streaming eyes, wonder-struck, still looking upward.

Their lengthened gaze needed to be interrupted, and, therefore, two shining ones, such as aforetime met the women at the sepulchre, are sent to them. These appear in human form that they may not alarm them, and in white raiment as if to remind them that all was bright and joyous; and these white-robed ministers stood with them as if they would willingly join their company. As no one of the eleven would break silence, the men in white raiment commenced the discourse. Addressing them in the usual celestial style, they asked a question which contained its own answer, and then went on to tell their message. As they had once said to the women, "Why seek ye the living among the dead? He is not here, but is risen;" so did they now say, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven."

Do you not see them going down the side of Olivet, taking that Sabbath-day's journey into the cruel and wicked city without a thought of fear; having no dread of the bloodthirsty crew who slew their Lord, but happy in the memory of their Lord's exaltation and in the expectation of a wonderful display of His power. They held fellowship of the most delightful kind with one another, and anon entered into the upper room, where in protracted prayer and communion they waited for the promise of the Father. You see I have no imagination; I have barely mentioned the incidents in the simplest language. Yet try and realize the scene, for it will be helpful so to do, since our Lord Jesus is to come in like manner as the disciples saw Him go up into heaven.

I. First, then, here is

A GENTLE CHIDING.

It is not sharply uttered by men dressed in black who use harsh speech, and upbraid the servants of God severely for what was rather a mistake than a fault. No; the language is strengthening, yet tender; the fashion of a question allows them rather to reprove themselves than to be reprovéd; and the tone is that of brotherly love and affectionate concern.

Notice, that what these saintly men were doing seems at first sight to be very right. Methinks, if Jesus were among us now we would fix our eyes upon Him, and never withdraw them. The truth is, there was nothing wrong in their looking up into heaven; but they went a little further than looking; they stood "gazing." A little excess in right may be faulty. It may be wise to look, but foolish to gaze. Look, ay, look steadfastly and intently; be your posture that of one "looking unto Jesus," always throughout life. But there is a gazing which is not commendable, when the look becomes not that of reverent worship, but of an overweening curiosity; when there mingles with the desire to know what should be known, a prying into that which it is for God's glory to conceal. Thus certain things that you and I may do may appear right, and yet we may need to be chidden out of them into something better; they may be right in themselves, but not appropriate for the occasion, nor seasonable, nor expedient. They may be right up to a point, and then may touch the boundary of excess. A steadfast gaze into heaven may be to a devout soul a high order of worship, but if this filled up much of our working time it might become the idlest form of folly.

Yet I cannot help adding that it was very natural. I do not wonder that the whole eleven stood gazing up, for if I had been there I am sure I should have done the same. I think I should have stood looking to the very place where His cloudy chariot had been. I know it would be idle to continue so to do, but our hearts often urge us on to acts which we could not justify logically. Hearts are not to be argued with. Sometimes you stand by a grave where one is buried whom you dearly loved; you go there often to weep. You cannot help it, the place is precious to you; yet you could not prove that you do any good by your visits, perhaps you even injure yourself thereby, and deserve to be gently chidden with the question, "why?" It may be the most natural thing in the world, and yet it may not be a wise thing. The Lord allows us to do that which is innocently natural, but He will not have us carry it too far; for then it might foster an evil nature. Hence He sends an interrupting messenger.

I remember well seeing

whose only son was emigrating to a distant colony. I stood in the station, and I noticed her many tears and her frequent embraces of her boy; but the train came up and he entered the carriage. After the train had passed beyond the station, she was foolish enough to break away from friends who sought to detain her; she ran along the platform, leaped down upon the railroad, and pursued the flying train. It was natural, but it had better been left undone. What was the use of it? We had better abstain from acts which serve no practical purpose; for in this life we have neither time nor strength to waste in fruitless action. The disciples would be wise to cease gazing, for nobody would be benefited by it, and they would not themselves be blessed. What is the use of gazing when there is nothing to see? Well, then, did the angels ask, "Why stand ye gazing up into heaven?"

Here is the practical point for us: What they did we are very apt to imitate. "Oh," say you, "I shall never stand gazing up into heaven!" I am not sure of that. Some Christians are very curious, but not obedient. Plain precepts are neglected, but difficult problems they seek to solve. I remember one who used always to be dwelling upon the vials and seals and trumpets. He was great at apocalyptic symbols; but he had seven children, and he had no family prayer. If he had left the vials and trumpets and minded his boys and girls, it would have been a deal better.

I have known men marvellously great upon Daniel, and specially instructed in Ezekiel, but singularly forgetful of the twentieth of Exodus, and not very clear upon Romans the eighth. I do not speak with any blame of such folks for studying Daniel and Ezekiel, but quite the reverse; yet I wish they had been more zealous for the conversion of the sinners in their neighborhoods, and more careful to assist the poor saints. I admit the value of the study of the feet of the image in Nebuchadnezzar's vision, and the importance of knowing the kingdoms which make up the ten toes, but I do not see the propriety of allowing such studies to overlay the commonplaces of practical godliness.

Others are contemplative but not active—much given to the study of Scripture and to meditation thereon, but not zealous for good works. When a man's religion all lies in his saving his own self, and in enjoying holy things for his own self, there is, a disease upon him. When his judgment of a sermon is based upon the one question, "Did it feed me?" it is a swinish judgment. There is such a thing as getting in which you are yourself first, yourself second, yourself third, yourself to the utmost end. Did Jesus ever think or speak in that fashion? Contemplation of Christ Himself may be so carried out as to lead you away from Christ; the recluse meditates on Jesus, but he is as unlike the busy, self-denying Jesus as well can be. Meditation unattended with active service in the spreading of the Gospel among men, well deserves the rebuke of the angel, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven?"

Moreover, some are careful and anxious and deliriously impatient for some marvellous interposition. We get at times into a sad state of mind, because we do not see the kingdom of Christ advancing as we desire. I suppose it is with you as it is with me—I begin to fret, and I am deeply troubled, and I feel that there is good reason that I should be, for truth is fallen in the streets, and the days of blasphemy and rebuke are upon us. Then we pine; for the Master is away, and we cry, "When will He be back again? Oh, why are His chariots so long in coming? Why tarries He through the ages?"

In certain cases this uneasiness has drawn to itself a wrong expectation of immediate wonders, and an intense desire for sign-seeing. Ah me, what fanaticisms come of this! In America years ago, one came forward who declared that on such a day the Lord would come, and he led a great company to believe his crazy predictions. Many took their horses and fodder for two or three days, and went out into the woods, expecting to be all the more likely to see all that was to be seen when once away from the crowded city. All over the States there were people who had made ascension-dresses in which to soar into the air in proper costume. They waited, and they waited, and I am sure that no text could have been more appropriate for them than this, "Ye men of America, why stand ye here gazing up into heaven?" Nothing came of it; and yet there are thousands in England and America who only need a fanatical leader, and they would run into the like folly. The desire to know the times and seasons is a craze with many poor bodies whose insanity runs in that particular groove.

II. Secondly, I want you to notice

THE CHEERING DESCRIPTION

which these bright spirits give concerning our Lord. They describe Him thus—"This same Jesus." I appreciate the description the more because it came from those who knew Him. "He was seen of angels," they had watched Him all His life long, and they knew Him, and when they, having just seen Him rise to His Father and His God, said of Him, "This same Jesus," then I know by an infallible testimony that He was the same, and that He is the same. Jesus is gone, but He still exists. He has left us, but He is not dead; He has not dissolved into nothing like the mist of the morning. "This same Jesus" is gone up unto His Father's throne, and He is there to-day as certainly as He once stood at Pilate's bar. Jesus lives; mind that you live also. Do not loiter as if you had nothing at all to do, or as if the kingdom of God had come to an end because Jesus is gone from the earth, as to His bodily presence. It is not all over; He still lives, and He has given you a work to do till He comes. Therefore, go and do it.

"This same Jesus"—I love that word, for "Jesus" means a Saviour. Oh, ye anxious sinners here present, the name of Him who has gone up into His glory is full of invitation to you! Will you not come to "this same Jesus"? This is He who opened the eyes of the blind and brought forth the prisoners out of the prison-house. He is doing the same thing to-day. Oh, that your eyes may see His light!

"This same Jesus." On the back of that sweet title came this question, "Why stand ye here gazing into heaven?" They might have said, "We stay here because we do not know where to go. Our Master is gone." But oh, it is the same Jesus, and He is coming again, so go down to Jerusalem and get to work directly. Do not worry yourselves; no grave accident has occurred; it is not a disaster that Christ has gone, but an advance in His work. Despisers tell us nowadays, "Your cause is done for! Christianity is spun out! Your divine Christ is gone; we have not seen a trace of His miracle-working hand, nor of that voice which no man could rival." Here is our answer: We are not standing gazing up into heaven, we are not paralyzed because Jesus is away. He lives, the great Redeemer lives; and though it is our delight to lift up our eyes because we expect His coming, it is equally our delight to turn our heavenly gazing into and to go down into the city, and there to tell that Jesus is risen, that men are to be saved by faith in Him, and that whosoever believeth in Him shall have everlasting life. We are not defeated, far from it; His ascension is not a retreat, but an advance. His tarrying is not for want of power, but because of the abundance of His long-suffering. The victory is not questionable. All things work for it; all the hosts of God are mustering for the final charge. This same Jesus is mounting His white horse to lead forth the armies of heaven, conquering and to conquer.

III. Our third point is this,

THE GREAT PRACTICAL TRUTH.

This truth is not one that is to keep us gazing into heaven, but one that is to make each of us go to His house to render earnest service. What is it? Why, first, that Jesus is gone into heaven. Jesus is gone! Jesus is gone! It sounds like a knell. Jesus is taken up from you into heaven!—that sounds like a marriage peal. He is gone, but He is gone up to the hills whence He can survey the battle; up to the throne, from which He can send us succor. I see every reason for going down into the world and getting to work, for He is gone up into heaven and all power is given unto Him in heaven and in earth. Is not that a good argument—"Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost"? Jesus will come again. That is another reason for girding our loins, because it is clear that He has not quitted the fight, nor deserted the field of battle. Our great Captain is still heading the conflict; He has ridden into another part of the field, but He will be back again, perhaps in the twinkling of an eye.

Then, moreover, we are told in the text—and this is a reason why we should get to our work—that He is coming in like manner as He departed. Certain of the commentators do not seem to understand English at all. "He which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as you have seen Him go into heaven"—this, they say, relates to His spiritual coming at Pentecost. Give anybody a grain of sense, and do they not see that a spiritual coming is not a coming in the same manner in which He went up into heaven? There is an analogy, but certainly not a likeness between the two things. Our Lord was taken up; they could see Him rise; He will come again, and "every eye shall see Him." He went up

NOT IN SPIRIT, BUT IN PERSON;

He will come down in person. "This same Jesus shall so come in like manner." He went up as a matter of fact; not in poetic figure and spiritual symbol, but as a matter of fact—"This same Jesus" literally went up. "This same Jesus" will literally come again. He will descend in clouds even as He went up in clouds; and "He shall stand at the latter day upon the earth" even as He stood aforetime. He went up to heaven unopposed; no high priests, nor scribes, nor Pharisees, nor even one of the rabble opposed His ascension; it were ridiculous to suppose that they could; and when He comes a second time none will stand against Him. Brethren, do not let anybody spiritualize away all this from you. Jesus is coming as a matter of fact, therefore go down to your sphere of service as a matter of fact. For this is what the men in white apparel meant—be ready to meet your coming Lord. What is to meet Jesus? If it is the same Jesus that went away from us who is coming, then let us be doing what He was doing before He went away. If it is the same Jesus that is coming we cannot possibly put ourselves into a posture of which He will better approve than by going about doing good. If you would meet Him with joy, serve Him with earnestness. If the Lord Jesus Christ were to come to-day I should like Him to find me at my studying, praying, or preaching. Would you not like him to find you in your Sunday-school, in your class, or out there at the corner of the street preaching, or doing whatever you have the privilege of doing in His name? Would you meet your Lord in idleness? Do not think of it.

I called one day on one of our members, and she was whitening the front steps. She got up all in confusion; she said, "Oh dear, sir, I did not know you were coming to-day, or I would have been ready." I replied, "Dear friend, you could not be in better trim than you are; you are doing your duty like a good housewife, and may God bless you." She had no money to spare for a servant, and she was doing her duty by keeping the home tidy; I thought she looked more beautiful with her plaid beside her than if she had been dressed according to the latest fashion. I said to her, "When the Lord Jesus Christ comes suddenly, I hope He will find me doing as you were doing—namely, fulfilling the duty of the hour." I want you all to get to your pails without being ashamed of them. Serve the Lord in some way or other; serve Him always; serve Him intensely; serve Him more and more.

Go to-morrow and serve the Lord at the counter, or in the work-shop, or in the field. Go and serve the Lord by helping the poor and the needy, the widow and the fatherless; serve Him by teaching the children, especially by endeavoring to train your own children. Go and hold a temperance meeting, and show the drunkard that there is hope for him in Christ, or go to the midnight meeting and let the fallen woman know that Jesus can restore her. Do what Jesus has given you the power to do, and then, ye men of Britain, ye will not stand gazing up into heaven, but you will wait upon the Lord in prayer, and you will receive the Spirit of God, and you will publish to all around the doctrine of "Believe and live." Then when He comes He will say to you, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." So may His grace enable us to do. Amen.

DR. W. B. CARPENTER, C.B., M.D.,

THE eminent physiologist whose portrait appears on the next page stands at the head of his profession. He is an acknowledged authority on all questions affecting the action of the various kinds of food on the human system. Like Dr. B. W. Richardson, he is a formidable opponent of the drinking customs and a valued friend of total abstinence.

Dr. Carpenter was born at Exeter, England, October 29th, 1813; he received his medical education in Bristol, London, and Edinburgh. In 1832 he visited the West Indies, where, after residing four months in the Island of St. Vincent, he went to Granada. On his return home he resumed his studies at Bristol, and in 1834 entered University College, London, and afterward became clinical clerk to Dr. (now Sir) Thomas Watson.

In 1835 he studied physiology under Dr. Alison and materia medica under Dr. Christison. In 1837, as President of the Royal Medical Society, he delivered the Centenary Commemorative Oration. Mr. Carpenter took his M.D. degree in Edinburgh in 1839. In 1871 he was elected President of the British Association, and when that body met in Edinburgh that year he received the honorary degree of LL.D. from its University, and was created a C.B. in 1875, and many other marks of distinction have been worthily bestowed upon him.

But it is as a temperance advocate, from the medical and scientific point of view, that he is best known in America. A few extracts from his most able works on the question—the "Use and Abuse of Alcoholic Liquors" and the "Physiology of Temperance"—will show how decided are his opinions. Speaking of the effects of alcohol on the healthy system, he says: "The experience of whole nations, previously to the introduction of alcoholic liquors among them, is equally in favor of the assertion, that prolonged and severe muscular exertion may be at least as well borne without their assistance as with it. Where, for example, shall we meet with greater power of endurance of toil than was displayed by the North American Indians in 'following a trail,' before their race became deteriorated by European vices?" Again he says: "To some the assertion that moral perversion which leads to criminal conduct among the diseases of the nervous system, induced by the action of alcohol, may at first sight appear an altogether untenable doctrine; yet a little consideration will show that it is perfectly consistent with what is universally admitted as to the primary effect of alcoholized blood upon the brain. For we have seen that its direct tendency is to weaken the controlling power of the will, while it augments the activity of the automatic or impulsive part of our nature."

Lotta's Study of the Scripture Quilt.

Dr. W. B. Carpenter, the Temperance Physiologist.

In May, 1879, in order to devote himself more closely to scientific research, he resigned the Registrarship of the London University, which he has held since 1856. The services he rendered to the University were fully valued by the Senate of the institution, who, with its graduate body, subscribed for a presentation portrait of the learned doctor, which now adorns the walls of the Senate Room of the University. He is now engaged on a biographical work relating to his scientific contemporaries, but in the midst of his mental labors he finds time to lecture upon popular subjects, and to co-operate with those who are devising means for the general good of mankind.

A TEXT ON A SCRIPTURE QUILT.

"I CAN read all your texts for you, grandma," said a little girl, skipping into the room where her grandmother was busy preparing a Scripture quilt for the hospital.

"That's good, Lotta," said the old lady. "Now let me hear you, then I shall know if I have made any mistake."

Lotta proved that she had not overestimated her powers. She read the texts in the order in which they came, and without any help. As she read the last one in the extreme corner of the quilt the old lady started. "Evil pursueth sinners; but to the righteous good shall be repaid." "What does it mean, grandma?" the child asked. It was the only text about which she had made any inquiry, and if she had known all about herself it would have been the one she would have most thoroughly understood.

The old lady was silent for a minute, and then she said: "That is a text, my dear, you must never forget. It means that wrong-doing makes people miserable. They do naughty things in secret, and when they are not found out they think there is no harm; but some day, it may be years afterward, they are reminded of it, and then they grieve about it when it is too late. You remember how Joseph's brothers, when they went to Egypt to buy corn and were in fear of their lives, remembered how they had been cruel to their brother, and said, 'Therefore is this distress come upon us.' Jacob, too, deceived his poor blind father, and succeeded; but all his life after, he suffered from people deceiving him. His uncle deceived him, and his own sons deceived him. Yes, evil pursueth sinners; and," added the old lady, with a thankful look upward, "even to those who are not righteous good is repaid."

Lotta's grandmother could have given the child a more modern illustration of the text than that of the patriarchs if she had thought it wise to do so. Only that morning a letter had come to her from her son-in-law, Lotta's father, who was living miserably in a distant city. "I am almost starving," it said. "I am suffering the penalty of my early sins. When I first played a sociable game at cards with my friends, I little thought it would end in this way. I have tried every means I know of to conquer my love of gambling, but I am now a helpless slave to it. I would overcome it if I could. It has cost me my beautiful home. I saw my dear wife die broken-hearted, and I am separated from my darling little Lotta; yet I cannot give it up. I am an abject slave to the passion, and so I expect to die. Pity me if you can and pray for me."

The other side of the picture, too, had its illustration. Little Lotta was the delight of her grandmother's life. Left alone in her old age, she had been very solitary without the merry, light-hearted child. Her husband had been dead now many years; her only daughter had become the gambler's wife, and she, too, was dead; but into her solitary home Lotta had come, bringing sunshine and comfort. The old lady boasted of no righteousness of her own, but she had accepted the righteousness of Christ, and had lived from her girlhood in His resurrection-life. In humble gratitude to God she rejoiced that, with many other blessings, He had sent her little grandchild to cheer her declining years. There are few aged people who could not, from their own memory and experience, furnish examples of both sides of the proverb which, like all God's words, is being continually fulfilled before our eyes.

SAM'S FEALTY TO THE DEAD.

AMONG the "Stories by American Authors," published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, is one entitled "Marse Chan," by Thomas Nelson Page. It furnishes an excellent illustration of the pathetic fidelity with which so many of the negro race till cling to the memory of their former owners. The writer describes Sam as he saw him one summer evening in 1872, bent with age, outside the grounds of a proud mansion in eastern Virginia, which was once the seat of wealth, but had then passed into other hands, and was evidently falling into decay. Sam was leaning on his spade and calling to an old dog, blind with age and corpulent with over-feeding, who, he informed the stranger, was

"Marse Chan's dawg," Who was Marse Chan? was naturally the stranger's question. Marse Chan, it appeared, had been Sam's owner in antebellum days. "Ole marster," when Marse Chan was a little baby, had made Sam, then a boy of eight or nine years old, Marse Chan's boy, and Sam had nursed his infant master and carried him around. When Marse Chan grew bigger Sam had carried his books to school and "tended" to him generally. Sam had not, apparently, found slavery such a misery as some of his brethren. Speaking of those days he said:

"Dem was good ole times, marster—de bes' Sam ever see! Dey wuz in fac'! Niggers didn't hed nuthin' 't all to do—jes' hed to 'ten' to de feedin', an' cleanin' de horses, an' doin' what de marster tell 'em to do; an' when dey wuz sick, dey had things sount 'em out de house, an' de same doctor come to see 'em whar 'ten' to de white folk when dey wuz po'ly. Dyar warn' no trouble nor nuthin'."

Sam had plenty to tell of Marse Chan's young days, of his love for Cun'l Chahm'b'lin's daughter, and of the part he took in politics. It appeared that Marse Chan had opposed secession. Sam said: "De war come on jes' den, and Marse Chan wuz elected cap'n; but he wouldn't tek it. He said Virginia hadn't seceded, an' he wuz gwine stan' by her." Eventually "Virginia, she come out, an' den Marse Chan he went to Richmond an' listed, an' come back an' say he wuz a private." Sam went with him to the war by special arrangement with the captain, on whom he was to wait as well as upon his own master. "Yo' know he warn' gwine and lef' Sam."

Sam was on many battle-fields with his master, but only one he describes minutely. "We rid all night tell 'bout light; an' we halted right on a little creek, an' we stayed dyah till mos' breakfas' time, an' I see Marse Chan set down on de groun' 'hine a bush. I watch him, an' de battle wuz a-goin' on, but we hed orders to stay 'hine de hill, an' ev'ry n' an' den de bullets would cut de limbs o' de trees right over us, an' one o' dem big shells what goes 'awhar—awhar—awhar,' would fall right among us; but Marse Chan he didn't mine it no mo'n nuthin'. Well dey blowed boots an' saddles an' we mounted; an' de orders come to ride 'roun' de slope, an' Marse Chan's company wuz de secon', and when we got 'roun' dyah, we wuz right in it. It wuz de wust place ever dis nigger got in."

Sam's horse was killed, and he lost sight of his master in the charge, but he followed on foot until he caught sight of the beloved face on the ground. Marse Chan was dead, with a bullet through his body, and in his dead hand the colors of his company. Sam wrapped the body in the flag and carried it off the field. With his own money he bought some lumber and made a rough coffin, and obtaining the loan of an ambulance set out for home. Sam shed tears as he described the arrival at home and the tears of ole marster, who had fallen blind, and ole missis and Miss Anne, Marse Chan's love. The two old people died of grief that fall. Miss Anne went to the hospitals, where she took a fever and died too. "I lives down de road heah a little piece," Sam said, "an' I jes' steps down of a evenin', an' looks arfter de graves."

The good old man was caring for the graves, and "Marse Chan's dawg" was as fat and happy as a dog could be. It was all Sam could do to show his love and gratitude to those who had been kind to him. He did not seem to think he was doing anything out of the common way, but his simple pathetic acts of remembrance were evidences of a spirit rare indeed in the world. What a reproach is such fealty and devotion to many who call themselves Christians! Leading lives of selfish absorption in the world's pursuits, they rarely think of Him who laid down His life for them, or ever ask themselves what can I do for His sake?

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

The Closing Scene.

ROBERT WALDRON read the papers before him with an aching heart. Where was his punishment to cease? At what other points in his career was the ever-widening circle of his early sin to reach him? He had never suspected Lawson's enmity all these years; and now it had wrought so strongly, being baffled and thrown back upon itself, that it had driven him to suicide. The sound of Grant's foot upon the stairs was welcome, yet when he entered Robert could not look upon him in the face. He only spoke in a broken and smothered voice.

"The poor fellow has destroyed himself," he said.

"No," answered Grant, almost cheerfully, "I have been expecting this any time for the last twelve months. He consulted me for a heart-disease, for which he was using opium, the only relief he could have. I knew he could not last long; but it is possible he may have met with a little excitement which hastened the end. This is no case of suicide."

"Thank God!" cried Robert. Grant's words were an untold relief to him. If they only proved correct when he came to examine the man, he would take heart, and go forward bravely to meet whatever lay beyond him in the future.

"You had better go to my house, and wait for me there," said Grant, and Robert took his advice willingly. Grant followed him in the course of an hour, and verified his statement. Lawson's opium box had been emptied, but that had not caused his death, which was the result of an access of the disease, long anticipated by them both. Robert gave him his confession to read, and Grant ran through it rapidly.

"Strange!" he said. "Strange that this never occurred to me, at least! I felt reluctant to lay the sin at John Morley's door; yet I missed the clue from not having known Lawson long, enough. Shall we make this paper public?"

"To what end?" asked Robert. "Scarcely any person besides ourselves knows anything of the past. It was written for John Morley, and we will give it to him. Let him do what he likes with it."

"And the mother?" suggested Grant. "I will send her back to Burgundy," he answered; "a small pension will make her happy. Strange tales will she have to tell of English life!"

He smiled a little sadly, but went home with a heart the lighter because it had missed having a great increase to its burden. Early the next morning he presented himself at John Morley's door, which was opened to him by Lawson's mother, her face somewhat troubled, and the fine wrinkles about her eyes strongly marked, but bearing no light of malice or cunning about them.

"Well," was all she could utter, "my son?" "He is dead," said Robert; "you have not spoken a word to Hester?"

"Not one word!" replied madame. "The young curé was with her when I returned. Then my son is veritably dead?"

"You shall go home, to Ecquémouville at once," replied Robert. "I will send my servant with you to start from Folkestone; and I intend to allow you a small pension."

"Seigneur!" cried the old woman, clapping her hands together, "that is good! I shall live again in the sunshine, and sing my little songs to those who love them! He was not a bad son, monsieur, and I grieve for him; but it was very triste here in England, and he was morose, sombre. If mademoiselle marries the curé, I shall have no more pleasure in England. Wherefore do you not persist in marrying her?"

Robert made no answer, for Hester was passing through the entrance, and came forward to speak to him. There was a new light in her eyes, and a color on her grave face, which he understood well. He gave her the packet for her father, and then went away, for the hour was drawing near when the quiet funeral of his little child would start from John Morley's door.

It was the evening of the same day that Carl, who had been walking with Robert through the park toward Aston Court, happened to encounter Miss Waldron on his return. They met almost upon the spot where he had first spoken of his love for Hester. He recollected it distinctly, and her conduct afterward, which had effected his separation from his first church. But Carl's charity was of the order which hopeth all things, endureth all things, and never faileth. She had once been his friend, and to her he had often poured out his heart, when it was overcharged. A halo was about her still, for the sake of past times, and, let it be owned, for the sake of the hopeless love she had borne for him, which had perhaps been the real spring of all her after-unkindness. He approached her with an outstretched hand, which she feigned not to see.

"Mr. Bramwell," she said, coldly, "you have taken your own course, I believe. I warned you against Hester Morley; I warned you in ample time, but you followed your own rash and unregenerate nature. I trust you may never repent of it."

"I never shall repent of it," answered Carl, warmly. "Thank God, Hester will be my wife as soon as I have a home ready for her! But let us be friends again, Miss Waldron, though I neglected your advice. Your brother and I are friends at last; your father loves me and Hester; do not let there be coldness and estrangement between us. We may see each other often. When we do meet, let us meet as friends."

"There is no unfriendliness on my part," said Miss Waldron, frigidly. "With due consideration of the difference in our position, I am quite willing to meet you on a proper footing. Hester also. I have shown her many kindnesses, and no conduct of hers can efface the remembrance of them from my memory. You may give my best wishes to her, Mr. Bramwell."

She walked on with a stately step, leaving Carl in as uncomfortable and irritated a frame of mind as was possible to him. But her heart was swelling with mortification and disappointment. She could not bear to think of Hester married to Carl, eloquent and popular, with a growing fame, while she remained single and obscure in the retirement of Little Aston. She ran through the list of chances which, in the pride of her youth and position, she had cast away; and she sighed bitterly over them. Only one remained to her; and that was David Scott. True, he was very deaf—so deaf that she could not whisper gentle hints into his ear; but he looked at her very significantly. He was a good preacher, moreover, and sooner or later would make a mark, as Dr. Hervey assured her. With her aid, what height might he not attain? She gained her room, and deliberated long upon the question. Then she reached out her desk, selected the paper which bore the crest of her family, and wrote to him.

It was a letter that cost her some thought, and more than one sheet of paper was torn up and cast aside before her task was finished to her satisfaction. Her conviction was that Mr. Scott would really like to make her his wife, but was too modest to make her an offer. Such modesty was commendable, for it showed that the young man had a proper sense of her worth and the difference between his social position and hers. But his modesty ought not to stand in the way of his happiness and her own. Doubtless if he knew that an offer of marriage would be accepted, he would have made it long ago. Miss Waldron intended to convey that information to him now. The letter she wrote was such an epistle as a queen might write to one of her subjects. It was not an offer of marriage, but such an expression of her regard for him, and contained such hints, delicately expressed, of her views on the marriage state, that the most obtuse mind could detect her meaning. Reading it over at last, she was satisfied with it, and retired to rest with a mind at rest.

In the morning she despatched her missive by a footman, who received orders that the carriage was to take him and his weighty packet to the lodgings of Mr. Scott, and wait until an answer was ready. She partly hoped that he would catch the hint, and return to her in the carriage; but only a short note was brought back. She opened it, and read it with unutterable emotions.

"DEAR MISS WALDRON: I understand you quite well. Unluckily I am engaged to a cousin in Glasgow, who would not give me up, I am sure. I shall keep your letter as a mark of your esteem. Believe me,

"Yours faithfully,

"DAVID SCOTT."

David Scott was wise in his generation. No troubles disturbed his relations with his church; and though Miss Waldron was distant, she was always deferential. He married his cousin in due time, and they were received as formal visitors at Aston Court. Miss Waldron continued to shed a bright and unwearied light upon the little church at Little Aston.

Hester's sorrow for Lawson was very real, but it hung over her present happiness only as a thin cloud shadows a bright sky. They told her that his sudden death had been long impending; and though they did not show her the confession he had written, Carl said he had owned to being guilty of those acts of violence and revenge which they had all attributed to her father. Carl had still a few days to stay at Little Aston—days of a quiet but profound gladness; and then he went back to his charge in London, where his popularity and usefulness were increasing.

Rose lingered through the winter, dying so slowly and peacefully that it could scarcely be called death—"the hours gliding by with down upon their feet." A gleam of her old light-heartedness returned now and then, with a pathetic beauty in it; the feebleness of her smiles, and the faint ripple of laughter from her lips smote painfully upon John Morley's spirit. Yet he knew it was best for her to go. Some lives cannot blossom and bear fruit until they are transplanted into more genial climes. She was too weak a creature to work any work worthy of repentance, such as a stronger woman may do, who has fallen as low as she had done. It was well for him to shield and cherish her, as she descended with slow, sure steps down to the portal through which she must pass alone. But he could have done nothing else; and he thanks God for the great boon granted to him.

"Are you very sorry that I must die?" she asked one day, with wistful eyes and voice, when her time was almost ended. "Would you wish me to live and grow strong again?"

"No," he said, his heart swelling with great pity, yet truthful to her, for truth was kindest.

Rose turned away her face from him and the light, but he saw a quiver of pain tremble upon it.

"My child," he said, very tenderly, "there will be no sin there; and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." It is a good thing for you to be taken out of the world. But is there anything you desire, anything you can wish to ask of me, which you shrink from asking?"

"No," she answered, with a sob.

"Do you not wish," he continued, in a lower and more tender voice, "to see him, Robert, once more, before you die?"

"No," she repeated, opening her blue eyes, and looking into his face like a child; "why should I? I have almost forgotten him. He never comes into my thoughts now. Let Hester tell him, if she will, that I have forgotten him—the best thing I can do."

It was but a few days after this, when he was watching her alone in the quiet dawn of a spring morning, that she called him to her side, with a sharp, quick tone, which told him that the last moment was come. All the house was silent with that peculiar atmosphere of silence which comes with the night, but which is more felt during the solemn and irresistible approach of light to the world. John Morley was alone with the wife whom he had so passionately loved. He bent over her with a bitter pang piercing him to the heart, yet with gratitude and courage. She raised her eyes to his for the last time.

"You forgive me fully," she whispered, "as fully as God forgives?"

"As fully as God forgives!" he repeated.

"Kiss me," she said; "kiss my lips, as you kissed my child when she was dying."

John Morley bent his face to hers, and laid a long, solemn, agonized kiss upon her lips; and when he lifted up his head, he saw that she had gone from him forever.

Rose died early in March, and before the end of April John Morley and Hester left Little Aston altogether, taking with them none of their poor household goods, except the great chair in which Hester's mother had died, the volumes Lawson had bound for her when she was a child, and John Morley's favorite books. Robert Waldron and Carl had chosen a house for them in London, and Annie had been there to superintend the furnishing of it.

It was a sunny house, looking upon a square where the lime-trees were just opening their leaf-buds, and two or three chestnut-trees spreading their first broad leaflets to the spring light and breeze; a rural home compared to the gloomy, decayed old house in Little Aston. Mr. Waldron had procured a situation for John Morley as librarian, with a salary amply sufficient for his modest need. The new house was suited to an income much larger than John Morley's. It was within a pleasant distance of Carl's chapel. The arrangements within were altogether those of a new household, consisting of other members besides Hester and her father. There was a room, still empty and unfurnished, which would make a good study by and by. Hester understood it very well, though nothing had been said to her on the subject. This was Carl's home, which she was to occupy a few months yet without him, out of regard to her father's new grief. She would have time to grow at home in it, to give to it the impress of her own taste, to make it more and more ready for him to come to it; and then—

The day after she and her father had entered their new dwelling, Robert Waldron called, and Hester went to receive him alone. She had not seen him since the morning she had stood beside him, looking down on the sweet pale face of his dead child. He appeared much older, but there was an expression of goodness and earnestness upon his face which had not been seen there in former times. He smiled gravely but tenderly upon her, as she advanced to meet him with some shyness and hesitation in her manner. The hand she extended to him bore his ring, which she had slipped on her finger unthinkingly as she came across it in her unpacking. Robert kept her hand in his, looking down upon it, and upon her face, with an air mingled pain and pleasure.

"Thank you for wearing my ring, dear Hester," he said; "Carl knows of it."

"I have not told him," she answered, with a hasty blush.

"But I have," he continued, smiling; "he knows it is only a love which might have been, and he does not grudge me the shadow when he has the substance. Hester, I have become a member of his church."

"I am very glad," she said, with tears in her clear, frank eyes.

"We shall be friends," Robert went on, "we three, as long as we live. Carl will let me come here as familiarly as if I were his brother and yours; and I shall be here very often. Do you know, dear friend, that I have been invited by my father's old constituency to represent them in Parliament? I shall live in London more than half my time, and so not be very far from you. Do you think my visits will be a trouble to your father?"

"I am sure they will not, after a while," said Hester.

"Does he grieve very much for Rose?" he asked.

"Yes," she answered; "but not as he did before. He is cheerful now, and takes a good deal of interest in everything that happens to us both. He has been all over this new house with me, noticing everything, and he is more than content; he is glad to be away from the old place, and to be beginning a new life. It is a new life to him."

"Did she leave no message for me?" said Robert, after a pause.

"None," she replied, "only that she had almost forgotten you, and that it was best so."

"Poor Rose! poor little Hetty!" he said, as if speaking to himself only. "Yet indeed I was little more than a boy."

He could not altogether relinquish his old plea, though now, under Carl's teaching, he had learned how heinous his sin had been, and had with his own eyes beheld its bitter fruit. He looked back from a calm height upon all the past, and could trace the hard and crooked paths into which he had strayed. He had escaped from them, but the mire and clay clung to him even yet, and he stood solitary upon the height he had gained at last. "Hester," he said, "my father promises himself to be present at our wedding in the autumn."

"And Miss Waldron?" exclaimed Hester, in alarm.

"No, not Miss Waldron," answered Robert, smiling; "certainly not. Do you think my sister would come? No; my father and I will be there, if you will give us leave."

"Yes, come," said Hester; heartily; and then, remembering herself, was covered with confusion so pretty and delightful, that Robert Waldron could scarcely restrain a sigh of bitterness and regret.

"And poor old Lawson's mother?" said Hester, in a tone of questioning.

"I had a letter from her the other day," answered Robert; "she is enchanted to be at home again in Burgundy. Hester, I have the mark of Lawson's blow yet; I shall carry it to my grave."

He lifted the hair which fell over his temples, and pushed it back. There was a seam and scar still upon the skin, and, as he said, it would be there till he died. It was but an emblem and a symbol of the inner and spiritual wound, healed indeed, and with as much of the pain taken away as could ever be removed in this life; but a wound still, a blemish, a brand upon the beauty of his future life. Carl had come into the room as he spoke, and looked with Hester upon it; and she, putting her hand into his with a tender clasp, bent forward and kissed the scar.

THE END.

PAUL BEFORE THE COUNCIL.

S. S. LESSON for Feb. 22. Acts 23: 1-16. Golden Text, Ver. 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Captain's Impartiality—Paul and his Accusers Face to Face—The Chief Priest's Unfriendly Command—Paul's Denunciation—His Apology—Declares Himself a Pharisee—A Stone of Contention—The Sadducees Types of Modern Rationalists—Characteristics of the Pharisees—Paul Rescued—An Assassination Plot Thwarted.

THE chief captain, a man of impartial justice, quite unbiassed by any predilection for Paul or for the Jews, was determined that the case of his prisoner should have the full benefit of the law. Therefore, in order to know "the certainty whereof he was accused of the Jews, he loosed him from his bands, and commanded the chief priests and all their council to appear, and brought Paul down, and set him before them."

The opening sentence of Paul's speech shows how completely he stood in the presence of God. "Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience toward God, until this day." The apostle made no attempt to prove that he had done nothing of which man would disapprove. But on his trial before an ecclesiastical tribunal, he saw behind his judges the living God, in whose presence he was. Between him and his God there was not so much as a shadow; he knew he was forgiven, cleansed, sanctified, filled with the Spirit and led by Him, and that moment by moment he was kept by Him. And it was the most natural thing in the world to Paul to speak of his relations to Him in whose presence he always stood. But was offended at this bold assertion of innocence in the sight of God, and commanded them that stood by to smite Paul on the mouth—an action neither priestly nor lawful. Paul, who saw all things in the light of God, said to him, "God shall smite thee, thou whited wall; for sittest thou to judge me after the law, and commandest me to be smitten contrary to the law?" The words were prophetic; not long afterward this very Ananias was slain by the daggers of the Sicarii. Ananias was a hypocrite; the Spirit of God in Paul discerned him as such, and his intolerance of Paul's reference to his God was part and parcel of the spirit which animated him. An unreal man may be as religious as you like, but he will not have to do with God. When they that stood by remonstrated with Paul that he should not revile God's high-priest, Paul at once acknowledged what was due to his office and dignity, "It is written, Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people."

Guided as he always was by the Spirit, Paul, who perceived that "the one part were Sadducees, and the other Pharisees, cried out in the council, Men and brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee: of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question." This was truly

A STONE OF CONTENTION.

"There arose a dissension between the Pharisees and the Sadducees; and the multitude was divided." God had determined that Paul should escape death at this time and also that a testimony should be borne to His truth in the most unlikely quarters—in the stronghold of Judaistic ecclesiasticism and before the officials of the Roman Government. Wherever the truth of God penetrates to the high places of the earth, and reaches those in authority, it is at the cost of the instruments He uses. But His interventions in times of need are most precious and glorious. Had it not been for this timely word all would have gone against Paul, and he would have been then and there condemned to death. "There arose a great cry; and the scribes that were of the Pharisees' part arose, and strove, saying, We find no evil in this man; but if a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him, let us not fight against God." "The Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit; but the Pharisees confess both." These were much like the two in the present day which fight against the true life of God—the one the embodiment of rationalism in all its many degrees; the other of superstition.

The Sadducees of those days exalted human reason above revelation; they would believe nothing which they could not understand, and

THEY CAME TO THE BIBLE TO MASTER IT, as though they were its superiors—just as a student would come to a science—instead of coming to it as a revelation from the Creator to His creatures. Oh, if we all knew how to come as learners to the written Word of God, how much of darkness, confusion, and dispute would be saved! We come to be mastered, not to master; we come as children who know nothing, not as they who bring previous knowledge to bear upon it. No light but that of the Spirit of God can show us the things of God, and the mistakes of many are traceable to their attempts to master spiritual things by human learning. "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2: 14).

The Pharisees, who also were men of a character common in these days, believed in revelation and in the resurrection from the dead; but for the most part their belief was only an assent of the intellect or the conscience, and not a real spiritual contact with God. In doctrine Paul was a Pharisee, inasmuch as he accepted revelation. The whole council was brought into confusion, and the chief captain, always an enthusiast for justice, fearing lest Paul should be torn in pieces by these rival parties, ordered the soldiers to take him by force from among them and bring him into the castle.

All this time

GOD WAS AT WORK.

It seemed as though evil men, led on by Satan, were having it all their own way; but God was bringing out His purposes for Paul in all that happened. "The night following the Lord stood by him, and said, Be of good cheer, Paul; for as thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome." It was but a repetition of his former leading when he "purposed in the Spirit . . . to go to Jerusalem, saying, After I have been there I must also see Rome" (Acts 19: 21). Such a confirmation of God's leadings, just when circumstances appeared so much against the spread of the Gospel, must have been doubly precious to him. All circumstances which happened to him were only part of God's answer to his first consecration question. "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" and he accepted them all as working together for good to them that love God. Thus discouragement was shut out; God was in charge of His own truth and His own glory, and Paul had only to say "Yes, Lord," through all.

When the day broke, Satan had ANOTHER DANGER ready for this servant of God. Forty of the Jews had banded themselves together, like a set of modern Invincibles, to accomplish the murder of Paul. They persuaded themselves, no doubt, that by this deed of violence they would act as true patriots to their country, and vindicate the honor of their religion. They were following the footsteps of a certain Saul of Tarsus. But how accomplish their purpose? Paul was safe within the castle walls. They knew where to find sympathetic friends, and went to the chief priests and elders, the very men whose bounden duty it was to teach "Thou shalt do no murder." With no sense of shame whatever, and no fear of condemnation, they said, openly, "We have bound ourselves under a great curse, that we will eat nothing until we have slain Paul." Why did not the chief priests at once warn the chief captain that dangerous men were abroad with intent to take life? Alas! in the hearts of these men, ill-fitted to be the spiritual leaders of the people, murder, when it served their purpose, had ceased to be a crime.

The conspirators boldly proposed to the chief priests a partnership in their crime, and we have no record of their refusal to connive at it. The proposition ran thus: "Now therefore ye with the council signify to the chief captain that he bring him down unto you to-morrow, as though ye would inquire something more perfectly concerning him; and we, or ever he come near, are ready to kill him." But they had reckoned without their host. One was present at this infamous interview on whose presence they had not calculated. And God so ordered it that Paul's nephew should hear of their lying in wait, and he went into the castle and told Paul. Thus their deed of blood was frustrated. Whether they died of fasting because they kept their vow does not appear; men who could unscrupulously plan the murder of an innocent man would not have much difficulty in breaking their own oath, and in eating and drinking still, although they did not slay Paul.

MR. GEORGE MULLER, whose recent visit to America is doubtless fresh in the recollection of our readers, is known by reputation throughout Christendom. Everywhere his name is mentioned with admiration, and the narrative of his great work is read with wonder. While scientists are demonstrating to their own satisfaction that faith and prayer are without influence, and have no practical bearing on the affairs of daily life, Mr. Müller is supporting, educating, and providing for more than two thousand orphan children without capital and without regular income, solely by those two despised means—faith and prayer. The Orphanages have been built and paid for, and their inmates have been provided for to this day without any application for human aid.

Often has his faith been tried, and collapse seemed, humanly speaking, to stare him in the face; but his faith has never wavered, and it has always received its reward. It would be impossible within the space at our command to give even a meagre account of this great work; but we propose to supplement the biography of Mr. Müller, which we published in these columns on October 9th, 1879, with a few additional facts and incidents.

Mr. George Müller is a German. He was born at Kroppenstaedt, near Halberstadt, in Prussia, on September 27th, 1805. His father was exceedingly fond of him, but parental love in this case was unwisely displayed, for, like the patriarch Jacob, George Müller's father showed to his son a partiality which aroused some little jealousy in the breast of his other son. Another mistake of his father's was that of allowing the two boys too much money for their years.

YOUTHFUL SINS.

When he was ten years of age he was sent to Halberstadt, to the Cathedral Classical School, there to be prepared for the university; his father's desire being that he should become a clergyman, though not so much with the view of doing good to others as in order to secure a competence for himself. His time was now spent partly in study, partly in novel reading, and partly in sinful practices. Such was his way of life until his fourteenth year, when his mother was suddenly removed by death.

While she lay dying George, unaware of her illness, was card-playing till two in the morning, and on the next day, which was the Sabbath, he went with some of his companions to a tavern, and afterward wandered about the streets half intoxicated. On the next day he attended for the first time the religious instruction he was to receive preparatory to his confirmation; but here also his carelessness was as great as elsewhere. On his return to his lodgings his father had arrived to take him and his brother home to their mother's funeral. But even death and its attendant solemnities had no lasting effect on the boy's mind.

Referring to this period, he says: "In November I went on a pleasure excursion to Magdeburg, where I spent six days in much sin; and though my absence from home had been found out by my father before I returned from thence, yet I took all the money I could obtain, and went to Brunswick, after I had, through a number of lies, obtained permission from my tutor. I spent a week at Brunswick, in an expensive hotel. At the end of the week my money was expended. I went quietly out of the yard, and then ran off; but, being suspected and observed, and therefore seen to go off, I was immediately called after, and so had to return. I was arrested, and, being suspected to be a thief, was examined for about three hours, and then sent to jail. I now found myself, at the age of sixteen, an inmate of the same dwelling with thieves and murderers. I was locked up in this place day and night, without permission to leave my cell.

"I was

from December 18th, 1821, till January 12th, 1822, when the keeper told me to go with him to the police office. Here I found the commission before whom I had been tried had acquainted my father with my conduct; and thus I was kept in prison till my father sent the money which was needed for my travelling expenses, to pay my debt in the inn, and for my maintenance in the prison.

"I afterward spent two years and six months at a classical school at Nordhausen. During this time I studied with considerable diligence the Latin classics, French history, my own language, etc., but did little in Hebrew, Greek, and the mathematics. I lived in the house of the director, and got highly into his favor, so much so that I was held up by him in the first class as an example to the rest.

"But while I was thus outwardly gaining the esteem of my fellow-creatures, I did not care in the least about God, but lived secretly in much sin, in consequence of which I was taken ill, and for thirteen weeks confined to my room. During my illness I had no real sorrow of heart, and cared nothing about the Word of God. I had about three hundred books,

BUT NO BIBLE."

By this time (1825) George Müller had become a member of the university, and obtained permission to preach in the Lutheran Church, although he was still godless and unhappy. Knowing, however, that no church would have him which knew his real character, and that without a considerable knowledge of divinity he could never get a good living in Prussia, he determined to change his way of life, and give himself diligently to his studies. But no sooner had he entered Halle, the University town, than all his good resolutions came to nothing. He again gave way to profligacy, and was as reckless a spendthrift as ever.

One day, while in a tavern with some of his wild fellow-students, he saw among them one of his former school-fellows named Beta, whom he had known four years before at Halberstadt, but whom at the time he had despised because he was quiet and serious. Müller, thinking that he might be better if he chose good companions, soon became the fast friend of Beta, but ere long it became evident that the latter was a backslider, and was glad to meet Müller because he hoped to be thus introduced into gay society. But God made Beta, after all, the means of lasting good to his young friend.

In August, 1825, Müller, and two other students drove about the country for four days. All the money for this costly pleasure had been obtained by pledging some of their remaining articles. When they returned their only thought was how to obtain fresh pleasures, and Müller, whose love of travel was very strong, proposed that they should go to Switzerland. At his suggestion they made use of forged letters from their parents in order to procure passports, and, by pawning their books and other articles, obtained as much money as they thought necessary.

The young travellers went as far as Mount Rigi, in Switzerland, and spent in all forty-three days on their travels.

A PROVIDENTIAL WALK.

One Saturday afternoon, about the middle of November, 1825, he had a walk with his friend Beta, during which the latter mentioned that he was in the habit of going on Saturday evenings to the house of a Christian, where a meeting was held, and where they read the Bible, sang, prayed, and read a printed sermon. Müller asked permission to go with his friend, who, it seems, had been greatly troubled about his clandestine visit to Switzerland, and made a full confession of his sin to his father. He had also sought the acquaintance of a Dr. Richter, a godly man, who had himself studied a few years before at Halle, and who gave him, on his return to the university, a letter of introduction to a believing tradesman named Wagner. It was this devoted Christian at whose house the meeting was held.

A CORDIAL WELCOME.

At this time young Müller knew nothing of the ways of believers, and made an apology for coming to the meeting. The answer he received he never forgot. Mr. Wagner said: "Come as often as you please; house and heart are open to you." (See frontispiece picture No. 1.)

THE TURNING-POINT OF HIS LIFE.

As the two friends walked home, he said to Beta, "All we have seen on our journey to Switzerland, and all our former pleasures are as nothing in comparison with this evening." "Whether I fell on my knees," Mr. Müller says, "when I returned home, I do not remember; but this I know, that I lay peaceful and happy in my bed. This shows that the Lord may begin His work in different ways. For I have not the least doubt that on that evening He began the work of grace in me, though I obtained joy without any deep sorrow of heart, and with scarcely any knowledge. That evening was the turning-point in my life.

In January, 1826, he began to read missionary papers, and was moved to give himself to missionary work. His father, however, was greatly displeased with the proposal, and reproached him on the ground that he had expended so much money on his education, in the hope that he might comfortably spend his last days with his son in a parsonage at home. The father entreated him with tears to change his purpose; but he was steadfast, and resolved that he would henceforth receive no more money from his father.

In 1826 he offered himself as a laborer in the mission field in connection with the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, the committee of which, after submitting to him a number of questions, determined to take him as a missionary student for six months on probation, provided he would go to London. Accordingly he went; but after studying some time under the auspices of the Society he was led, toward the close of 1829, to feel that it would be more in accordance with the mind of the Spirit to leave himself free to labor wherever there might be an open door, rather than to remain under the patronage and control of one organization. The committee, when the matter came before them, with the utmost respect for his motives and character, acceded to his wishes, and he was left free to preach the Gospel wherever Providence might lead.

HE VISITS DEVONSHIRE.

He had previously spent some time in Devonshire, England, with a view to the restoration of his health, which was extremely delicate, and was now led to Teignmouth with the intention of staying there ten days, to preach among some brethren with whom he had become acquainted the summer before. Great blessing attended his labors, and he was invited to become the minister of the little chapel in which he had preached. The church then numbered only eighteen, and the salary they were able to give did not exceed $275 a year.

In 1830 Mr. Müller married Miss Mary Groves, the devoted sister of Mr. Groves, the eminent missionary to Bagdad. Of this step he wrote, many years afterward: "It was taken after prayer and deliberation, with a full conviction that it was better for me to be married; and I have never regretted since either the step itself or the choice, but desire to be truly grateful to God for having given me such a wife."

HE GIVES UP A REGULAR SALARY.

About this time he began to have conscientious objections against any longer receiving a stated salary. A box was therefore placed in the chapel, and the members of the church dropped in their small contributions from week to week. "Shortly afterward," says Mr. Müller, "my wife and I had grace given to us to take the Lord's commandment, 'Sell that ye have and give alms' (Luke 12 : 23), literally, and to carry it out."

THE LAST CENT.

Another noteworthy passage in his autobiography is the following: "March 18th. These two days we have not been able to purchase meat. The sister in whose house we lodge gave us to-day part of her dinner. We are still looking to Jesus for deliverance. We want money to pay the weekly rent and to buy provisions. March 9th. Our landlady sent again of her meat for our dinner. We have but a cent left. I feel myself very cold in praying for money; still, I hope for deliverance, though I do not see whence money is to come."

Precarious and undesirable as such a way of life may seem to many, Mr. Müller's testimony is that he ever found it delightful. If he had the money, and a case of necessity came before him, he joyfully and at once parted with all he could spare, leaving God to provide for the morrow. Yet he always kept out of debt.

REMOVES TO BRISTOL.

In May, 1832, accompanied by his friend and fellow-laborer from Devonshire, the late Henry Craik, he proceeded to Bristol, took the oversight of two congregations, and began the great work which has long made his name famous.

In March, 1834, he founded the "Scriptural Knowledge Institution for Home and Abroad," to establish and assist Sunday and week-day schools for children and adults, to be conducted entirely on scriptural principles; to circulate Bibles and Testaments, by selling them to the poor at a reduced price, and giving them to those unable to buy; and to aid missionaries who were not connected with any society with grants of money and Bibles. No person was ever asked for one penny on behalf of the institution, yet it grew and prospered to a degree which could only be attributed to the blessing of the Almighty. Then came the founding of which, we are told, was established with the twofold object of proving to the church and the world that there was still a living God who heard and answered prayer, and next to promote the spiritual and temporal welfare of the orphans, shutting himself up in his room he flung himself on the floor and prayed earnestly for several hours for divine guidance. (See frontispiece.)

Contributions of the most varied kinds and from the most unexpected quarters now began to flow in.

THE MUNIFICENT NEEDLEWOMAN.

One poor needlewoman was so convinced of the blessedness of the work, that she gave $500, part of a legacy of $2400 she had just received. Not content with this, she gave away in various sums the whole amount which had been left her, and continued to maintain herself by her needle until her death.

Erelong it was laid upon Mr. Müller's heart to provide an Orphanage House for infants—a proposal which soon received the most hearty support.

In 1845 it became very desirable, from various causes, to erect suitable premises for the orphanage. After Mr. Müller had prayed about the matter for thirty six days, a donation of $5000 was sent toward the undertaking, and shortly afterward a Christian architect in London offered to make the plans and superintend the building gratuitously. This encouraged Mr. Müller proceeded with the work, and received altogether for the building fund $78,920. The Orphan Home was intended to accommodate 200 children. The qualification for admittance was that the candidate must have lost both parents by death, the most destitute children taking the first vacancy. The children entered their new home in June, 1849.

So numerous did the applications for admission become, that Mr. Müller felt called upon by God to extend the work. He therefore proposed to build a home to accommodate 700 orphans. Before one seventh of the necessary amount had been obtained 356 applications had been registered. Ultimately it was found best to erect two houses, for 400 and 450 children respectively, instead of one for 700. Of the houses thus built, No. 2 was opened in November, 1857, and No. 3 in March, 1862. So amply had the needs of the work been provided for, that when all the expenses of erecting and furnishing the second and third houses had been met, there was a balance of about $14,500 left on the building fund. Subsequently two other houses were erected, of which one was opened on November 5th, 1868, and the other on January 6th, 1870.

As in the earlier history of the work, the funds still sometimes sink to a sum not exceeding the amount required for a single day's expenses, but the need is always met.

On February 6th, 1870, Mr. Müller's institution sustained a great loss in the removal, by death, of Mrs. Müller, whose admirable qualities of mind and heart had for so many years made her an invaluable co-worker with her husband. Provisionally her only daughter, Mrs. Wright, was able and willing to fill her place, and thus, in beautiful continuity, the work of the mother is carried on by the daughter. In November, 1871, Mr. Müller married Miss M. G. Sanger, whom he had known as a consistent Christian lady for twenty-five years. In 1872 his son-in-law, Mr. James Wright, became associated with him in the directorship of the institutions. Few indeed are the men qualified for the superintendency of a work so unique and so important, but there is no difference of opinion as to the rare talents and graces which Mr. Wright has brought to the discharge of his high and difficult duties.

SUMMARY OF RESULTS.

The results of the work are thus summarized by Mr. Müller in his last report, dated May 26, 1884. Since March 5th, 1834, when it pleased the Lord to enable me to found the Scriptural Knowledge Institution for Home and Abroad, He has graciously sent me, as the result of prayer and faith, the sum of $5,063,850. Perhaps readers who are not acquainted with our former reports, may be led to ask, "And what has been accomplished by this large sum?" I therefore reply: 95,143 children or grown-up persons have been taught in the 119 schools, entirely supported by the funds of the Institution, besides tens of thousands have benefited in the schools which are assisted by its funds; 5947 now attend the schools; 189,349 Bibles; 647,775 Testaments; 19,907 copies of the Psalms; and 999,961 other small portions of the Holy Scriptures, in various languages, have been circulated since the foundation of the Institution; 80,219,334 books, pamphlets, and tracts, in several languages, have likewise been circulated from its commencement. From the earliest days of the Institution, missionaries have also been assisted by its funds. On this object alone $983,165 has been expended from the beginning; 6895 orphans have also been under our care, and five large houses, at an expense of $375,000, have been erected and fitted up for the accommodation of 2050 orphans and 110 helpers.

Besides the work to which we have referred, Mr. Müller, during the past ten years, has undertaken

NO FEWER THAN TEN MISSIONARY TOURS.

His objects, as stated by himself, were: (1) To preach the Gospel in the simplest way possible, that persons may understand how the blessing, which sinners receive through faith in Christ, is to be obtained; (2) to bring true children of God who are without the knowledge of their standing in Christ to an apprehension of their privileges; (3) to lead believers to become lovers of the Bible; (4) the removal of sectarianism, and the promotion of brotherly love among true Christians; (5) to strengthen real trust in God; (6) to lead Christians to real separation from the world; (7) and to give instruction about the true character of the present dispensation and the end thereof, and strive to lead the Church of Christ to look for His second coming as her great hope.

In the prosecution of these objects Mr. Müller has labored, preaching and teaching and consulting with Christian workers, in no fewer than twenty-three countries—namely, England, Scotland, Ireland, Switzerland, Germany, Holland, France, Spain, Italy, Canada, the United States, Egypt, Palestine, Syria, Asia Minor, Turkey, Greece, Austria, Hungary, Bohemia, Russia, Russian Poland, and last and latest of all, India.

While on his visit to Canada, he witnessed a scene which made a deep impression on his mind. In his journal he thus writes: "At Wells, where the train stopped for half an hour, we observed wrapped either in scarlet blankets or in striped woollen mantles dyed with brilliant colors. They wore curious-looking hats, trimmed with feathers and wide ribbons, and had their faces painted with patches of vermilion. At Bewawee and Battle Mountain there were more Indians, and toward evening we reached Winnemucca, where several copper-colored men and women gathered round the train." (See frontispiece.)

A gratifying incident occurred while Mr. Müller was staying at the Cliff House, in 1881. A young assistant employed at this magnificent establishment waited upon the visitor, and introduced himself as the brother of Emma Evans, one of the orphans formerly at Ashley Down. He knew that Mr. and Mrs. Müller were in the United States, and having often heard Mr. Müller preach in Bristol years before, he recognized him with delight, and before the departure of the guests presented them with a beautiful bouquet of flowers as a little token of his gratitude. (See frontispiece.)

In March 1879, Mr. Müller, with his wife, visited Monaco, notorious for its gambling saloons and frequent suicides, and Mentone. At the latter place he preached at the hall of the Free Church of Scotland, at the English Française, and at the German church to large congregations, and continued to hold meetings daily as long as he remained. As on Sunday mornings the little Hall of the Free Church was crowded, its doors and windows were left open; several persons therefore sat outside on the balcony, on chairs, and among the number was the genial and beloved pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, London, the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, who attended Mr. Müller's meetings.

While at Mentone, says Mr. Müller, "we had the pleasure of seeing Mr. Spurgeon, and driving out with him occasionally. One afternoon the Turin road leading to Castiglione was selected for our route, where, while slowly winding up hill in a carriage, kindly lent us by a wealthy resident, surrounded by magnificent scenery, Mr. Spurgeon said: 'When in the midst of landscapes such as these, from the crown of my head to the sole of my foot I feel as though I could burst out into one song of praise.'

In 1883 Mr. Müller was in St. Petersburg at the time that the Russian police stopped the evangelistic service in Colonel Paschkoff's house. In fact, Mr. Müller himself was summoned before the chief of police for holding meetings for which no permission had been given by the Minister of the Interior." He was allowed to continue his services, however, without let or hindrance. There is, as is well known, so little real religious liberty in Russia, that the spread of the Gospel of Salvation is lamentably prevented by the absence of it.

"If," said Mr. Müller, some time ago, "I say that during the last fifty-four years and nine months that I have been a believer in the Lord Jesus, I have had thirty thousand answers to prayer, either in the same hour or the same day that the requests were made, I should not go a particle too far."

EVANGELISM VINDICATED.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, February 15, 1885.

"And I took the little book out of the angel's hand, and ate it up; and it was in my mouth sweet as honey; and as soon as I had eaten it, my belly was bitter. And he said unto me, Thou must prophesy again before many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings."—REV. 10: 10, 11.

DOMITIAN, the Roman Emperor, had in his realm a troublesome evangelist who would keep preaching, and so he exiled him to a barren island, as now the Russians exile convicts to Siberia, or as sometimes the English Government used to send prisoners to Australia. The island I speak of is now called Patmos, and is so barren and unproductive that its inhabitants live by fishing.

But one day the evangelist of whom I speak, sitting at the mouth of a cavern on the hill-side, and perhaps half asleep under the drone of the sea, has and before him pass, as in panorama, time and eternity. Among the strange things that he saw was an angel with a little book in his hand, and in his dream the evangelist asked for this little book, and the angel gave it to him, and told him to eat it up. As in a dream things are sometimes incongruous, the evangelist took the little book and ate it up. The angel told him beforehand that it would be very sweet in the mouth, but afterward he would be troubled with indigestion. True enough, the evangelist devours the book, and it becomes to him a sweetness during the mastication, but afterward a physical bitterness.

Who the angel was and what the book was no one can tell. The commentators do not agree, and I shall take no responsibility of interpretation, but will tell you that it suggests to me which sceptics take and chew up and find a very luscious morsel to their witticism, but after a while it is to them a great distress. The angel of the church hands out this little book of evangelism, and the antagonists of the Christian Church take it and eat it up, and it makes them smile at first, but afterward it is to them a dire dyspepsia.

All intelligent people have creeds—that is, favorite theories which they have adopted. Political creeds—that is, theories about tariff, about finance, about civil service, about government. Social creeds—that is, theories about manners and customs and good neighborhood. Aesthetic creeds—that is, theories about tapestry, about bric-a-brac, about styles of ornamentation. Religious creeds—that is, theories about the Deity, about the soul, about the great future. The only being who has no creed about anything is the idiot. This is always a sign of profound ignorance on the part of the scoffer, for he has himself a hundred creeds in regard to other things. In our time the beliefs of evangelistic churches are under a fusillade of caricature and misrepresentation. Men set up what they call orthodox faith, and then they rake it with the musketry of their denunciation. They falsify what the Christian churches believe. They take evangelical doctrines and set them in a harsh and repulsive way, and put them out of the association with other truths. They are like a mad anatomist who, desiring to tell what a man is, dissects a human body and hangs up in one place the heart, and in another place the two lungs, and in another place an ankle bone, and says that is a man. They are only fragments of a man wrenched out of their God-appointed places.

Evangelical religion is a healthy, symmetrical, well-jointed, rosetate, bounding life, and the scalpel and dissecting knife of the infidel or the atheist cannot tell you what it is. Evangelical religion is as different from what it is represented to be by these enemies as the scare-crow which a farmer puts in the cornfield to keep off the ravens is different from the farmer himself.

For instance, these enemies of evangelism say that the Presbyterian Church believes that God is a savage sovereign, and that He made some men just to damn them, and that there are infants in hell a span long. These old slanders come down from generation to generation. The Presbyterian Church believes no such thing. The Presbyterian Church believes that God is a loving and just Sovereign, and that we are free agents. "No, no! that cannot be," say these men who have chewed up the creed and have the consequent embittered stomachs. "That is impossible; if God is a sovereign, we can't be free agents." Why, my friends, we admit this in every other direction. I, De Witt Talmage, am a free citizen of Brooklyn. I go when I please and I come when I please, but I have at least four sovereigns. The Church court of our denomination; that is my ecclesiastical sovereign. The mayor of this city; he is my municipal sovereign. The Governor of New York; he is my State sovereign. The President of the United States; he is my national sovereign. Four sovereigns have I, and yet in every faculty of body, mind, and soul I am a free man. So, you see, it is possible that the two and there is a common-sense way of presenting it, and there is a way that is repulsive. If you have the two doctrines in a worldly direction, why not in a religious direction? If I choose to-morrow morning to walk into the Mercantile Library and improve my mind, or to go through the conservatory of my friend at Jamaica, who has flowers from all lands growing under the arches of glass, and who has an aquarium all aquirm with trout and gold fish, and there are trees bearing oranges and bananas—if I want to go there, I could. I am free to go. If I want to go over to Hoboken and leap into a furnace of an oil factory, if I want to jump from the platform of the Philadelphia express train, if I want to leap from Brooklyn Bridge, I may. But suppose I should go to-morrow and leap into the furnace at Hoboken, who would be to blame? That is all there is about sovereignty and free agency. God rules and reigns, and He has conservatories and He has blast furnaces. If you want to walk in the gardens, walk there. If you want to leap in the furnaces you may.

Suppose now a man had a charmed key with which he could open all the jails, and he should open Raymond Street Jail and the New York Tombs and all the prisons on the continent. In three weeks what kind of a country would this be? all the inmates turned out of those prisons and penitentiaries. Suppose all the reprobates, the bad spirits, the outrageous spirits, should be turned into the New Jerusalem. Why, the next morning the gates of pearl would be found off hinge, the linchpin would be gone out of the chariot wheels, the "house of many mansions" would be burglarized. Assault and battery, arson, libertinism, and assassination would reside in the capital of the skies. Angels of God would be insulted on the streets. Heaven would be a dead failure if there were no great look-up. If all people without regard to their character when they leave this world go right into glory.

I wonder if in the temple of the skies Charles Guiteau and John Wilkes Booth occupy the same pew! Your common-sense demands two destinies! And then, as to the Presbyterian Church believing there are infants in perdition, if you will bring me a Presbyterian of good morals and sound mind who will say that he believes there ever was a baby in the lost world, or ever will be, I will make him a deed to all my property, and he can take possession to-morrow.

So the Episcopal Church is misrepresented by the enemies of evangelism. They say that church substitutes forms and ceremonies for heart religion, and it is all a matter of liturgy and genuflection. False again. All Episcopalians will tell you that the forms and creeds of their church are worse than nothing unless the heart go with them.

So also the Baptist Church has been misrepresented. The enemies of evangelism say the Baptist Church believes that unless a man is immersed he will never get into heaven. False again. All the Baptists, close communion and open communion, believe that if a man accept the Lord Jesus Christ he will be saved, whether he be baptized by one drop of water on the forehead, or be plunged into the Ohio or Susquehanna, although immersion is the only gate by which one enters their earthly communion.

The enemies of evangelism also misrepresent the Methodist Church. They say the Methodist Church believes that a man can convert himself, and that conversion in that church is a temporary emotion, and that all a man has to do is to kneel down at the altar and feel bad and then the minister pats him on the back and says, "It is all right," and that is all there is of it. False again. The Methodist Church believes that the Holy Ghost alone can convert a heart, and in that church conversion is an earthquake of conviction and a sunburst of pardon. And as to mere "temporary emotion," I wish we all had more of the "temporary emotion" which lasted Bishop Janes and Matthew Simpson for a half century, keeping them on fire for God until their holy enthusiasm consumed their bodies.

So all the evangelical denominations are misrepresented. And then these enemies of evangelism go on and hold up the great doctrines of the Christian Churches as absurd, dry, and inexplicable technicalities. "There is your they say. "Absurd beyond all bounds. The idea that there is a God in three persons! Impossible. If it is one God He can't be three, and if there are three, they can't be one." At the same time all of us—they with us—acknowledge trinites all around us. Trinity in our own make-up—body, mind, soul. Body with which we move, mind with which we think, soul with which we love. Three, yet one man. Trinity in the air—light, heat, moisture—yet one atmosphere. Trinity in the court room—three judges on the bench, but one court. Trinities all around about us, in earthly government and in nature. Of course, all the illustrations are defective for the reason that the natural cannot fully illustrate the spiritual. But suppose an ignorant man should come up to a chemist and say: "I deny what you say about the water and about the air; they are not made of different parts. The air is one; I breathe it every day. The water is one; I drink it every day. You can't deceive me about the elements that go to make up the air and the water." The chemist would say: "You come up into my laboratory and I will demonstrate this whole thing to you." The ignorant man goes into the chemist's laboratory, and sees for himself. He learns that the water is one and the air is one but they are made up of different parts. So here is a man who says: "I can't understand the doctrine of the Trinity." God says: "You come up here into the laboratory after your death, and you will see—you will see it explained, you will see it demonstrated." The ignorant man cannot understand the chemistry of the water and the air until he goes into the laboratory, and we will never understand the Trinity until we go into heaven. The ignorance of the man who cannot understand the chemistry of the air and water does not change the fact in regard to the composition of air and water. Because we cannot understand the Trinity, does that change the fact?

"And there is your absurd doctrine about JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH," say these antagonists who have chewed up the little book of evangelism, and have the consequent embittered stomach—"justification by faith; you can't explain it." I can explain it. It is simply this: when a man takes the Lord Jesus Christ as his Saviour from sin, God lets the offender off. Just as you have a difference with some one, he has injured you, he apologizes or he makes reparation, you say, "Now, that's all right, that's all right." Justification by faith is this: a man takes Jesus Christ as his Saviour, and God says to the man, "Now, it was all wrong before, but it is all right now; it is all right." That was what made Martin Luther what he was. Justification by faith, it is going to conquer all nations.

"There is your absurd doctrine about REGENERATION."

these antagonists of evangelism say. What is regeneration? Why, regeneration is reconstruction. Anybody can understand that. Have you not seen people who are all made over again by some wonderful influence? In other words, they are just as different now from what they used to be as possible. The old Constellation, man-of-war, lay down here at the Brooklyn Navy Yard. Famine came to Ireland. The old Constellation was fitted up, and though it had been carrying gunpowder and bullets it took bread to Ireland. You remember the enthusiasm as the old Constellation went out of our harbor, and with what joy it was greeted by the famishing nation on the other side the sea. That is regeneration. A man loaded up with sin and death loaded up with life. Refitted. Your observation has been very small indeed if you have not seen changes in characters as radical as that.

A LIQUOR-SELLER CONVERTED.

About four weeks ago a man came into this church one night, and he was intoxicated, and at an utterance of the pulpit he said in a subdued tone, "That's a lie." An officer of the church tapped him on the shoulder and said, "You must be silent, or you must go out." The next night that stranger came, and he was converted to God. He was in the liquor business. He resigned the business. The next day he sent back the samples that had just been sent him. He began to love that which he hated. I baptized him by immersion last Sabbath morning under this platform. A large salary was offered him if he would return to his former business. He declined it. He would rather suffer with Jesus Christ than be prospered in the world. He wrote home a letter to his Christian mother. The Christian mother wrote back congratulating him, and said: "If in the change of your business you have lack of means, come home; you are always welcome home." He told of his conversion to a dissolute companion. The dissolute companion said: "Well, if you have become a Christian, you had better go over and talk to that dying girl. She is dying with quick consumption in that house." The new convert went there. All the surroundings were dissolute. He told the dying girl that Jesus Christ would save her. "Oh, she said, 'that can't be, that can't be! What makes you think so?'" "I have it here in a book in my pocket," he replied. He pulled out a New Testament. She said: "Show it to me; if I can be saved, show it to me in that book." He said: "I have neglected this book as you have neglected it for many years, and I don't know where to find it, but I know it is somewhere between the lids." Then he began to turn over the leaves, and, strange and beautiful to say, his eye struck upon this passage: "Neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more." She said: "It isn't possible that is there!" "Yes," he said, "that is there." He held it up before her dying eyes, and she said: "Oh, yes, I see it for myself; I accept the promise: 'Neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more.'" In a few hours her spirit sped away to the Lord that gave it, and the new convert preached the funeral sermon. The man who a few days before had been a blasphemer and a drunkard and a hater of all that was good, he preached the sermon. That is regeneration, that is regeneration! If there are any dry husks of technicality in that, where are they? All made over again by the power of the grace of God.

Two or three years ago

A SHIP CAPTAIN

came in here and sat yonder under the gallery. He came in with a contempt for the Church of God and with an especial dislike for Talmage. When an opportunity was given he arose for prayer, and as he was more than six feet high, when he arose for prayer no one doubted that he arose! That hour he became a Christian. He went out and told the ship owners and the ship commanders what a great change had been wrought in him, and scores and scores have been brought to God through his instrumentality.

A little while after his conversion he was on ship off Cape Hatteras in a thick and prolonged fog, and they were at their wits' ends and knew not what to do, the ship drifting about hither and thither, and they lost their bearings; and the converted sea captain went to his room and asked God for the salvation of the ship, and God revealed it to him while he was on his knees that at a certain hour, only a little way off, the fog would lift; and the converted sea captain came out on the deck and told how God heard his prayers. He said: "It is all right, boys, very soon now the fog will lift," mentioning the hour. A man who stood there laughed aloud in derision at the idea that God would answer prayer; but at just the hour when God had assured the captain the fog would lift there came a flash of lightning through the fog, and the man who had jeered and laughed was stunned and fell to the deck. The fog lifted. Yonder was Cape Hatteras lighthouse. The ship was put on the right course, and sailed on to the harbor of safety.

When in seaport the captain spends most of his time in evangelical work. He kneels down by one who has been helpless in the bed for many months, and the next day she walks forth in the streets well. He kneels beside one who has been long decrepit, and he resigns the crutches. He kneels beside one who had not seen enough to be able to read for ten years, and she reads the Bible that day. Consumptions go away, and those who had diseases that were appalling to behold come up to rapid convalescence and to complete health. I am not telling you anything second-handed. I have had the story from the lips of the patients in this very house, those who were brought to health of body while at the same time brought to God. No second-hand story this. I have heard the testimony from men and women who have been cured. You may call it faith-cure, or you may call it the power of God coming down in answer to prayer; I do not care what you call it, it is a fact. The scoffing sea captain, his heart full of hatred for Christianity, now becomes a follower of the meek and lowly Jesus, giving all the time to evangelical labors, or all the time he can spare from other occupations. That is regeneration, that is regeneration. Man all made over again.

"There is your absurd doctrine of VICARIOUS SACRIFICE."

say these men who have chewed up the little book of creeds and have the consequent embittered stomach. "Vicarious sacrifice! Let every man suffer for himself. Why do I want Christ to suffer for me? I'll suffer for myself and carry my own burdens." They scoff at the idea of vicarious sacrifice, while they admire it everywhere else except in Christ. People see its beauty when a mother suffers for her child. People see its beauty when a patriot suffers for his country. People see its beauty when a man denies himself for a friend. They can see the beauty of vicarious sacrifice in every one but Christ.

A SCHOOL-TEACHER.

A young lady in one of the literary institutions was a teacher. She was very reticent and retired in her habits, and she formed no companionships in the new position she occupied, and her dress was very plain—sometimes it was very shabby. After a while she was discharged from the place for that reason, but no reason was given. In answer to the letter discharging her from the position, she said: "Well, if I have failed to please, I suppose it is my own fault." She went here and there for employment, and found none, and in desperation and in dementia she ended her life by suicide. Investigation was made and it was found that out of her small means she had supported her father, eighty years of age, and was paying the way for her brother in Yale College on his way to the ministry. It was found she had no blanket on the bed that winter, and she had no fire on the very coldest day of all the season. People found it out, and there was a large gathering at the funeral, the largest ever at any funeral in that place, and the very people who had scoffed came and looked upon the pale face of the martyr, and all honor was done her; but it was too late. Vicarious sacrifice. All are thrilled with such instances as that. But many are not moved by the fact that Christ paid His poverty for our riches, His self-abnegation for our enthronement, and knelt on the sharp edges of humiliation that we might climb over His lacerated shoulder into peace and heaven.

Be it ours to admire and adore these doctrines at which others jeer. Oh the depths of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable is His wisdom, and His ways are past finding out! Oh the height, the depth, the length, the breadth, the infinity, the immensity, the eternity of that love! Let our earnest prayers go out in behalf of all those who scoff at these doctrines of grace. When was raging in the last century, there was a hotel near the chief burial-place that excited much comment. England was in fright and bereavement. The dead carts went through the streets day and night, and the cry, "Bring out your dead!" was answered by the bringing out of the forms of the loved ones, and they were put twenty or thirty in a cart, and the wagons went on to the cemetery; and these dead were not buried in graves, but in great trenches, in great pits, in one pit eleven hundred and fourteen burials! The carts would come up with their great burden of twenty or thirty to the mouth of the pit, and the front of the cart was lifted and the dead shot into the pit. All the churches in London were open for prayer day and night, and England was in a great anguish. At that very time, at a hotel, at a wayside inn near the chief burial-place, there was a group of hardened men, who sat day after day and night after night blaspheming God and imitating the grief-struck who went by to the burial-place. These men sat there day after day and night after night, and they scoffed at men, and they scoffed at women, and they scoffed at God. But after a while one of them was struck with the plague, and in two weeks all of the group were down in the trench from the margin of which they had uttered their ribaldry. My friends, a greater plague is abroad in the world. Millions have died of it. Millions are smitten with it now. Plague of sin, plague of sorrow, plague of wretchedness, plague of woe. And consecrated women and men from all Christendom are going out trying to stay the plague and alleviate the anguish, and there is a group of men in this country base enough to sit and deride the work. They scoff at the Bible, and they scoff at evangelism, and they scoff at Jesus Christ, and they scoff at God. If these words shall reach them, either while they are sitting here to-day, or through the printing-press, let me tell them to remember the fate of that group in the wayside inn while the plague spreads its two black wings over the doomed city of London.

Oh, instead of being scoffers, let us be disciples! "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful."

THE END AT HAND.

By the Rev. T. R. Lawrence.

If we look at the accumulated evidence of the signs of the times, we shall see that there is a certain preparation going on in the world for some great change. The nations are more disturbed—more generally disturbed—than ever before. There is a revolutionary spirit in every country in Europe; secret societies, and other societies which are not secret, all animated by the desire to overturn the present order of things. There is a preparation in the world, I believe, for one universal ruler. I venture to say that the world cannot go on in its present state much longer without some very important change. Scripture tells us that that great change will be the subjugation of all countries to one monarch; that that one monarch will be Antichrist, and that he will reign over all the others—he, the wickedest of all men, most flagrant unbeliever and blasphemer, will reign where other kings are now reigning.

And the preparation for Antichrist is clearly seen in the growing secularism, rationalism, and infidelity of the present day. All these things are going hand in hand to prepare the world for for one who will outrage all the laws of propriety, and all the present ideas concerning true government.

And then, again, there is a preparation manifest in the increasing admiration for all that is clever, learned, and new. If ever the world had a hero after its own heart fitted to be the idol of this worship of genius, it will be the man whom Satan is preparing to be the Antichrist, for we are told in Revelation of "all the world wondering after him."

People will have to worship that man, and his image, and unless they do so, they will suffer fearful persecution. Of course you may be inclined to ask how the many true-hearted people in the world will come to change their belief. In the word of prophecy we are told that before those persecutions come the Lord's own people will be far away from these scenes of sin. It is easier then to understand how the world will follow a new leader who will be an infidel.

Notice the words of our Lord to the effect that the Gospel shall be preached as a witness to all nations, and "then the end will come." That prophecy could never have been fulfilled until within the last six or ten years. It could not have been fulfilled until Stanley and others discovered the great lakes of Central Africa, until missionaries had been sent out to Victoria Nyanza; until Lieutenant Sherwood Smith penetrated to the heart of Africa, took with him a band of devoted missionaries, and there established a missionary station which is going on at the present time.

Observe, too, the parable of the Gospel supper, wherein the invitation went forth and the announcement made, and those who were bidden did not come. Upon this, the invitation went into the highways and hedges, and the people were compelled to come in, that the Master's house might be filled, and then the door was shut. Now, the Gospel message went, first of all, to the cities of Palestine, and the Jews rejected the offer; the message went forth through the cities of Europe, and through the streets and lanes of the cities; and the people were invited to come in. But there has been nothing like this present latter half of the nineteenth century for Gospel invitation and preaching. Emphatically now has the word gone forth, "Go forth into the highways and hedges and compel them to come into my house;" most strikingly do we see that to be a sign of the times, and from it we conclude that the end of the invitation has come and the door will soon be shut.

ALL THINGS ARE READY,

There was another message which went forth at midnight, just before the coming of the Bridegroom,

"BEHOLD, THE BRIDEGROOM COMETH."

Students of prophecy there have been here and there before, but now the message is repeated again and again. Hundreds of expositors now search the prophetic word and believe the coming of the Lord to be nigh at hand. Never was there such a cry as now, "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh."

In Dan. 12:4 we find another sign of the coming of our Lord to be that "many shall run to and fro and knowledge shall be increased." Looking at the railway trains, and steamers, and the facilities for travelling in the present day we may well say that that prophecy is fulfilled. As it happens, however, there is another meaning to it, which comes out in the Hebrew text, "Many shall run to and fro in the knowledge of the Gospel." Here, then, we see a most distinct sign of the coming of our Lord. The Gospel is being preached on every hand, ministers and lay preachers are running from one end of the world to the other. Conferences are meeting, and from all sides comes the fulfilment of the text, "Many shall run to and fro in the knowledge of the Gospel."

There are several prophecies which indicate that the close of this dispensation will be signalized by a tremendous war—a war which will doubtless resemble that described in Ezekiel 38, 39. Russian tactics are "pointing in the direction of Palestine—the seat of war—where, on the mountain of Armageddon, the old battleground of Israel, for seven months, people will be slain."

Taking all these things into consideration, therefore, I would urge men to follow the injunction of Peter (1 Peter 4:7) and "Watch unto prayer."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Drunkard's Singular Dream.—At a Recent meeting a Christian friend said: "One morning a poor dissipated-looking inebriate said to his wife: 'I had very strange dream last night; I thought I saw three cats; one was a big, fat, well-fed cat; the second was a lean, half-starved cat; and the third was a mad cat.' The man's son, who was in the room, said, 'O father, I can read your dream. The fat cat is the rum-seller's wife, the lean cat is mother, and the mad cat is yourself.' This made the man look on to in a different light from what he had done before, and he was soon enabled, by the grace of God, to abandon the use of all intoxicating drink, and now he has given himself to the Saviour."

A Condemned Murderer, a Young Man, was lying in his cell awaiting the day of his execution. One day he thought, "I am dying justly, but there was One who died unjustly," and then he communed with himself thus: "What was Christ's purpose in dying?" At length he came to the conclusion that it must have been of His own free will, for the sake of perishing sinners; and again he thought: "Could I not even yet take the benefit of Christ's dying for me?" And there in that cold, damp cell, he went down on his knees and besought the Lord to forgive him as He did the malefactor on the cross. It was not long before he knew that he was a pardoned sinner. On the day before his execution he gave his simple testimony of the saving power of Jesus Christ to a perishing soul.

The Gospel in a Wine Saloon.—The Rev. Mr. Greig, of the McAll Mission in France, remarked: "A little deformed French girl used to come to my class in the Sunday-school, but the family removed outside the fortifications. Some time afterward I had occasion to visit the district to which Eugénie had gone, and while I was there her brother met me in the street, and said, 'When are you going to begin a meeting here?' 'I am afraid I cannot open a meeting here at present,' I replied. 'But you must,' he said; 'we need you so badly here.' Afterward his sister asked me, and I told Mr. McAll of it, who advised me to go and look for a hall, which I did, but failed to find one suitable. Much disheartened, I went to call on my little friend, Eugénie, and her first words to me were, 'Have you got a place for our meeting?' 'No, Eugénie,' I replied; 'I have failed to find one suitable; I think God does not mean us to open a meeting here at present.' 'Yes, He does,' she replied. 'I have been praying that you might get a hall.' Two days afterward a hurried message came telling me that a wine merchant had given up business, and wished to let the saloon attached to his premises. I soon secured the place, and Eugénie told me never to mind putting out bills, as she and some other children of the district would let it be known. It was not long before Eugénie had the satisfaction of seeing a very large meeting, and in that wine saloon sinners have cried for mercy, and found Jesus the Saviour."

A Minister Nonplussed.—Mr. Jack Related "A minister lately went to visit one of his congregation, and it being near the dinner hour he waited the man's return to the house. On his way home the man had gone into a saloon and taken a glass of whiskey, and when he came in the minister remarked that he had been drinking whiskey. 'Yes,' replied the tippler, 'I drink, but moderately; you drink more than do; you and your friends consume more whiskey than I and my friends do. I know this expressman who takes a barrel of whiskey frequently to your house.' The allegation was only too true. O friends, let us who are Christian workers see that our own hands are clean that we do not bring dishonor on the name of our blessed Master, whom we serve."

Pardoned at the Last Moment.—Mr. Davidson said: "I was once called to see a woman who was dying, and when I arrived she was very near the border of the eternal world. I asked if there was anything I could do to relieve her, and the only words she uttered were 'Water, water!' I gave her some water, and she drank of it eagerly, for she was in a burning fever. 'Will you pray?' she then asked. 'Is there anything you would like me to pray special for?' 'Pardon! oh pray for pardon!' she replied. After I prayed that she might be pardoned for Christ's sake, I told her that she could get the free gift just for the taking of it, and she could take it as easily as she had taken her water a minute before, if she were as eager for it. The Holy Spirit blessed the message of salvation to her; she died a short time afterward, rejoicing that God had pardoned her sins for the sake of Christ who died for her."

Saved at Seventy-Five.—A Christian Worker related: "Some time ago I spoke to an old man in a meeting, and found that he was greatly troubled about some family matters; but I asked him if he was ready to meet God should he be called to-night. 'No no,' he replied, with a look of fear in his face; 'I am seventy-five years of age, and yet I would not dare to meet God. I told him about Christ's willingness to take him, and of His great love in dying for him. He listened quietly to all I had to say, but I did not know that there was any result from what I had said. A few weeks after that I was asked to come and see a man who was dying and wished very much to see me. When I went I found him to be the same aged man to whom I had spoken in the meeting. Bending over the dying form I asked if he were happy, or if he were afraid. Opening his eyes, he recognized me, and said, 'No, no no! I am not afraid now. God has forgiven me; it is all glory, glory!' and with these words his spirit passed away. I could not help thanking God for saving that man, through faith in Jesus Christ, after a long and misspent life."

Trying to Carry a Ship.—"A Sea Captain went to see Mr. Haslam one night, and Mr. Haslam said to him: 'Captain, is your soul saved?' 'Well,' answered the captain, 'it is hard work holding on by salvation.' 'What!' rejoined Mr. Haslam, 'hard work?' 'Yes,' said the captain, 'it is very difficult for one of me calling to be a Christian.' Taking him to the window, Mr. Haslam said, 'Do you see those sheep?' 'Yes,' was the answer, 'I do.' 'Does the shepherd keep the sheep, or the sheep keep the shepherd?" Seeing the drift of the question, he hesitated a moment, and then said he did not know. "You don't know whether the shepherd keeps the sheep, or the sheep keeps the shepherd?" "No," replied the captain; "I am not quite sure." "When you are out at sea," said Mr. Haslam, "does your ship carry you, or do you carry your ship?" The question being put so plainly to him, he had to admit that the ship carried him. About a week afterward he came back to Mr. Haslam and said: "I have gone on board now, Mr. Haslam; I have been trying to carry my ship all this time; but now I am letting my ship carry me."

A French Ironworker's Secret.—The Rev. C. E. Greig, M.A., of the McAll Mission in Paris, said at a recent meeting: "I will give you an instance of the conversion of a Frenchman, an ironworker, whom I had spoken to, but concerning whom I was not certain whether he had decided for Christ or not; but an incident occurred which definitely and satisfactorily settled the question. He met with a serious accident, just in the beginning of the hot summer weather, in which his leg was fearfully mutilated. The medical man of the firm in which he was employed went to attend him, but feared very much that the case would prove fatal. Much to his surprise, when he reached the man's house he found him calm and collected. 'How is it,' he said, 'through all your suffering, and in this exceedingly hot weather, you can keep yourself so calm? I don't understand it; how can such a thing be?' 'How can such a thing not be,' answered the man with a smile; 'I put my trust and confidence in God, my reconciled Father, and unfeeling Friend, for my life hereafter.' Had that man not decided for Christ, the accident in all probability would have proved a fatal one. No wonder he was so calm when he had such faith in the great Redeemer of all who give themselves to Him."

A BIBLE TOUR IN AUSTRALIA.

AN extensive journey through the wilds of Australia, including not only the great cities, but the half-settled districts of that vast land, has been undertaken by Mr. Henry T. Robjohns. His object is to find out how the people are provided with Bibles, and to awaken interest among professing Christians in Bible Societies, and induce them to take an active part in circulating the Word among the people. He writes home an intensely fascinating letter describing his travels, from which we make the following extracts:

"It has occurred to me that there may be some who may care to hear something of Bible Society work in Australia, with its accompanying incidents, and of my own special work in particular. I attended my first meeting on January 2d, 1884, nine days after landing, and, up to the date of writing (November 20th), I have travelled 9898 miles over every part of New South Wales, all Queensland, except the extreme north, and a great deal of the sister colony of Victoria. The journeys have been by steamer, rail, stage-coach, and buggy; and I have attended exactly 181 meetings in all kinds of cities and townships.

"The journey I am now completing was over a large district, of which Sydney is the centre. I had only rested after one journey some twenty-seven hours, when I was off by the nine o'clock night train for my first halting place, Wagga-Wagga, where, 309 miles south-west from Sydney, I arrived at about eleven on Saturday morning. The town is brightened and adorned by a wide and full river, the Murrumbidgee, which in this land of frequent drought is a great attraction. Often a river on a map has for reality a bed as dry as the desert. The one want of Australia is the gleam of water. From the height of the Blue Mountains (near 4000 feet high), some 50 miles beyond Sydney, you may look over a vast hemisphere of landscape without one flash of that which the Hebrews call the 'eye' of the country.

"The Protestant Episcopal and Presbyterian churches are on an elevation, which looks down on a lovely bend of the river. On the Sunday morning I preached in the Presbyterian church. In the afternoon there was a mass-meeting of Sunday scholars in the Episcopal church, the Archdeacon read a form of prayer, specially prepared for Sunday scholars, and I read the lessons, and then delivered an address. At night the three Protestant churches—English, Presbyterian, and Wesleyan—gave up their separate services, and united in one grand 'Diet of Worship' in the Freemasons' Hall, and between 1000 and 1200 people heard a discourse from your humble servant on 'the Bible.' The influence of this series of meetings was greatly extended by admirable reports in no less than three local newspapers. In Australia every township, no matter how small, has its Argus or Mercury. You wonder how they pay; but you marvel no more when you buy a copy, and the man behind the counter asks you a price which fairly takes your breath away.

"A railway journey of eighty-two miles further west took me to Narrandera, where, through the kind co-operation of the clergymen of the English and Presbyterian churches, and that of some earnest Christian laymen, I was able to hold a good meeting, and form a branch of the Bible Society. That meeting will be ever memorable to me as introducing me to one of the plagues of Egypt. It is a dry, dusty place, afflicted with sand storms. The heat in the shade was nearly 100 degrees, and the flies were a million times more numerous than the audience. They almost hid the top of the table, gathered around the speaker's head in a cloud, some extra large moth making every now and again a dash into one's eyes.

"The life of the Rev. J. J. D. Jennings, the Presbyterian clergyman here, is not an unfair type of pastoral work in these townships on the confine of the Bush. He is a bronzed, strong-looking man of eighty, seeming, however, only sixty. The day after our meeting he was starting on a ministerial tour of 200 miles through the Bush, holding services and visiting here and there. It would take him about a week, and the journey would be performed in a buggy, with a little lad as sole companion and help. When I heard of this lad accompanying the Evangelist of the Bush, I thought of other wilds and other times, when Apostles had need of companions and helpers, and especially of Acts 13: 5: 'And they (Saul and Barnabas) had also John (i.e. Mark) to their minister.'

"The next day I set out for Hay, 107 miles by rail. The line is carried across a plain as nearly flat as one can well imagine. I suppose there are times when the flat country is covered with grass and looks green; but now it is a boundless plain of hard, dry, reddish brown soil. As you look down at it, not a blade of green is to be seen; but looking across many miles of it, you can see a sort of shimmer of green here and there. The mobs of sheep, thousands upon thousands, want to feed here, are removed, either by rail or by slow marches across the country, not too soon, however, for hundreds of skeletons are seen from the train. How flat the country is may be judged from this, that the railway seems to have been easily made, by casting up an embankment of earth, laying the ordinary "metal" upon that, and on that sleepers and rails. Here was no bush; the trees were solitary, or in thin lines; they reminded me of skirmishers en echelon. The smoke from the engine went off for miles, as from a steamer on the sea. Half a dozen cyclones of dust storms were in view at the same instant.

"Suddenly six

shot into the field of view. They were out on the plain, a mile or two from our flying train. They were the first I had seen. They retired before the advance of civilization. An hour later a solitary one, on the side of the line, was frantically trying to burst through the wire part of the fence. They are noble-looking birds, in size and shape akin to the ostrich, but in color of a dusky iron gray. Along the ditches of the railway was a mere sensation of hard-looking, dry grass. As we rushed on millions of startled locusts, dust-colored, and about the size of grasshoppers, rose out of this, and sparkled like living motes in the blazing sun, one or two occasionally dashing on the carpet of our saloon carriage.

THE MIRAGE OF THE DESERT

"We had done about half the distance, when I saw one of the most beautiful, surprising, and puzzling sights of my life. I was looking along the line of brown-madder plain we had traversed; and I saw the brown earth end on the horizon, not so very far off, like the sharp cut of the horizon on the sea—but beyond! Lines of trees marching off to a sort of infinite horizon, grayer and fainter as they receded, and all standing in and on a sheen of water, mighty as a North American lake, the reflection of every tree perfect and beautiful, the most distant of them mere films of ethereally light cobalt. What great lake is this I had missed? My imagined stupidity fairly startled me. Had I been caught napping? I prided myself on being a fairly observant traveller. I looked around the horizon in all directions. At intervals, here and there, the same wonder. What engirdlement of inland sea can this be? I knew there was nothing like this on my maps. I reasoned about it for full five minutes, and then there came to me a sort of revelation, and the whole revelation condensed itself into one word—mirage. Here unexpectedly, for no one had prepared me by so much as a syllable, was the mirage of the desert at last, wondrously beautiful—the ground real, the trees real, the reflections real and exquisite, but the mirror—not water—but miles of trembling, vibrating, burning hot air, shining with the effulgence of molten silver. I saw the marvel again several times in the neighborhood of Hay, and between Hay and Deniliquin.

"In Hay there are many fine buildings, churches, schools, etc. We held a picnic there on an island a mile from the city. Just now it is an island only in name, for the river which generally surrounds it was perfectly dry.

A NIGHT JOURNEY.

"A night coach drive of twelve hours—seven P.M. to seven A.M.—brought me to Deniliquin. The journey was one of eighty miles, over a flat plain of dry brown earth, by a track—that is to say, by a road unmade, save so far as passing vehicles have made it. For miles not even a bush was to be seen. There was no particular danger, as in some bush roads, where ruts of two or three feet deep tip over coaches, and maim travellers for life; but there was immense discomfort and great fatigue, for the road was corrugated like a ploughed field, and the jolting of the very heavy coach was horrible. At midnight we had dinner or supper—call it which you will—and changed our driver. He was new to this line, and, as a consequence, soon lost the track. Imagine a very heavy coach, with four spirited horses, out in the middle of a ploughed field, fifty miles by fifty! He set about discovering the track in rather a clever way—by making gyrations of ever increasing diameter, until in about ten minutes it was discovered, and away we went again in the darkness, guided only by the wheel-tracks of those that had gone before us.

"The French speak of knowing how to live; it is something to know how to travel. My companion on the box-seat had learned this to perfection. The huge boot under our feet was nearly filled with mail bags. At midnight he went into the boot, coiled himself up on the mail-bags, closed the lid over his head, went fast asleep, and was unconscious alike of the losing of our way and of the chill night air; while I watched Orion (a constellation common to both the Northern and the Southern hemispheres), thought of friends at home, saw the moon rise at three, and thereafter the dawn and the rising of the sun."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Ceremony of Counting the Votes for President and Vice-President cast last November was performed, as required by the Constitution, on Wednesday, February 11th. The joint session of the Senate and the House was held in the chamber of the House of Representatives. Mr. Carlisle being absent through sickness, Acting Speaker Blackburn sat beside Senator Edmunds, who presided as President pro tem of the Senate. The tellers of the two Houses were Messrs. Hoar and Pendleton on the part of the Senate, and Messrs. Clay and Keifer for the House. There were no irregular returns and no protests. When the tellers had cast the figures and signed their report, it was handed to Mr. Edmunds, who announced the result, giving two hundred and nineteen votes to the Democratic candidates and one hundred and eighty-two to Blaine and Logan. After making this announcement Mr. Edmunds added a statement which caused some little astonishment. He said: "And the President of the Senate makes this declaration, only as a public statement in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, of the contents of the papers opened and read on this occasion, and not as possessing any authority in law to declare any legal conclusion whatever." Some discussion arose after the joint session closed respecting the remark of Mr. Edmunds; but ultimately it was indorsed. A deputation was appointed to notify the candidates of the completion of the ceremony. A vast crowd, including many ladies, witnessed the proceedings.

The President Transmitted to Congress, on February 12th, the second annual report of the Civil Service Commission. It states that the Civil Service law has been found practicable and effective for the accomplishment of its purpose. During the year persons have been examined from every State and Territory except Idaho. One hundred and sixty-two examinations have been held, and 6347 persons have been examined, of whom 5525 were males and 822 were females. The average age of all those examined was nearly thirty years. The fact that only 449 out of 5556 had been in college seems to show that the great body of public servants are being drawn from the class who are educated in the public schools. The opinion is expressed that of those appointed there have been as many Democrats as Republicans. Only a single complaint was made of political discrimination against any appointing officer, and that was found to be without basis in fact.

A Fatal Fire Occurred at the Philadelphia Almshouse on February 12th. The fire broke out in the insane department, in which six hundred and seventy-six demented persons were confined. Owing to the fact that there was no telegraphic fire alarm on the premises, the firemen did not arrive at the scene of the conflagration until it was too late to save the building. The attendants, impelled by humane motives, were actively engaged in rescuing the inmates, and no alarm was sounded at the fire department until half an hour after the fire was discovered. When the engines arrived there was an insufficient supply of water, and it was some time before the water could be poured with any effect on the burning building. The inmates on the first and second floors were nearly all saved, but the majority of those on the third floor perished. After the fire was subdued a search for the missing was made, and eighteen dead bodies were quickly discovered, some of which were burned beyond the possibility of identification. It is feared that other bodies will be found, there being twenty-five still unaccounted for. As many of the patients as possible were secured as they escaped, and they were cared for in the other parts of the almshouse. Some of them, however, made their escape to the city, where they caused much alarm. During the progress of the fire the poor creatures who were burning to death in their cells made the scene hideous with their yells. The absence of fire escapes has caused much indignant comment against the management.

Startling Facts about the Anarchists and their plans were made last week by a reporter of the Philadelphia Press, who joined the International Working Men's Association for the purpose of obtaining information. He states that there is a regular organization controlled by executive committees in New York and Chicago. New York City is supposed to have seven thousand members, Chicago four thousand, and Philadelphia two thousand. Pittsburgh is fourth on the list, with fourteen hundred members, and Cincinnati and Cleveland next. Any person who is opposed to corporations, rich people, presidents, mayors, police and police stations on principle can become a member, only he must be in favor of wiping out those adjuncts of civilization by a general uprising and massacre. In their declaration of principles the anarchists avow themselves in favor of "agitation for the purpose of organization; organization for the purpose of rebellion." This is, in a few words, their whole object. The signal for a general rising throughout the United States will be given from New York, and a proclamation commanding the death of the President and obnoxious persons will be issued. The association will receive no other warning. Its members are supposed to be in constant readiness. The members are told that the proclamation may come next week, next year, or not for three years. The latter, it is asserted, is the extreme limit. These revelations have caused much uneasiness, indicating, as they do, determination and forethought on the part of the anarchists. It may be hoped that the disclosure will put the authorities of each State on their guard, and so prevent the extensive destruction of life and property contemplated.

The Death of General Gordon was Announced on February 11th in a despatch from Lord Wolseley. He stated that Colonels Wilson and Wortley, who were with the expedition to Khartoum, had that day arrived at Korti, where General Wolseley is still staying. They brought details of the capture of Khartoum. They had learned that one of the treacherous pachas among General Gordon's forces marched the garrison to the side of the town nearest Omdurman, saying that the rebel attack was expected at that point. In the mean time another traitor ous pacha opened the gates at the other end and allowed the Mahdi's troops to enter, and they easily captured the town. General Gordon's attention was attracted by a tremendous tumult in the streets. He left the so-called palace, or government building, in which he had made his headquarters, to ascertain the cause of the disturbance. Just as he reached the street he was stabbed in the back and fell dead. The tumult was caused by the Mahdi's troops, who had gained access to the interior of the town, and who were soon in complete possession of the place, including the citadel. The intelligence that the brave Christian soldier was dead caused deep indignation in England. The miserable incapacity and vacillation of the government was charged with being responsible for General Gordon's fate. A later report of an eye-witness, received on Monday last, says that Gen. Gordon was shot.

General Earle, Lord Wolseley's Second in command, has been killed. He was advancing in the direction of Berber, and while leading an attack on the Mahdi's forces at Birti he was shot down. He was regarded as one of the most skillful of the British generals, and his loss is deeply deplored. The vigorous prosecution of the war is urged by a large section of the British people, in spite of these serious losses. The popular sentiment has been stimulated by the reports of the inhumanity of the Mahdi and his generals. After the capture of Khartoum, it is stated, the most shocking outrages were perpetrated. The scenes of the slaughter are described as surpassing the Bulgarian atrocities and rivaling the worst horrors of the Sepoy mutiny. The panic-stricken Egyptians were captured in their flight and put to death with the most fiendish tortures. Some were transfixed with spears and left to bleed to death. Most of the victims were mutilated in the most horrible manner. Eyes were gouged out, noses were slit, and tongues were torn out by the roots. The massacre included many non-combatants, and the Egyptian women were subjected to shameful indignities. More than a hundred women and young girls were given over to the Mahdi's followers to be used as slaves. After the slaughter many Arabs were seen rushing about the streets with the heads of Egyptians impaled upon their spears. The next night was spent in a saturnalia of blood and debauchery.

The Preliminary Examination of Cunningham and one of his acquaintances, on the charge of having taken part in the dynamite explosions, was continued on February 9th, when they were formally indicted for high treason. Further discoveries in connection with Cunningham's record confirm the suspicion that he is a prominent dynamiter. The public prosecutor called attention to the fact that Cunningham, who professed to be only a dock-laborer, and Burton, his fellow-prisoner, who said he was a carpenter, had been able to afford frequent trips between America and England, their visits to England coinciding with the times of the explosions at the Carlton Club and elsewhere. Dr. Dupré, government chemist, had declared that the detonator found among Cunningham's effects could not be bought at retail, and would not cause an explosion without dynamite. Another cause for suspicion is, that the accused men, when questioned before their arrest, made a number of statements, the majority of which are proved to have been falsehoods.

Cardinal McCabe is Dead. He was Chiefly known through his endeavors to restore harmony in Ireland between the government and the Land Leaguers. There is great activity among the Nationalists of Dublin to secure the appointment of an archbishop more favorable to their views than was the late Cardinal McCabe. It is openly stated in the Nationalist organs that the policy of the late cardinal would inevitably have brought about for Ireland a spectacle similar to that now witnessed in Belgium, where the politics of the people are violently opposed to those of the prelates of their church.

The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children issued its tenth annual report last week. The long array of facts it contains should secure for it the renewed confidence of the public. The report shows that in the course of the past ten years the society has had occasion to take charge of over 16,000 cases, involving more than 50,000 children. A proof of the efficacy of the work of the organization is offered in a table showing the steady decrease of juvenile arraignments and commitments by police justices since the society was organized. In 1875 the number of arraignments was 1139, and of commitments 919. For 1884 the corresponding figures were 546 and 323.

The Annual Meeting of the Young Men's Christian Associations of New York State commences at Syracuse this day, February 19th, and will be continued to-morrow, Saturday and Sunday. Reports will be presented with discussions upon the different phases of Christian work among all classes of young men. Among the speakers are Rev. W. S. Rainsford and B. C. Wetmore. Programmes may be obtained from Rev. George A. Hall, State Secretary, Fourth Avenue and Twenty-third Street, New York City.

Major George A. Hilton was conducting Gospel temperance meetings at Camden, N. J., and Philadelphia, Pa., with much success last week. The Rev. H. S. Thompson, of the Easton District, writing to a Wilmington, Del., journal, thus speaks of the services Major Hilton conducted in his locality: "Major George A. Hilton, of Washington, D. C., who came to lecture on temperance by a previous engagement, laid aside his lecture when he found the state of religious interest, and entered into the work for ten days with an earnestness, devotion, and success, which has endeared him to our hearts as well as shown him to be one of the most successful evangelists we have met. He is a man of consecrated life, earnest activity, positive faith, and great personal influence."

A Meeting of Clergymen and Christian workers was held in Brooklyn, on February 5th, to consider the spiritual needs of the city. The number of churches and the number of persons in Christian fellowship have not kept pace with the increase of population, and the meeting was called to discuss plans for extending Christian work in the city. With a large map for purposes of illustration, Rev. Mr. Martin, of the City Tract and Missionary Society, showed that in some of the outlying districts little or nothing was being done in the way of evangelization. One large ward on the East River, thickly peopled by the worst classes, had no church within its boundaries, and only one mission school. In the southern and eastern wards, the situation was quite as bad. Brooklyn, the speaker said, was becoming more and more a city of families and homes. Of the eighty-six thousand two hundred and twenty-five buildings in the city limits, eighty-two thousand were dwellings. Dr. Cuyler said that forty years ago, when New York City had less than half its present population, the number of people brought under evangelistic influences was almost as large as it is now. In Brooklyn the condition of things was no better. Something must be done without delay. Various plans were discussed of a practical character for reaching non-church-goers.

Of the Revival among the Students at Park College, in Western Missouri, President McAfee reports the blessing has come down, as it were, straight from heaven. Only one sermon has been preached. Prayer-meetings and inquiry-meetings have been conducted by the pastor, assisted by every member of the faculty, without the loss of recitation or the manual labor of each day. Of our two hundred and forty-five students, not a score may be reckoned out of Christ.

The Voyage of a Family of Squirrels was witnessed by a gentleman of Toledo, who thus describes the mother squirrel's ingenuity: "She reached the bank of the creek where a crossing was to be made. The little squirrels were quite timid about going near to the water, but the mother coaxed them until they seemed to be satisfied to do as she wished. She ran along the shore, and finding a piece of bark about a foot long and six inches wide, dragged it to the water's edge and pushed it into the water, so that only a small part of one end of the bark was resting on the shore. She then induced her little ones to get on the bark, and they at once cuddled closely together, when the old squirrel pushed the bark and its load into the stream, and, taking one end of the bark in her teeth, pushed it ahead of her until the opposite bank was reached, where the young squirrels quickly scrambled up the bank of the creek." So they got safely over the crisis in their lives, triumphing through affection and faith in their mother's wisdom and love. How much of needless distress in the trials of life would Christians save themselves if they would exercise like faith in their Father, who careth for them! (Matt. 6: 31, 32.)

A Sermon in Exchange for Horseshoes was a bargain made and completed to the mutual satisfaction of a clergyman and a blacksmith in Connecticut recently. The Hartford Times says that a local clergyman had his horse shod, and the blacksmith, who is not a churchman, declined pay, saying that he would "take it out in preaching;" but the obstacle in the way of payment was the distance to the meeting-house. The faithful and energetic preacher, not willing to see a good work hindered, proposed a service in the vulcan's own courts, and as the result he gave notice from his pulpit the following Sunday that he should preach by request at "Hop Holt's" blacksmith's shop, Tuesday evening, at seven o'clock, and the payment was thus duly rendered. It would be gratifying to learn that the sermon was blessed to the blacksmith's soul. If so, he would have reason to be thankful throughout eternity that he made such a bargain with the clergyman, even if he had shod the horse with gold (Isa. 13: 12).

A Curious Suit for Slander was Tried in Jersey City, N. J., last week. A lady complained that her neighbors avoided her, and charged that the social ostracism was due to certain remarks made about her by a person living in the same street. The remarks were to the effect that the plaintiff was a witch, and had cast a spell over young people, who, in consequence, pined away and died. Since the charge had been made no one had visited her and particular care had been taken to keep children away from her and her house. Plaintiff denied that she possessed the powers of witchcraft. In these days of enlightenment such a denial seemed unnecessary, yet it would appear from the plaintiff's evidence that some people give practical proof that they believe in witchcraft. Those parents, and others who do not believe in the power of the black art, will do well to remember that their children need to be protected from more potent spells than those attributed to witches. The theatre, the saloon, and the haunts of vice are daily enchanting victims from among the young by spells which are deadly and which, once exerted, are not easily shaken off (Prov. 4: 14-18).

How an Owl Saved him from Death was Recently told by a ship captain to a reporter of the San Francisco Call. He said that, having left his ship to go to a trading post, he was caught in a blinding snow-storm, and in attempting to return to the ship he lost his bearings and wandered around until night. "I hallooed and yelled," said the captain, "but I had small hopes of my cries being heard. Hours passed in this way, and it became pitch dark. Benumbed and exhausted, I at last fell down in the snow and gave up all hopes of ever seeing my schooner again. As with people freezing, I became semi-conscious, and my extreme cold gave way to a prickly heat, which I knew was preliminary to death. Suddenly I heard one of the most unearthly noises near me. It raised me like an electric shock, and I listened. A mournful 'hoo! hoo!' at my feet caused me to stagger up and look around. I heard a flutter, and then saw something white in the darkness. My fears increased. The fluttering was repeated, and the object came nearer, and then I saw it was a white owl out in the storm with myself. Then I recalled the old Esquimaux superstition that a white owl always appeared when one was in distress, and that if followed the owl would conduct one to a place of safety. I approached the owl, and it receded. I staggered ahead, and it still went before me, but never got out of sight. I don't know how far I followed the bird, which at intervals emitted its mournful 'hoo-hoo,' as if to encourage me. Thinking I must be near the ship, I hallooed with all my feeble might, and was rejoiced to hear a response. Soon, through the falling snow, I saw a lantern, and I knew that I was saved. The owl was found in the morning dead, but I have had it stuffed, and no money would buy it." It was well for the captain that he had heard of the Esquimaux superstition," and acted upon it. To those who are lost in life's storms, and who despair of ever finding their way to a haven of safety, a voice comes which is no superstition, but the voice of the Son of God calling them to Him and promising them rest (Matt. 11: 28).

—A Sleep that Cost a Man his Liberty was slept by a prisoner in a Brooklyn prison recently. He had been sentenced to one day's imprisonment by Judge Nacher, and he was placed in a cell with a man condemned to six months in jail. At the expiration of the twenty-four hours the warden opened the cell door and called him, but he was asleep, and his quick-witted companion coolly stepped out of the cell, and was set at liberty. On awakening he was unable to convince the prison officials of his identity, and was sent to the penitentiary to work out the six months to which his fellow-prisoner had been condemned. The man had no friends to inquire after him, and it was not until he succeeded in enlisting the sympathies of his former employer that he recovered his freedom. Happily for him, his sleep, costly as it was, involved only a few weeks in prison; but there are other imprisoned souls sunk in spiritual slumber who hear not the proclamation of liberty which Gospel preachers are continually uttering, and who will, unless they awake, go to a doom prepared, not for them, but for the devil and his angels (Matt. 25: 41).

A Poisonous Engagement Ring was Presented recently by a lover at Annandale, N. Y., to the lady of his choice. The lover, on receiving the lady's consent to his offer of marriage, purchased a ring, which he placed on her finger. There was a slight abrasion of the skin, which became painful after the ring had been worn a few days; then the finger began to swell, and soon the whole arm was swollen and discolored. Physicians were summoned, who, after an examination, declared that the lady was suffering from blood poisoning produced, by base metal in the engagement ring. Under their treatment the lady is recovering. The lover stated that the jeweller from whom he bought the ring assured him it was pure gold; but when it was tested after the mischief was done, it was found to have little if any gold in it. Lovers who hear of this incident and who are about to give such a present will doubtless take warning by it and see that the ring is of pure gold. If they will also take warning by other incidents, which the records of our divorce courts furnish, and earnestly seek that wisdom which pure gold typifies, they and their future wives may be spared much suffering (Prov. 8: 19).

Copies are sent to subscribers in America direct from Bethshan as soon as printed. Annual subscription, including postage, seventy-five cents. Subscriptions for 1885 should be sent to Mrs. M. Baxter, to Drayton Park, Highbury, London, England, or to the office of the CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, whence they will be forwarded to London.

A SWEET SILVER BELL.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"My God will hear me."—MICAH 7:7.

A Charming Sentence—In a Queer Place—I. The Title—Every Man has a God—The Importance of the Pronoun—Implies Appropriation—Acquaintance—Obedience—II. The Argument—Why He will Hear—Because He is God—Because He is my God—Has Heard many Times—Not Coincidences—III. The Favor Itself—Hearing Promised not Answering—A Good Listener—Sympathy Assured—Help Certain—IV. The Person—A Refuge for Hard Times.

WHAT a charming sentence! Can you say it? Only five words, but what meaning! Huge volumes of poetry have appeared from Chaucer even to Tennyson, but it seems to me that the essence of poetry lies hid in a marvellously condensed form within these few words. It shall take you many an hour to suck out all their sweetness. There is an almost inconceivable depth of meaning in them; and of richness of assured experience and of sweet conclusions of a hallowed faith they are full to the brim.

"My God will hear me." There is more eloquence in that sentence than in all the orations of Demosthenes. He that can speak thus can say more than if he were able to declare truthfully that all worlds were his own; for he grasps God Himself, and holds the present and the future in the hollow of his hand.

"My God will hear me." It is prophetic; but the prophet has taken upon himself no unusual power, neither does he intend his prophecy to be true of himself alone. He puts this divine sentence into the mouth of every believer; every child of God may dare to say that his God will hear him, for he may dare to say the truth. I feel as if I could not preach from the text, and did not want to do so. It needs no aid of wit or words; for myself, I would be well content to exhibit this diamond with many facets by merely holding it up and letting the light fall on it, and flash back from it in variety of brilliance.

A CHARMING SENTENCE,

as I have said; but in what a queer place we find it! Just as they find gold in the dark mine, and as we see stars in the black night, so do we find these rich words in the midst of floods of grief and woe. The man of God is pricked and torn by the briars of the age in which he travels; he is vexed and wearied with the bribery and corruption all around him; he cannot find peace either at home or abroad—nay, not even in the bosom of her whom he loves; he is everywhere disquieted and driven to and fro; and yet it is just at that time that he cries, "My God will hear me." From this I gather—and I gather it not from this alone, but from my own personal experience—that it is generally when things are at the worst that we know most about the best. When we are disappointed of men, then become we most content with our God.

I. The first thing I shall note at this time is

THE TITLE.

This is the bottom of the whole text really, the true foundation of the confidence which is expressed in it. The title is "my God;" it is not God alone, but God in covenant with me, to whom I look for help. I shall be heard by "my God."

I am afraid that some of you will have to draw back a little from the text at the very commencement. As I remarked the other day, to say there is a God is not much. It is the same as to say, there is a bank; but there may be a bank, and you may be miserably poor. There certainly is a God, but that God may be no source of comfort to you. The joy of the whole thing lies in that word "my." "My God will hear me."

Begin then with the inquiry, put to your own soul, can I truly think of God, and call Him "my God"? If so, that means election and selection. There were many gods in the day of the prophet Micah; at least, men spoke as if there were. Men talked of this god, and of that, and each nation had its own peculiar deity, and each man walked in the name of his god, and gloried in it. But the prophet in effect says of Jehovah, the one living and true God, the God that made heaven and earth: "This God is my God. Others may worship gods of wood, or of stone, or of silver, or of gold; but as for me, my heart shall only worship the great Invisible, whom none hath seen, to whom none can approach. The eternal Creator alone will I adore."

Now, at this present time

EVERY MAN HAS A GOD.

Alas, how many make their belly their god! The golden calf is never without its crowds of devoted worshippers. Gods to-day are as numerous in England as in any heathen country; let me then ask, Have you taken the God who is your Maker, your Preserver, your Redeemer to be the great object of your life? That is your god which rules your nature—that which is your motive power—that for which you live. Do you live for Jehovah as your God, or are you only living for yourself or for some temporary end and purpose? Will the object of your life die with your dying, and be buried in your grave? Or can you say unto the living God, "O God, Thou art my God; early will I seek Thee. Thou art my God forever and ever; Thou shalt be my guide even unto death!" If so, it supposes your election of this God beyond every other; and I put it to you—is this election made? and made once for all?

"My God"—that supposes an appropriation by faith. Have you taken Jehovah to be your God? Have you made bold to take Him for your very own? In the covenant of grace God gives over to His people Himself, and all that He is, and all that He has, by a covenant of salt. As the believer becomes God's portion, so the Lord becomes the believer's portion.

"My God"—this signifies knowledge and acquaintance. Does it not? For unless the words are meaningless, you know who it is that you are talking of, and you have had some acquaintance with Him, and dealings with Him. If I say, "So-and-so is my friend," I give you to understand that I know him; and if I say, "Jehovah is my God," I profess that I know Him and have fellowship with Him. You remember the inscription which Paul discovered upon an altar at Athens, "To the unknown God." I would not have you worship there, my brother; but I would have you understand that word of the apostle, "After that ye had known God, or rather were known of God." Now,

WHAT KNOWEST THOU OF GOD?

Hast thou ever spoken with Him? Has He spoken to thee? Hast thou told Him thy secrets? Has He revealed Himself to thee, as it is written, "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him, and He will show them His covenant?" Now, I am not talking about fancies. If any of you deem this to be fanciful, it is because you are strangers to the covenant of promise; but I am speaking now to a people who know more than I can tell them of what this means. As for myself, I know something of nature, and of the works of God's hands, but my soul cares little for that knowledge compared with knowing Him. Willingly and gladly I would forget all else I know if I might but know more of Him; for well am I persuaded that when old age comes on, and memory fails me, that which my soul shall hold as a death grip will not be historical remembrance, classical lore, or theological learning, but what she knows by inward experience of the Lord her God.

What a deal there is in the title! But we have not exhausted it by a long way; let us have another drink from the well. You feel that now the obedience of your life is rendered to Him most cheerfully, for this is a sure outcome of the heart's crying, "He is my God." A man cannot call God his God in truth unless he desires to obey Him; for God is a name to adore, to reverence, to worship. He who speaks of God but never obeys Him is a practical atheist; he has no God. The man upon whose heart and hand the Godhead has no kind of influence—such a man is a liar and knows not God, but renders to Him lip service, which is to God's dishonor, and not to His glory. Yes, beloved, if you are what you profess to be, you can declare, "With all my infirmities and imperfections, I desire that my whole life should be obedient to the divine precept. I wish in all things to do that which is right and good, and true and kind, according to the mind of Christ, in which I see the mind of God my Father."

Let me only add that this expressive phrase, "My God" hints at a joy and delight in Him. As men would say—"my love," "my choice," "my treasure," "my delight," so doth the prophet say "my God." The very name wakes all the music of his soul.

II. The second point in our brief text is for I believe the title contains within itself a secret logical force. "My God will hear me." As surely as He is my God He will hear me. Why?

Well, He will hear me first because He is God, because He is the living and true God. Those gods of stone cannot hear me, but my God will hear me. The gods that many men choose will not hear them in the day of trouble. To which of them will they call in the hour of their affliction? But my God will hear me. It is His memorial that He hears prayer. The oracles of the heathen were but liars. Those who sought unto the false gods did but dote upon falsehoods; they were deceivers and deceived. But my God will hear me. As surely as He is God He will answer prayer.

You see in what a tone of confidence this prophet speaks, and why should not every child of God speak with the same confidence? The joy of religion lies in a hearty faith in it. You begin handling it with dainty fingers, criticising it everlastingly, questioning this and questioning that with anxious debate of heart; and the consequence is that you miss its sweetness. It is nothing to your comfort till it is everything to your faith. You must believe it, and the more thoroughly you believe it the more will it prove itself true to you.

But why am I so sure, as a matter of argument, that God will hear prayer? The answer is in the title again, "My God." Because He has made Himself my God He will hear me. Moreover, my God has therefore, be it far from me to doubt His present and future favor. What shall I say to my beloved brothers and sisters here who are getting old? They have had such experience. God has heard your prayers many times, my aged brethren, and your faith is thereby confirmed. When we first began to pray, we were staggered if objectors questioned us. "You talk about God having heard your prayer." "Yes," we said, "He did hear us," and we stated our case. The sceptic sneered, and said "That was merely a coincidence." When we heard that remark for the first time, we were somewhat taken aback. We admitted that we could not draw an inference from two or three facts, for, perhaps, in after years there might be thirty facts which would tell the other way. But, my veteran brethren, we are not in that condition to-night, for some of us have had thirty or forty years' experience of God's hearing prayer, and our facts are as many as the hairs of our heads. Do opponents say that these are coincidences? We do not care to answer such perverse janglings.

A man puts on warm clothing and is not pinched by the frost; his acquaintance tells him that he does not believe in flannel and broadcloth; he shivers in his unbelief, and tells the well-clad man that his comfort is a mere coincidence. Humorous, is it not? But if the objector gets frozen to death, the wit grows rather grim! When we have not prayed, and have not received a blessing, and have been ready to perish, I suppose our failure has been a coincidence! And when we have betaken ourselves to our knees, and have cried mightily to God, and pleaded the promises, and God has answered us as visibly as if He had rent the blue heavens, and thrust out His almighty arm to help us, that has been a coincidence! I call such things plain answer to prayer, but those who have never experienced the like think me a fanatic.

III. Bear with me while I invite you, in the third place, to notice

THE FAVOR ITSELF.

"My God will hear me." You notice that in Scripture we do not often find the expression, "My God will answer me." We do read that He answers prayer, but more frequently God is said to be the God that heareth prayer. It is better for us to have a promise that God will hear us than a promise that a God will always answer us. In fact, if it were a matter of absolute fact that God would always answer the prayers of His people as they present them, it would be an awful truth. I should shrink from ever praying again if I were absolutely sure that the Lord would answer my prayer, whatever it might be. I might curse myself seven times deep by a prayer within the next seven minutes, if there were no safeguards and limits to the promise of prayer being answered.

It is neither desirable nor possible that all things should be left to our choice; so much do I feel this, that if my Lord should say to me, "From this hour I will always answer your prayer just as you pray it," the first petition I would offer would be, "Lord, do nothing of the sort." Because that would be putting the responsibility of my life upon myself, instead of allowing it to remain upon God. I like that kind of hearing prayer of which Ralph Erskine says:

I'm heard when answered, soon or late,
Yea, heard when I no answer get;
Most kindly answered when refused,
And treated well when harshly used."

It is enough for a praying heart that it has a hearing God.

But notice, "My God will hear me." It means, first, literally, that He will hear me as a listener. A good brother of my acquaintance, a minister of the Gospel, going to preach from the text that God will hear prayer, called upon one of his poor people, who said when the visit was over that she had greatly enjoyed his call. He thought to himself, "I have scarcely said a word, and yet she says that I have done her good." Turning to her, he inquired, "Sister, how can I have done you good, for I have hardly spoken with you?" "Ah, sir," she replied, "you have listened so kindly; you have heard all I had to say, and there are very few who will do that." Just so. People in deep trouble like somebody to hear them all through; even little children are comforted by TELLING MOTHER ALL ABOUT IT.

We are in such a hurry with poor, troubled spirits that we hasten them on to the end of the sentence, and try to make them skip the dreary details. But to them this seems unkind, for their story is sacred; and, therefore, they go slowly on with it, till we are quite tired. I have often hurried on a poor despondent creature till I have seen the uselessness of it; it is always best to let them spin on. It does them good. To tell out the heart to a patient listener is a great relief to a burdened spirit, and the heart must do it in its own way. Here is a sweet assurance, "My God will hear me." I may be very bad, and what I say may be very broken, and I may groan a good deal, and I may say the same thing over and over again, and my whole ditty may be very stupid; but "My God will hear me." He is in no hurry; he is the God of patience. He will listen to my dreary talk, and endure each gloomy particular. I need not hold Him as the Ancient Mariner held the wedding guest who was unwilling to hear his woe rhyme of the sea; my God will willingly listen to me right through, from beginning to end, groans and all. "My God will hear me."

And then the Lord will hearken as a friend full of sympathy. Some people listen but do not hear. You tell them your story, but it does not help you a bit, because their minds are no more moved by your case than if they were far away. "Mother," said a little girl once, "I cannot make it out; Mrs. Smith says I do her so much good. Poor Mrs. Smith has lost her husband, mother, and she is very sad. She sits and cries, and I get up and lay my cheek on her cheek, and I cry and say that I love her, and then she says that she loves me, and that I comfort her." Just so. That is the truest form of consolation; is it not? "Weep with them that weep." That is how God, my God, will hear me, feeling with me, sympathizing with me. "In all their affliction He was afflicted, and the angel of His presence saved them."

"My God will hear me"—that is, He will turn it over and discriminate in His own mind, and He will not allow me to be condemned by the hurried judgment of men. He will patiently hears a case. Others will come in and clamor against me, and refuse to listen to a word of explanation; but my God will hear me. That was a splendid utterance of the holy patriarch Job! He went a long way further than he knew he went when he said it—"I know that my Redeemer liveth." His unkind friends charged him very terribly; and Job spoke up for himself, but he did not get on at it. He could not plead his own cause successfully, and therefore, in his desperation, he cried, "I have a God that will yet plead my cause, and if He does not do it while I am alive, yet I know that He liveth; and though after my skin worms devour my body, yet in my flesh shall I behold Him, and I shall be cleared from this misrepresentation; I shall be delivered from this suspicion. I know I shall. My God will hear me. He will hear my suit right through and do me justice, and I shall behold Him whom my eyes shall see for myself and not another." Job felt assured of being cleared at last. Dear child of God, you may do the same.

Then, at the back of that, of course, comes the conclusion of every loving heart, that, as God will hear the case right through, so He will certainly hear as a Helper. "My God will hear me."

Now, child of God, go away with this promise in your hand, and in your heart—"My God will hear me;" and then use it like a magic wand. Turn it whichever way you will, and it will clear your path. You are going to preach the Gospel in a distant country, perhaps; and your spirit sinks as you sigh, "Who is sufficient for these things?" Lift up your heart to God, and His grace shall be sufficient for you, and His strength shall be made perfect in your weakness, for your God will hear you. Or you have to go home to-night to a sick house, and to lose one that is dear to you. You shall be sustained, for in your ear is this word, "My God will hear me." Or, perhaps you yourself have to sicken and die. Do you inquire, What shall I do in the swellings of Jordan? Here is your happy answer, "My God will hear me." I shall cry to Him, and He will answer me.

IV. My only sorrow about this text is my fear that it could not honestly fall from some of your lips; you could not truthfully say, "My God will hear me." So I close by noting to whom it belongs. "My God will hear me." Will He hear you? Dear heart, are you cast down under a sense of sin? Do you seek forgiveness? He will hear you. Are you burdened because you cannot live without sin? Would you be free from all evil? He will hear you. Are you persecuted for righteousness' sake? Are the men of your household turned to be your foes? He will hear you, and cause you to rejoice in being counted worthy to suffer for Jesus' sake. Are you assured of the result of prayer? You shall not be disappointed; your God will hear you. Have you long been praying? Cease not from importunity, but solace yourself with this sure belief—"My God will hear me." Will you not come and cast yourselves into the arms of Jesus, the Crucified? Your God has heard you. Be of good cheer.

THESE ARE HARD TIMES

with a great many of you. You have not many worldly comforts; indeed, some of you cannot even find work. What can you do without a God to fly to? I suppose your head aches sometimes, like mine; I suppose cares and troubles eat into your mind as they do into mine; I suppose you have your difficulties and your knots that you cannot untie, just as I have mine. How do you keep your souls alive without a God? I pray God that I may never live a day without prayer, and without trusting my God. However do you bear up, some of you? I do not wonder that you go and get drunk to drown your thoughts. I do not wonder that you want frivolities and theatricals, and all sorts of childish toys to put your cares out of your minds, for you need something or other to help you to forget the miseries which are coming upon you thick and heavy. Yet is it not madness to drive away wise thoughts?

What a wretched business it must be to be in dread of your own thoughts! You dare not sit alone in your chamber for half an hour and think, because if you did you would begin to think of dying, and you could not bear to think of that without a God. You might even be driven to think of hell and of a judgment to come; and that you could not endure. If you dare not think of them, how will you bear them? O poor souls, poor souls, you are in a sad state indeed! But you need not remain so. If any man wills to have God to be his own God, grace has given him that will. If you desire Christ, you may have Him. What is the price? Nothing at all. Receive Him freely. Believe in Jesus Christ—that is, trust yourself with Him; and God is your God; and you may go on your way full of joy and thankfulness. God bless you and comfort you for Jesus' sake. Amen.

THE Rev. Hamner Webb-Peplow, the Vicar of St. Paul's, Onslow Square, London, is one of the best known of the Evangelical clergymen of the British metropolis. The earnestness of his tone and the spirituality of his teaching have commended his ministrations to all who have ever listened to his addresses; and the result has been that few conferences for the deepening of the spiritual life, or for the furtherance of evangelical principles are now considered complete unless Rev. Mr. Webb-Peplow is on the list of speakers.

He was born at Weobley, Herefordshire, in 1837, and is the youngest son of the late Rev. J. B. Peplow, his mother being the well-known Mrs. Webb, authoress of "Naomi," and other similar books. After receiving his education at Marlborough and Cheltenham Colleges, he proceeded to Pembroke College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1859; and although he was prevented from reading throughout his whole course by a serious accident in the gymnasium at the commencement of his residence, he was enabled to head the ordinary degree list.

In 1863 he was ordained and appointed to a country curacy, where he greatly endeared himself to the parishioners, and where his earnest and evangelical discourses made a deep impression. A wider field of effort opened up to him in his next appointment—that of successor to his father—where he continued to minister with great success till 1876. In 1864 he was ordered to go abroad for the sake of his health, which had suffered from overwork, and he became

Old Peter's Call at the Big House.

Chaplain at Lille, in France, returning to his incumbency at Weobley in the following year.

In 1876 he was presented to the living of St. Paul's, Onslow Square. It was as no stranger to London pulpits that he began his evangelizing efforts in the rising district where he was settled. At St. Paul's he has perfected the local organizations, including coffee palaces, night schools, and temperance work, in which he is assisted by a strong body of lay helpers. The church, which seats between 1700 and 1800 people, is always crowded.

OLD PETER'S FRIEND.

"MINE'S a hard life." The words were uttered with a weary sigh, which was almost a groan. They came from the lips of an old man whose lot was very joyless; but he was wise enough to add, "It might be worse." He was a weary old man, not far from seventy years old, stiff in his joints and bent with the weight of years and burdens. Toiling slowly along, a heavy basket of oranges at his back, balanced by a net of lemons hanging in front, he plodded on, hoping that in a few hours he would tread the same path with a lightened load and a dollar in his now empty pocket. But times were bad just then, and Peter found few customers. He completed the circuit of the village, and was but little the richer for his effort. The "big house" of the village Peter had never ventured to call at. Pedlars, he thought, would not be welcomed there. But to-day, being rendered desperate by failure, he plucked up his courage and entered the trim garden in front. It was a stately mansion belonging to a wealthy colonel, who was somewhat eccentric and at times irascible, but said to be a good-hearted man at the bottom.

Peter was a little nervous at his own temerity, for he was a man who had much of the old-fashioned respect for wealth and station which younger men seem to have overcome. No answer came to his first timid knock, and he was turning to go away when he thought, having proceeded so far, it was folly to draw back. He therefore knocked more loudly. Then the door was opened by a pert maid, who told him there was nothing wanted, adding the information, for his permanent use, that "we never buy from pedlars." With which remark she closed the door with emphasis, and Peter turned away crestfallen.

Outside the rich man's gate were two children, a boy of some twelve years and a little delicate girl, on whose cheek was the fatal hectic flush of consumption. "I want an orange for my little sister," said the boy. "How much for a nice one; she's sick, you know." "Five cents, my little man," said Peter, smiling kindly on the lad. "Can't be done, sis," the boy said, turning to the girl, whose eyes were fixed longingly on the juicy fruit. "Can't be done, Nell; never mind, better luck another time. Don't cry," he added, as the deep gray eyes filled with tears. Peter looked sorry too. He hesitated a moment, then unsling his basket, and enjoyed the luxury of generosity. "There, little one," he said, giving the child one of the best oranges in his basket, "it is not often old Peter can make a present, but you shall have an orange; I believe it'll do you good." The child's eyes sparkled as the old man turned away and resumed his journey.

He had not gone many steps when he heard a voice calling to him, and turning saw the pert help who had given him his dismissal from the big house a few minutes before. "The colonel wants you," she said, and Peter followed her up the steps, where a dignified old gentleman was standing, who saluted him with: "Humph! Saw you giving your oranges away. You must be well-to-do."

"No, sir, no. Very poor—few men poorer. But an orange isn't much. Just the cup of cold water the Lord told us to give. I'm poor, but I don't like to miss an opportunity."

"Well, you will have plenty of opportunities, and you can soon empty your basket in that way. What have you been doing all your life that you should have to be toiling like this in your old age?"

"Ah! that's a long story, sir, and a painful one, but it don't much matter; I'm content, and I shall soon be through now."

"Content, are you? Well, that's more than I can say. I presume it would not distress you if I bought you up, so just see how much your stock comes to." That was soon done, and the colonel handed Peter a new five-dollar bill,

"You may keep the change, my man," he said. "Now tell me where you live; I'll come and see you. You are an original character."

The colonel drove the next day to the house where Peter boarded, and it was strange to see the two old men, so differently situated, talking together of the great change so near to each of them. Peter had no cause after that to say his life was hard. The colonel found him light employment and made him comfortable near his own house. He had reason to bless the day he ever met old Peter, and counted the money he gave him a poor recompense for the light the old pedlar brought into his latter days.

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THE dynamite explosion which, on January 24th, wrecked a portion of the chamber in which the representatives of the English people assemble to legislate for the kingdom, has been the subject of so much comment in American journals that the picture of the House on the next page will be of interest to our readers.

The hall covers a comparatively small portion of the area devoted to the entire building known as the Houses of Parliament. It is sixty-two feet long, forty-five feet wide, and forty-five feet high. The entire structure, of which the House of Commons forms part, is probably the largest Gothic edifice in the world. It is not an ancient building, the corner-stone having been laid April 27th, 1840. The old Parliament Houses were destroyed by fire on October 16th, 1834. It covers an area of nearly eight acres, has one hundred separate staircases and eleven hundred apartments, and is traversed by more than two miles of corridors.

At the south-west angle of the massive pile rises the Royal or Victoria Tower, seventy-five feet square and three hundred and forty feet high, forming the royal entrance to the palace. On the north end rises the famous Clock Tower, forty feet square and three hundred and twenty feet high, in which is the palace clock, with four dials, each twenty-two feet in diameter. It is an eight-day clock, which strikes the hours and chimes the quarters on eight bells. The great bell, known as Stephen, in this tower, weighs thirteen tons. The winding up of the striking parts of this great clock requires five hours, and this labor has to be done twice a week. The central spire of the palace is sixty feet in diameter, and rises three hundred feet above the grand central octagonal hall. Its exquisitely groined stone vault is supported without a pillar. There are several smaller towers which add greatly to the effect of the building by their picturesque forms and positions.

The interior of the palace is in keeping with the style and architecture of the exterior, and no less than four hundred and fifty statues contribute to the decorations of the corridors and apartments. The principal public entrances are through Westminster Hall and the old Palace Yard, both of which lead to the Central Octagonal Hall, from which the House of Lords and House of Commons are reached. Westminster Hall was included by the architect in his plans for the palace, and forms a portion of this great building. A small staircase descends from the south-east corner of the hall into the crypt of St. Stephen's, beneath the modern St. Stephen's Hall, and this is the only fragment of the ancient Palace of Westminster which escaped the fire of 1834. The walls and roof of the crypt are decorated with paintings, the windows are of colored glass, and the crypt is fitted up as a chapel for the members of Parliament, in which prayers are said daily.

It was in Westminster Hall and in the House of Commons that the dynamite explosions of January 24th occurred. The conspirators intended to have done more damage than they succeeded in doing. Happily, a lady saw the smoking parcel in which the dynamite was, and told a policeman, who carried it from the confined crypt, in which the plotters had placed it, into Westminster Hall, where, owing to the height of the roof, the injury effected was comparatively small. In the House of Commons the damage can be made good in a few weeks.

THE JEW'S WARD.

A SERIAL STORY.

IN one of the London streets, lying along the riverside, there was, some years ago, a small shop, perhaps the smallest shop in London, for the tenant of it, when standing in the centre, could touch each wall with his outstretched hand. Over the narrow doorway, which with a window two feet wide filled up the whole frontage, was painted the name of Matthias Levi; and in the window-sill and up each side of the window-frame were ranged old boots and shoes of every size, which old Matthias Levi had mended and patched, and was in this way offering for sale.

The House of Commons Previous to the Dynamite Explosion on January 24.

Small as the shop was, there was plenty of room within for a cobbler's stall; and there the old Jew was always at work, from time to time lifting up his lowered head to take a kindly glance at the people passing along the pavement, or at the great wagons blocking up the narrow street. He was never seen without an old cap of brown seal-skin, in shape like a turban, which came down low on his high and narrow forehead, almost touching the shaggy grayeyebrows hanging over his deep-set eyes. All his teeth were gone, and his mouth fell in; but there was a placid smile resting upon it, which had something of the charm of childhood. If a customer came in his wrinkled face beamed with pleasure; and he was as earnest in seeking out the best pair of mended shoes to fit their feet, as if those feet were his own. Not a few children went into that little shop barefoot, and came out shod, without Matthias being a penny the richer.

In one corner of his dark den a spiral iron staircase, no broader than a ladder, ascended to the room overhead. This was larger than the shop, for it extended over an archway, which led down between two warehouses to the riverside. It was the old Jew's living room and bed-chamber in one, and was but scantily furnished. In the corner of it opposite to the spiral staircase stood a ladder, with a trap-door at the top of it, leading to a garret above it. This garret, which had no other way of entrance than through the Jew's shop and dwelling-place, was rented by him to such tenants as were willing to put up with this inconvenience. The three rooms were taken out of an old and dingy warehouse, with a rotten-looking landing-stage on the river-bank, which had once probably been a busy down frame was fairly bright.

There were two persons living in this garret: a woman nearly eighty and a girl not yet eighteen.

The girl had never known a time when she had not been left to herself. Her father died before her birth, and her mother had followed him before the child had memory to recollect her; the only trace of her existence was that she had called her baby Carola, probably because she had seen some barge with that name sailing past the window. The old woman, Carola's grand-mother, had never quitted the garret where she lived since the child had been old enough to send out on errands; and this had come to pass at a very early age, for her wants were as simple as the furniture of her room. All she asked of life was a crust of bread and half a bottle of gin a day.

As long as Carola could remember, these requirements had been duly met. Every other day the crooked, shining fingers of the old woman fumbled into a mysterious pocket among her rags, and produced the price of a bottle of gin and a loaf of bread. The loaf was chiefly for the girl, but the gin was altogether for the old woman. When these errands were done Carola was free to do as she liked and go where she pleased.

It was an active out-of-door life, full of change and stir; in and out of the gin-palaces, with their crowds of drunken men and women, and up and down the riverside, among cursing and swearing riverside dwellers. Nothing escaped Carola's quick eyes and ears; and every day was full of new interest to her. Of any place in the world beyond the two or three streets near her spot, but which had now fallen into hands that did but little trade, and only kept the place in such repair as prevented it tumbling into ruins.

The attic was still larger than old Matthias Levi's dwelling-place, for it ran back toward the river, and had a low broad window looking out upon it. Half the panes were broken and stuffed up with old rags, very much obscuring the light as it struggled to reach the dark corners, which were made by the tilted angles of the roof. In one of these, almost on the floor, was a low bedstead with a torn and dirty quilt covering it. The furniture was still more scanty than in the room below, for there was but one chair, one table, and one old box, and a shelf against the wall holding a little crockery and a tin saucepan, while a half-full sack of coals and a bundle of chips stood near the trap-door on a spot closely grimed with coal-dust. With the exception of this corner, which was plainly in a hopeless condition, the floor was tolerably clean, and such glass as was left in the win-home she knew nothing, or that any other kind of life could be lived but that of the rough people around her.

Her existence was, on the whole, like that of some wild creature; eating when she was hungry if she could get the food, and sleeping when she was tired if she could find a corner to curl herself up in. At all times she thrust her little figure into every crowd, and stood in the front rank at every street sight. "Carol," as she was called, was a favorite everywhere, and continued to grow in favor. She never entered a gin-shop without having a dram pressed upon her; and the lads who rowed their boats fearlessly amid the confusion of steamers and barges on the river were always willing to take "Carol" with them. She knew all the evil from which most girls are guarded, and but little of the good in which most girls are cradled.

But however ragged little Carol might be, her feet were always warmly shod; and however neglected by all else, old Matthias Levi did his best to guard her from harm. His heart was, in fact, bound up in her. She was as the apple of his eye, though in the frosty reserve which old age had gathered around him he was bound as in fetters of iron, and could neither talk much to her, nor was able to draw out the child's chatter. But as she passed in and out, ascending and descending his iron staircase, she was constantly under his eye, and often exchanged a few words with him.

As Carol grew older and her grandmother more infirm, the discharge of the Sabbath duties fell to her. She was not more than eight years old when she began to light the lamp and kindle the fire for him on a Sabbath eve, when his law forbade him to touch them himself. And as she grew old enough he taught her, with some little austerity of manner, softened by a generous supply of sugar-plums, the Ten Commandments.

"They're good laws," he said, "and it 'ud be good for you to keep them, Carol; though you're not one of my people, my dear."

But as Carol went to and fro about the street, mixing with the lowest of the people, she found that not one of these laws was ever thought of. Yet there was something in the sound of the solemn words which stirred the depths of her childish heart. Every night she stood with her hands behind her in front of the old man, who laid aside hisawl and needle to listen, while she repeated them in a clear, sweet, serious voice before going up the ladder which led to her grandmother's garret.

For the only restraint in Carol's life was that of the necessity of coming home at nine o'clock, when Matthias Levi shut up his shop and fastened the door with a heavy iron bar, as if all his shoes were made of gold. As the only access to the garret lay through his premises, Carol could not stay out later in the streets. Till the very last moment she would linger among her companions, loath to return to the dismal attic, which was her only home; but when the clock struck nine she had to flee, and rush, breathless with her running, into the dark little shop. How good this restraint was for her she did not know till many years had gone by.

Once a week the old Jew underwent a strange and solemn change in Carol's eyes. This was on a Friday evening, when he laid aside his work and dressed himself in his best clothes. She could hear him saying words she could not understand, as he peeped down at him from her trap-door in the ceiling of his room, and watched until the long prayers were ended and the old man laid aside his Sabbath dress, and sat down in his old familiar guise.

"What do you do that for?" asked Carol, one Friday evening after an unusually long prayer, as she crept half way down the ladder, ready to retreat quickly if the strange old man was angry.

"They're good words as the wise men of my people have taught us to say," he replied. "I used to know partly what they meant, but I've forgotten what it is now I'm old. But they are pleasing to Him," he added with a mysterious gesture, as he lifted up his hand and pointed through the window to the small portion of sky visible through it.

"Would they do me any good?" inquired the child.

"They're good words, but they'd do you no good, my dear, if I could teach them to you."

"Women that aren't Jews, does He like them?" asked Carol, pointing up to the sky.

"P'raps He do, p'raps He do," he replied, in a caressing tone. "He loves the Jews, and has chosen them out of all people; but I think He'd love a little girl like you if you keep them ten laws I've taught you."

"Is it good to lie in bed all day, and drink gin?" she inquired, shrewdly.

"There's naught against it in them laws, but I hope you'll never do it, Carol. I don't know much about it, my dear, for I was not one of the wise men; but there's no harm done by keeping His laws."

Matthias had never said so much, or spoken so earnestly to her before; and Carol climbed back to the garret, and lay down beside her drunken old grandmother, firmly resolved to keep all those laws which Matthias had taught her. By dint of listening with all her might every Sabbath eve to the half-audible prayers mumbled by the old Jew, she caught up a few Hebrew words, which she repeated in a low whisper, standing at the garret window, and looking up steadily to the quiet sky which hung above the busy river.

While Carol was only a little child the old Jew could guard her from many evils; but as she grew older his anxieties for her became graver. Fortunately, when she was about twelve years of age a school inspector tracked the wild street-girl to her home, and insisted upon her going to school. Upon this Matthias took her to a small Jewish day-school in the neighborhood, where she quickly learned to read, and read with intelligence and ease. But as soon as she could shake off these shackles she returned to the free and dangerous life of the streets, with its constant changes and its exciting events. Many an hour the old cobbler, sitting at his stall, brooded painfully over the perils to which Carol was exposed.

She was growing up into a beautiful girl, with fine dark eyes and an abundance of dark hair, which hung, tangled and unkempt, over a white, broad forehead. She was getting ashamed and impatient of her ragged clothing, which hitherto had given her no concern; and nothing made her eyes sparkle with pleasure so much as when Matthias bought her some bright bit of ribbon, or some cheap trinket from the Jewish pedlars, who called now and then at his shop-door. It was very evident to Matthias that more lads hung about the place than when Carol was a mere child; and even his angriest remonstrances could not prevent the girl from standing at the street corner, laughing and chaffing with them. Worse than all, the girl was unfortunately growing fond of the spirits her grandmother lived upon; and of late she had come in more than once with an unsteady step and glistening eyes, which had struck horror into the heart of the old Jew, who was as abstemious as most Jews are.

"O Carol, Carol!" he cried one evening, with tears in his deep-set eyes; "whatever will become of you, if you don't keep yourself from goin' bad!"

"Why, I'm keepin' all those laws you've taught me!" she exclaimed, turning round and gazing at him with a startled look. "I never swear, nor steal, nor nothin', like all the rest of 'em; and I stay in-doors all the time you keep Sabbath, though it makes me mis'erable. If I'm goin' bad, it isn't much use to keep those laws."

"But you go to the vaults, Carol," he said anxiously, yet timidly; "and folks are fond of you, and they give you more drink than a young girl like you ought to have; and you run about the streets too much for a pretty girl like you. Stay at home more, my dear."

"Stay at home!" she echoed, with a wild laugh that was sad to him to hear; "stay at home with nobody but grandmother, and she lyin' in bed and drink, drink, drinkin' all day! Oh, I'd soon take to drinkin' like her, if I'd nothin' else to do. I must run about the streets, Matthias. I couldn't live in that old hole, and never go out like her. I'd rather be dead and in my grave, I would."

"Couldn't you get some work to do?" he asked.

"She won't hear a word of leavin' her to earn money for myself," said Carol; "she cries and says I don't love her; and one of the laws says, 'Honor thy father and thy mother.' That means grandmother as well, doesn't it?"

Matthias bent his head gravely.

"So I mustn't disobey her," continued Carol, "and I'm mis'erable, and I hate myself in these dirty old rags of clothes, and I can't ever forget them, only when I just take a little drop to drink, and then it doesn't seem to matter so much, and I feel almost like a little girl again. But don't you be afraid for me," she went on, looking affectionately into the old Jew's dim eyes. "I know you'd be troubled if I went wrong, and I'll not go wrong, no more than that, if that's wrong for a girl as isn't a Jew. Just that little bit of a way I'll go, but not a bit further. And that isn't breakin' one o' the commandments, you know."

No nothing could be done by Matthias for Carol as long as her grandmother lived, except to watch over her as closely as he could. There were no more peaceful days for him except the Sabbath, when he knew that the girl was safe at home in the garret overhead. Now and then he bought a book for her from the pedlars at the door, and was more than content when she shut herself up with it, and never put it down, if it was an interesting book, until she had read it to the last page. But her absorbing life was out-of-doors, and as soon as the Sabbath or the book was ended, Carol darted out into the streets. Nor was Matthias sure that she would come back when the clock struck nine; she was growing tired of even this slight restraint.

But at length the inevitable end of the drunken old grandmother drew near; and Carol had to remain in-doors day after day with the dying woman. The girl could not believe that her grandmother was really going to leave her, and to leave her alone in the world. No neighbor came in to help her in her duties; for to do so they must have passed through Matthias Levi's rooms, and as long as she could remember no stranger's foot had entered them. He fetched a doctor toward the end, for he knew there would be trouble and difficulty if this was neglected; but the doctor only shook his head, and said nothing could be done to prolong the life of the wretched old woman.

"Give her anything she seems to like," he said.

There was only one thing the dying creature craved for; and Carol went out late at night to the nearest gin-palace to buy a fresh bottle of gin. She had been sitting in the close atmosphere of the garret all day without food, only now and then sipping the gin-and-water she had poured at intervals down her grandmother's parched throat. The streets were quiet as she sped along them, for in a few minutes all the spirit-vaults would be closed, and those who were drinking late were still inside their glittering walls, waiting to be turned out at the last moment. Carol's face was bathed with tears of which she was half proud and half ashamed.

"Take a drop of something to comfort you," said the bar-maid, sympathizingly. Carol was in no hurry to go back. She felt reluctant to return at once to the dismal and lonely room, where there was nothing to look at but the shrunken and death-stricken face of her old grandmother. Yet she did not care to stay in the streets, dimly lighted though they were, where she might be seen by any one who would jeer at her grief. When she had almost reached Matthias's door she turned down stealthily along the low passage, which led beneath his dwelling to the riverside.

The half-ruined landing-stage, which was lying in the moonlight, seemed to invite her to rest there a little while; and Carola sat down on a block of wood, round which still hung the frayed and ragged fragments of a cable, by which boats had once been moored. The night breeze blowing across the river came fresh and cool to her heated face. It was past midnight, and the full moon was rising into the sky, and sending a flickering rack of glistening ripples up to her feet. There was a gentle lapping of the water against the landing-stage, which had a lulling and soothing sound.

A good many vessels lay at anchor higher up the river, with lights burning fore and aft; and down east some ship in full sail was going out quickly with the tide. But there was scarcely a sound to be heard except the low swish of the water at her feet. A few soft little clouds followed in the wake of the moon, all tinted with golden light; and the rest of the summer sky was scattered over with dim stars. They looked to Carola like eyes heavy with sleep, that could keep watch no longer, like her own.

She might have dozed a few minutes; but suddenly she woke up, and saw a boat passing across the long line of light across the river. It looked black against the silvery moonlight. There were two men standing up in it, and their dusky forms swayed to and fro in a fierce struggle. Carola sat still and looked on, as she had often gazed as a spectator on a street fight. The boat crossed the light and drifted on into the darkness, but having once seen it she could still see it, though indistinctly.

In a minute or two one of the black figures disappeared, whether into the boat or water she could not tell. Only one man stood there, where two had been a moment before; but no shout or cry broke the stillness of the night. The man who was left took up an oar and paddled back up the river, passing her so closely and so slowly that she could plainly see who it was.

"Why, that's George Bassett!" she said to herself, drawing back a little into the deeper shadows of the thick timber. He had been haunting her footsteps of late, and she did not like him; she would not have him find here there for worlds. As soon as he was fairly past she crept silently along the passage and into the open street.

CONSPIRATORS FOILED.

S. S. Lesson for March 1, Acts 23: 17-35. Golden Text, Isa. 54: 17. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Paul Appeals to the Chief Captain—His Nephew Kindly Received—The Captain's Letter to Felix—Paul's Journey in the Night—A Common Difficulty—The Meaning of Chastisements—Paul's Course—Felix Receives him.

ON hearing from his nephew of the conspiracy against his life, Paul was at no loss what to do. A man who is guided by God does not lose time in fruitless mental calculations how to act for the best. Had he depended solely on his own reason, he might have weighed the chances whether it were better to throw himself upon the chief captain, on the chance of his believing the story brought by his nephew, or whether it were better to attempt to make his escape, or whether it were better to rouse the community of the believers on his behalf. God showed him the best thing to do, and he did it. He called one of the centurions, and besought him to bring his nephew to the chief captain who had shown himself to be a man of such unswerving justice and impartiality. How did he know that the centurion would notice the request of a prisoner? Just because God would not mislead him, and equally he knew that God would watch over the interview of his nephew with Claudius Lysias. And so it was. The centurion did his best; the chief captain took the young man "by the hand, and went with him aside privately, and asked him, What is that thou hast to tell me?" With the utmost fearlessness and straightforwardness the young man told the facts without any coloring. Apparently the conspirators were already at the prison gates, for the young man said, "Now are they ready, looking for a promise from thee." There was great ingenuitiveness in the way in which he lad told the chief captain of the plot which was brewing. "The Jews have agreed to desire thee that thou wouldest bring down Paul to-morrow into the council, as though they would inquire somewhat of him more perfectly. But do not thou yield unto them." Bold words! but the frankness and perfect good faith answered to the truthfulness of his own upright character. "The chief captain then let the young man depart, and charged him, See thou tell no man that thou hast shewed these things to me."

Was it worth while for him to take any steps for the safety of Paul? the man was of no note politically, nor yet as a military man. All this was true, but behind the scenes, and He made Paul to be of such worth in the eyes of this heathen man that he gave him a body-guard equal to that of a prince. "He called unto him two centurions, saying, Make ready two hundred soldiers to go to Casarea, and horsemen threescore and ten, and spearmen two hundred, at the third hour of the night; and provide them beasts, that they may set Paul on, and bring him safe unto Felix the governor." There is no doubt Paul had prayed for this man. Of his own safety he was assured by the word of the Lord; he had no need to ask for that; but the soul of a man who had dealt so fairly and righteously with him was of no small value in his eyes. The chief captain no doubt felt the power of a man in whom God dwelt. He had been present when Paul had told of his conversion, and the clear, true ring of his personal testimony must have been in strong contrast both to the paganism in which he had been brought up and also to the Judaism which prevailed around him. As an impartial witness, it was easy for him to see the jealousy with which the Jews regarded him. He saw very clearly how matters stood, and was determined that the holy man, who was condemned by the ignorant superstition and prejudice of those less righteous than he, should be rescued from their hands, and have at least the benefit of justice. We are not told that this man subsequently became converted, but it would be hard to think he was not.

With the four hundred and seventy men who formed Paul's body-guard, Claudius Lysias sent a letter to THE GOVERNOR, which ran thus: "Claudius Lysias unto the most excellent governor Felix sendeth greeting. This man was taken of the Jews, and should have been killed of them; then came I with an army, and rescued him, having understood that he was a Roman. And when I would have known the cause wherefore they accused him, I brought him forth into their council; whom I perceived to be of question of their law, but to have nothing laid to his charge worthy of death or of bonds. And when it was told me how that the Jews laid wait for the man, I sent straightway to thee, and gave commandment to his accusers also to say before thee what they had against him. Farewell." Thus Paul travelled to Antipatris, about twenty-five or thirty miles during the night; and then, having left him in care of seventy horsemen who were to accompany him to the end of the journey, the four hundred soldiers turned back.

The forty men who had sworn his death were thus defeated in their sinful purpose, and the designs of God were receiving further development. Paul was continually coming into fuller possession of his inheritance as a servant of the Lord. "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; and every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment thou shalt condemn. This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord, and their righteousness is of me, saith the Lord." It is not that the children of God have any intrinsic virtue which acts as a charm against evil, but that the Lord is our Shield, as we accept Him to be so, coming between us and evil. It is a common difficulty submission to the will of God, with asking for and claiming deliverance from evil. In the Lord's Prayer we are taught to pray, "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven," and at the same time "deliver us from evil." While we believe that God is equally the Author of good and of evil, we are endlessly confused between these two things. But when we see that "every good gift and every perfect gift is from above" (James 1: 17), and that it is Satan who brings about evil, although always subject to God, we have the true solution of the difficulty. The will of God is never evil, but always "good, acceptable and perfect" (Rom. 12: 2). God never calls upon us to call evil good or good evil. In the longest enumeration of evils which we have in the Bible (Deut. 28.), God calls them all curses, whether vexation, rebuke, pestilence, war, famine, sickness, bereavement, loss of property, or other evils—all these things are curses, the fruit of sin which Satan introduced into the world. How, then, shall we pray "Thy will be done," if this work be Satan's work? Here comes in the teaching of chastisement [education, see Gr.]. God's education is to drive us to Himself. Evil is evil; Paul called infirmity by no other name, but yet rejoiced in it that the power of Christ might rest upon him (II Cor. 12: 9). And again and again the power of Christ did rest upon him, delivering him from stoning, from prison, from the mob at Jerusalem, from the viper in Melita. It is just when we recognize with joyfulness and therefore pray "Thy will be done," that God shows us the love there is in His will and how His will is our deliverance. He makes "all things work together for good to them that love God" (Rom. 8: 28); that love Him enough to trust Him, and rest in Him, and count upon Him, and who give up trying to help themselves, because help enough is laid "upon One that is mighty." That submission is not sitting down under a trial and trying to make the best of it, but it consists in handing over ourselves and our trials to God, for Him to bring His best out of them. Thus real submission comes to be that which Peter teaches, "Humble yourselves, therefore, under the mighty hand of God, that He may exalt you in due time; casting all your care on Him, for He careth for you" (I Pet. 5: 6, 7.)

GOD'S RIGHT TO TRY US,

This was just what Paul had done. When the Spirit witnessed in every city that bonds and afflictions abode him, he did not hesitate for a moment to take them from the hands of God, neither dealing with the things, nor with the enemy of his soul who would attempt to overthrow his confidence in God's love by them. "None of these things move me," he said; "I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus." And yet when the Lord made a way of escape, Paul always accepted it from Him, rejoicing in the trial that God might glorify Himself in the deliverance. Now he was in the very city which he had visited on his way to Jerusalem; he had many friends there, but he knew not whether he should see them. This, however, he did know, that he was in the will of God, that the things which happened unto him were for the furtherance of the Gospel (Phil. 1: 12), and that for such an object he was equally ready to live or to die.

The soldiers delivered up their prisoner with the chief captain's letter to Felix, who, when he had read it, asked Paul of what province he was. "And when he understood that he was of Cilicia; I will hear thee, said he, when thine accusers are also come. And he commanded him to be kept in Herod's judgment hall."

Paul before Felix. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

GEORGE WASHINGTON First President of the United States—The Monument dedicated last Saturday.

GEORGE WASHINGTON,

The Father of his Country.

IN giving pictures of the monument inaugurated last Saturday to the memory of Washington, we also give a vignette representing the noble yet familiar features of our national hero. It would be an insult to our readers to give here a sketch of that life so full of brilliant achievements, of wise conduct and devoted patriotism. Every citizen who has learned to read, and even those who have never mastered that art, are familiar with all the details of Washington's life. Very rightly, the children in our schools are taught from the first to know and reverence his character. They have followed his footsteps from his cradle, know well the incident of the cherry tree, and are taught to admire the boy "who could not tell a lie." They have learned all about his private life in manhood, his piety and integrity, and unflinching firmness in all cases in which truth and honesty and the right were involved. His speeches have been learned by heart, and his public career is the very commencement and foundation of historical education. The books in which our greatest writers have told the heroic story are in every home, and their words live in all our memories. The founder of the nation, or, as we love to call him, "the Father of his Country," was a man too noble, too worthy in every way of our deepest respect and veneration to be an unknown man to the humblest and most ignorant among us. We therefore refrain from printing here the well-worn story.

The last word about Washington has not, however, been spoken. It is pleasant to find that the grandeur of his character is coming to appreciation outside the borders of the land in which he built the foundations of a mighty nation. Within the last few days the foremost of England's statesmen, the prime-minister of the nation which Washington humiliated, and the suffocating grip of which he shook off the throat of his beloved land, has written a touching eulogium on the character of America's national hero. Mr. Gladstone is a man of profound scholarship, and his learning and literary powers are admitted by men who distrust his statesmanship. Probably no living Englishman is better fitted to judge impartially of the merits of an historical character or one whose opinion of true greatness is better entitled to respect.

THE HIGHEST PEDESTAL.

Mr. Gladstone, writing of Washington, says: "When I first read in detail the Life of Washington, I was profoundly impressed with the moral elevation and greatness of his character, and I found myself at a loss to name among the statesmen of any age or country many, or possibly any, who could be his rival. In saying this I mean no disparagement to the class of politicians, the men of my own craft and cloth, whom, in my own land, and my own experience, I have found no less worthy than other men of love and of admiration. I could name among them those who seem to me to come near even to him. But I will shut out the last half century from the comparison. I will then say that if, among all the pedestals supplied by history for public characters of extraordinary nobility and purity, I saw one higher than all the rest, and if I were required at a moment's notice to name the fittest occupant for it, I think my choice, at any time during the last forty-five years, would have lighted, and it would now light, upon Washington."

Such a eulogium is fitly acknowledged by Mr. Evarts, Senator-elect of New York, in these words: "The supremacy of the character and fame of Washington, which Mr. Gladstone assigns to him, has been accorded by the most eminent statesmen, historians, and orators of England, from the time of his contemporaries to the present day. Indeed, the judgment of all Europe is scarcely less general or less exalted in its homage. In our own country this supremacy of Washington has been most clearly demonstrated and illustrated by those most competent to weigh and measure the true elements of human greatness, and most conversant with the whole public and private conduct of his illustrious life. The value to the history and permanence of our political institutions of the immense influence of this majestic life cannot be exaggerated. Other nations are ready to accept, with us, the impressive sentiment of Fisher Ames, that 'Washington changed mankind's ideas of political greatness.'"

Well is it for us as a nation that, looking back through our history to the great figure that stands at its source, we see a man noble in the highest sense of the word. Not a man ambitious, grasping for personal power, eager to raise himself to a throne, intriguing for his own advancement, but a man unselfish, patriotic, veracious, and, above all, fearing God and living in His sight. May our statesmen be brought to a closer study of his life and a determination to forget self, as he did, and labor patriotically for the public weal.

THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

It has long been a reproach to us as a people that no fitting monument exists in the land to "the Father of his Country." Happily that reproach can no longer bring a blush to the cheek of patriotic citizens. The monument inaugurated last week with imposing ceremonies has no equal in the world. It rears its head far above any structure ever erected by man. Even in its defects it is appropriate. It lacks ornament, and it is ungraceful, but it is gigantic, massive, and severely plain. Fit memorial of the man whose virtues have endeared his memory to the hearts of the nation he founded. Not by showy accomplishments, not by the graces of oratory, not even by military genius is he chiefly remembered and honored. It is George Washington, the plain, simple, honest, unpretending patriot, ready to do and die for his country, seeking no honor for himself, satisfied if his country was liberated and its freedom established on a firm basis, even though he might be unhonored and forgotten—it is George Washington, the man of rugged virtue and inflexible principle, that we honor, and it is fitting that the monument, which will speak to all the world of his country's gratitude, should be such as it is.

As will be seen from the picture on the first page, the monument is a simple shaft of gigantic proportions. Its height is five hundred and fifty-five feet, which is thirty feet higher than the famous spire of the Cathedral of Cologne in Germany. That, however, is only the measurement from the top of the base. Reckoning from the foundation to the top of the obelisk, the height is five hundred and ninety-two feet. The base of the obelisk is fifty-five feet one and a half inches square, and the walls fifteen feet thick. At the top of the obelisk, five hundred feet from the base, where the pyramidal top begins, the size has tapered to thirty-four feet five and a half inches square, with the walls eighteen inches thick.

A peculiar feature is the shining point of aluminium at the top of the capstone. This newly-discovered metal was selected for its comparative freedom from oxidation, as well as its value as a conductor of electricity in its use as a lightning conductor. It is secured by a wrought copper rod leading down through the centre of the capstone, and connects below with each of the four columns that form the elevator frame in the main shaft. At the base of the monument these leaders are conducted to the well beneath the centre of the foundation, thus forming the most perfect electrical conductor known to science. The ceremony of placing the aluminium capstone on the summit is depicted on the first page.

THE TOTAL COST of the monument has been $1,130,000, of which $900,000 was appropriated at various times by Congress, and $230,000 the gifts of private citizens. The engineer to whom was committed the task of completing the monument is Colonel Thomas Lincoln Casey, whose untiring energy and admirable skill have been signally displayed in the final consummation of the undertaking. It is gratifying to learn that, although the stupendous height of the structure rendered the operation of building unusually dangerous, there has not been a single life lost during the progress of the work.

THE HISTORY of the structure is a remarkable one. The monument was first proposed in the Continental Congress. On August 7th, 1783, a resolution was passed unanimously, that "an equestrian statue of General Washington be erected at the place where the residence of Congress shall be established." The Congress also directed that the statue should be supported by a marble pedestal, on which should be represented four principal events of the Revolutionary War, in which he commanded in person. On the pedestal were to be engraved the following words:

"The United States, in Congress assembled, ordered this statue to be erected in the year of our Lord 1783, in honor of George Washington, the illustrious Commander-in-Chief of the Armies of the United States of America, during the war which vindicated and secured their liberty, sovereignty, and independence."

Ten years passed, and nothing was done toward executing the work ordered by the resolution. It was not until 1790 that "the residence of Congress" was fixed. When the city of Washington was finally planned, a site was reserved for the statue on a spot between the site of the White House and the Potomac. The commissioners duly notified Congress of their selection of the place, and the President—Washington himself—forwarded the report to Congress. He therefore was cognizant of the design and the place selected for the memorial. Three years later he died, and then Congress changed its mind about the statue, and appropriated $200,000 to build a mausoleum for him. It was intended that the sarcophagus should be under the Capitol, and a place was reserved for it there. Madam Washington's consent was obtained, but without some reluctance on her part, but the body was never removed from Mount Vernon.

Half a century elapsed from the time the project first saw light, and still no practical steps had been taken. Several efforts, however, were made toward realizing the idea; among them was one by Mr., afterward President, Buchanan, who, on January 15th, 1824, moved a resolution in the House of Representatives calling for the appointment of a committee to take the matter in hand. But after debate the resolution was tabled, and for nine years more the project slumbered. An equestrian statue was at length executed in 1839 by Horatio Greenough, and placed in the public square fronting the Capitol. Mr. Everett pronounced it "one of the greatest works of sculpture of modern times," but his opinion has not been universally indorsed.

But this was not a national monument in the sense in which the people understood the words. In September, 1833, a meeting of the citizens of Washington was called to arrange for the erection of a really great monument, to be paid for by general subscription. The gifts were limited to one dollar each, and a Monument Association was formed to receive them. Judge Marshall was President and George Waterson was Secretary. In 1836 the subscriptions received amounted to $28,000. The money was invested, and no further steps were taken. For another ten years the project lay dormant, but during that time the original sum was increased by the interest and new subscriptions. The committee had in hand in 1847 $87,000, and then it was resolved to commence work. The site selected by Washington himself, in 1795, was formally granted for the purpose by Congress on January 31st, 1848, and five months later, on Independence Day of that year, was laid. The oration on that day was delivered by the Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, then Speaker of the House of Representatives. For ix years the work went steadily forward; the monument reached the height of one hundred and seventy feet, and $130,000 had been spent upon it. Then, as subscriptions had ceased to flow in, the work was suspended. Several efforts had been made to replenish the treasury of the committee. One of these was in 1852, when boxes were placed at the polls on the day of the Presidential election, and the money deposited therein was used for the fund. It was, however, completely exhausted in 1854. During the next few years, of course, nothing was one, the exciting political questions of the time, the gathering war-clouds, and finally the terrific struggle between North and South occupied all minds, and the scheme of the monument waited.

THE CORNER-STONE

THE CENTENNIAL YEAR, however, revived interest in the work. As the people considered the event they were celebrating, and attention, released, after so long tension, on the absorbing question of national existence, reverted to that brave fight a century before, enthusiasm for the honored hero of the fight revived. Congress then lifted the matter out of the hands of the Association, and charged self with responsibility for the funds. An appropriation was made and the work recommenced. The foundations of the monument are strengthened and extended, a work which occupied four years for its accomplishment. At length, in 1886, the citizens of Washington saw the monument, so long an eyesore in its unfinished state, slowly rising toward completion. Finally, in November, 1884, the shining apex of aluminium was placed in position, and the exterior of the monument was complete. The interior of the structure will not be actually finished for two years yet. Iron stairways and sculptural ornamentation yet remains to be done there, but the exterior is now as it will be till the end of time.

One of the most interesting features of the interior are the blocks of stone sent, on the invitation of the Monument Association, by every state of the Union and by many foreign countries and cities. There are nearly one hundred of these blocks, many of them curious for their emblems or other inscriptions. Brigham Young sent one; one is from Braddock's field; one offesses to be from the ruins of the Alexandrian Library; one is from the "Merchants in China"; one is from a temple in Carthage, and one from the Government of Greece. These contributions, many of them highly polished and elegantly inscribed, make the monument a museum of mineralogical treasures.

Thus, after the vicissitudes of more than a hundred years, this generation sees the conception realized which Washington's contemporaries, and every generation which has succeeded them to the present, regarded as the proper expression of the homage of the nation to him who is seen, and still is, "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

THE STATUE IN WALL STREET, New York, erected on the spot where Washington was inaugurated first President of the United States, is the largest statue of him in the country. (A picture of the statue appears on page 141.) It is the work of John Q. A. Ward, is of light-colored bronze, and is of colossal size, being about thirteen feet six inches in height, and weighs sixty-five hundred pounds. The head is two feet in height and two feet broad, in extreme measurement. The extreme breadth of the statue is six feet. The pedestal which it stands is about six feet in height, and what may be called the rostrum, on which the pedestal is placed, is about seven feet above street-level. This and the pedestal were designed by Richard M. Hunt.

Washington, in the statue, is supposed to be the act of taking the oath of office. The left arm is slightly advanced and the right hand is extended. The left hand rests on the hilt of his sword. The figure is dressed in the costume of a period—open coat, long waistcoat, knee-breeches and stockings, with low-cut shoes and buckles. Around the neck is the old-fashioned cravat. Frills are displayed at the shirt-front and ruffles at the wrist. The body is erect, and the head is held high. The features express calm dignity and power. To the right of the figure is a short column of fescues, on which rests an open Bible. A military cloak hangs from the left shoulder and partly conceals the left arm, affording a mass of drapery for a background.

The inscription, cut in large, plain letters on the rostrum face, is:

ON THIS SITE,
In the building then known as Federal Hall,
GEORGE WASHINGTON
Took the Oath of Office as First President of
THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
April 30th, A.D. 1789.

Altogether, the work cost about $35,000, of which ninety per cent was subscribed by members of the Chamber of Commerce. The statue was cast by the Henry and Bonnard Bronze Manufacturing Company, of New York. Our illustration shows the statue, together with the memorial stone (surrounded by a railing) on which Washington stood when he took his first oath of office as President.

THE DYNAMITE EXPLOSION IN THE TOWER OF LONDON.

BESIDE the explosion in the House of Commons on January 24th, described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last week, there was almost simultaneously an explosion in the Tower. A picture of this historic building as it appears from the river Thames appears on page 140.

The Tower of London is the oldest and most celebrated fortress in Great Britain, and its story is interwoven with every prominent event in the history of England for nearly a thousand years. Tradition has assigned the erection of the original tower to Julius Cæsar, and Shakespeare mentions it as having been current in his day. The oldest portion of the Tower of London now in existence, the isolated keep or donjon, which occupies the centre of the inclosure, and is known as the White Tower, is, however, not nearly so old as that. It was built by William the Conqueror in 1078. The fortress stands on Tower Hill, on the left bank of the Thames, a locality made historical by the number of executions which took place on the ground in ancient days. At this point the river Thames runs in a direction a little north of west, and forms the southern boundary of the fortifications. Starting from the river on either side of the fortress is a moat, which passes around the four land sides, making, with the river, a pentagonal piece of land above twelve acres in area, within which the fortifications are constructed. This moat is now converted into a garden, which blossoms with fragrant flowers in the summer, but the ditch can always be flooded, so that its original character as a means of defence is preserved.

On the inner side of the moat is a solid wall, varying in height from thirty to forty feet, and surmounted by towers which command every approach. At the south-west angle of the wall rises the Bell Tower. Just to the right of this, and opening upon the Thames, is the Traitor's Gate, beneath a wide arch, which was restored and rebuilt in 1866. This gate is now closed. It gained its name from the fact that prisoners of state taken to the Tower by water were admitted through its gloomy portals. Nearly opposite to the Traitor's Gate rises the Bloody Tower, in which were murdered by order of Gloster, afterward Richard III., the princes Edward V. and Duke of York, sons of King Edward IV.

In the Bloody Tower the crown jewels are now kept and exhibited to visitors. These include the crown made for the coronation of Charles II. and used since his time for the coronation of all of England's sovereigns; the crown made for the coronation of Queen Victoria, which is a cap of purple velvet inclosed by hoops of silver and studded with a profusion of diamonds; the Prince of Wales's crown of pure gold unadorned by jewels; the Queen Consort's crown of gold set with diamonds and pearls; the Queen's diadem, made for the coronation of Maria d'Este, Queen of James II.; the royal sceptre; the great Koh-i-noor diamond, and a large collection of other costly jewels belonging to the crown of Great Britain.

The Tower has been in its history the prison of many illustrious captives. Some of them never left its portals until they left life also. Many were beheaded within its walls, and their bodies still lie mouldering in its soil. Among them are two wives of King Henry VIII., the unhappy Anne Boleyn, who was beheaded in 1536, and Queen Katherine Howard, beheaded in 1542; Sir Thomas More, whose head was posted on London Bridge; Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex; Margaret, Countess of Shrewsbury; Lady Jane Grey and her husband, Lord Guilford Dudley, beheaded in 1553; and a number of others who fell victims to the hatred or fear of the English monarchs of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

The explosion which occurred on January 24th took place while a party were being conducted round the White Tower. This ancient keep is divided into three flats, on the second of which is the chapel of St. John and the banqueting hall, now filled with arm racks containing many thousands of Martini Henry rifles. The hall above, known as the horse armory, contains the life-sized figures of mediæval knights on horseback, displaying the various types of armor of the period. Above the crash of broken glass, the cracking of roofs and floors, the knocking and cramming together of shattered stands of rifles, arose the screams and yells of visitors, more from fright than actual injury. Many, however, were badly cut by the broken glass. Every window, about sixty in all, was broken; those on the east side of the Tower, where the primary force was exercised, were shattered, though the sills were not blown out.

It is believed that the dynamite must have been placed by one of the visitors behind one of the rifle racks which stand at the distance of a few inches from the wall which divides the chapel from the banqueting-room.

The custodians of the Tower had the presence of mind to close the gates immediately after the explosion, and every person within the building was examined before being allowed to leave. Among those thus detained was the man Cunningham, whose false statements led to suspicion being excited, and further inquiries confirmed the belief that it was he who caused the explosion. He is now on his trial for high treason.

This dynamite conspiracy is one of the meanest, most dastardly developments of the Irish question. While every law-abiding citizen must condemn it, we cannot sympathize with the English Government as we should if its own hands were clean. The Parliament during the last fifty years has obstinately refused to redress the grievances of Ireland. English peers and capitalists have taken advantage of the imprudence and improvidence of the Irish people, and secured possession of the land, while the former owners and their dependents have been left to starve. The government has stood by and seen the people plundered, and has not protected them. Now the protests and respectful petitions, which the government and the Parliament refused to hear, have been taken up by desperate and wicked men, who, by outrages, are compelling public attention to the misery of their countrymen. The English nation is learning now the lesson, which all history teaches, that God still governs the world and will not allow oppression and misgovernment to go unpunished. The Bible proclaims it over and over again, the history of every nation in the world testifies to it, but the lesson was not heeded, and experience, the hardest of all teachers, has now taken the stand (Dan. 4: 27, 37).

ABOLITION OF SUNDAY.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Feb. 22, 1885.

"Verily my Sabbaths ye shall keep."—Ex. 31: 13.

The Value of the Sabbath Acknowledged—True of Man—True of Beast—True of Machinery—Man a Seven-Day Clock—The Assault on the Sabbath—A Defence League Needed—Ten Thousand Voters to Influence Judges—The Assault of Secular Amusements—Sacred Concerts—A Sailor's Reply to a Captain—The Lord's Rights—The Parisian Sunday—A Christian Sunday—The Sabbath in the Mayflower—An Outrage on Employes—A War on our Political Institutions—The Commune Follows a Desecrated Sabbath—The Thermopylae of the Republic.

IN preaching this sermon, I remember that I am discoursing, in a brief series, upon what the evangelical churches believe: and I remember also that I am to join in the protest against that movement which would throw open all the liquor shops of Brooklyn on the Sabbath Day. Both promises I shall keep. While the evangelical denominations put especial emphasis upon the sanctity of the Sabbath, I am glad to know that one day in the seven is almost universally acknowledged. Men have found out that they can do more work in six days than they can in seven. The world has found out that the fifty-two days of rest are not a subtraction, but an addition. It has been demonstrated in all departments. Lord Castlereagh thought he could work his brain three hundred and sixty-five days in the year, and he broke down and committed suicide; and Wilberforce said in regard to him: "Poor Castlereagh! this comes from non-observance of the Sabbath." A prominent merchant of New York said: "I should long ago have been a maniac but for the observance of the Sabbath." The nerves, the brain, the muscles, the bones, the entire physical, mental, and moral constitution cry out for Sabbath rest.

What is true of man is TRUE OF BEAST,

Travellers have found that they come sooner to their destination if they stop one day in the seven. What is the matter of some of these horses attached to the street cars as the poor creatures go stumbling and staggering on? They are robbed of the Sabbath rest. In the days of old, when the sheep and the cattle were driven from the far West to the sea-coast, it was found out by positive test that those drovers got sooner to the seaboard who stopped one day in seven on the way. They came sooner to the seaboard than those who drove right on. The fishermen off the banks of Newfoundland have experimented in this matter, and they find that they catch more fish in the year when they observe the Sabbath than in the year when they do not observe the Sabbath.

TRUE OF MACHINES.

When I asked a Rocky Mountain locomotive engineer, as I was riding with him, "Why do you switch off your locomotive on a side track and take another?"—as I saw he was about to do—"it seems to be a straight route," he replied: "Oh, we have to let the locomotive stop and cool off, or the machinery would very soon break down!" The manufacturers of salt were told if they allowed their kettles to cool one day in seven they would have immense repairs to make; but the experiment was made, and the contrast came, and it was found that those manufacturers of salt who allowed the kettles to cool once a week had less repairs to make than those who kept the furnaces in full blast and the kettles always hot. What does all this mean? It means that intellectual man and dumb beast and dead machinery cry out for the Lord's day.

A manufacturer declared that the goods his men manufactured in the early part of the week and right after the Sabbath rest were always better than the goods manufactured in the latter part of the week and when his men were tired. The Sabbath comes, and it soothes the nerves, and it puts out the fires of anxiety which have burned all the week. The fact is, we are seven-day clocks, and we have to be wound up once a week or we will run down into the grave.

THE SABBATH IS A SAVINGS BANK

into which we gather up our resources of physical and mental strength to draw on all the week. That man gives a mortgage to disease and death who works on the Sabbath, and at the most unexpected moment the mortgage will be foreclosed and the soul ejected from the premises. Every gland, every cell, every globule, every finger-nail, cry out: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy!"

THE SABBATH IN BUSINESS.

A London banker says: "I came to London thirty years ago, and I have had a great deal of observation, and I have noticed that the bankers who went to their places of business on the Sabbath, and attended to affairs, and settled up their accounts, failed, and without one exception." A Boston merchant says: "I have observed a long while, and I have noticed when out on the Long Wharf merchants kept their men busy loading vessels on Sunday, and at work from morn until night on the sacred day. I noticed all those merchants came to nothing, and their children came to nothing." "Gentlemen," said a merchant, although he is a man of the world—"gentlemen, it don't pay to work on Sunday."

THE ASSAULT ON THE SABBATH.

While the flail and the axe and the yardstick have not been able to destroy the Sabbath, and the vast majority of people, from sanitary reasons, have about concluded it is best to rest on the Sabbath, there is an attempt to destroy the Lord's day, on one side by the grog-shops, and on the other side by secular amusements. We have a law in this State most positively forbidding the sale of intoxicating drinks on the Sabbath day. That law is every Sabbath broken. Some say: "Let it be repealed—a law on the statute book not executed, better drive out the law." Instead of that we say we want the law to continue on the statute book, and we mean to have it executed. There are three thousand liquor-dealers in Brooklyn banded together to put down this law, and they are moving upon the State Legislature, and they propose to have that law broken down and cast out from the statute book.

When one of our reformers comes up before a justice of the peace and reports some of these Sabbath-breakers, the justice of the peace looks over, and in almost every case excuses the criminal. Why? Because he knows there are three thousand liquor-dealers in Brooklyn who have their eyes on him, and they will remember it at the next election. Now, what we want is, on the other hand, to have ten thousand good, honest, upright citizens banded together in some excise league, demanding the execution of the law, so when a justice of the peace with the criminal before him remembers there are three thousand liquor-sellers who want him to discharge the criminal, he will have a vivid remembrance at the same time of the ten thousand honest citizens who demand the execution of the law; and these reformers who have been roughly jostled and caricatured and kicked out will be differently treated in times that are to come from the way they have been treated in the times that are past.

TIME FOR A LEAGUE.

Take the Sixteenth Ward of Brooklyn. In that Sixteenth Ward, six churches, two public schools, five breweries, three hundred and twenty-three liquor saloons. Out of the three hundred and twenty-three liquor saloons in the Sixteenth Ward, how many observe the Sabbath law? One! and three hundred and twenty-two are this moment breaking it. What a state of things that is for the City of Churches! All these mouths of hell this moment open, breathing death and destruction upon this city of Brooklyn. I say it is time for all good citizens, whether they are temperance men or not—it is time for all honest citizens, and all men who have a pride in their homes, to rise up and put down this infamous business, at any rate one day of the week. Certainly, if they have full swing Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, they ought to give us at least one day of rest from this awful evil which is abroad amid the nations.

Oh, to many of our citizens the best day is the worst day! They get their salaries, and they get their wages on Saturday night, and they get their wages on these places, and the which ought to have gone for the livelihood of the family goes for their own destruction. Where are you, the men who deal in cloth and hosiery and hardware and groceries, who are you who sell bread and shoes, that you should bow down to the liquor traffic? Your places of business closed up to-day, theirs open. Will you take off your hat to them? Is their business better than yours? Why should the law give especial privilege to these men who are trafficking in the bodies and souls of men? If a baker should se bread he would be very apt to be arrested. It is not safe to have loaves of bread going through the streets on Sundays. If a man should se shoes and boots it would be a very dangerous thing; he might be arrested. But all these places open on the Sabbath. If the front door is not open the back door is open. Now, I tell you, fellow-citizens, there is something awful wrong in this town when such things are allowed. Then, there is an effort being made by

to destroy our Sabbaths. In many of the cities all the or nearly all the places of theatrical or operatic entertainment are open. There are thousands of pens busy trying to write down a Christian Sabbath, and it is a question whether we are going to have pluck and grit and com cration enough to hand down to our children the Sabbath we got from our ancestors.

I am opposed to all these invasions of the Sabbath because they run against the divine ena ment. God says: "If thou turn away thy fr from doing thy pleasure on my holy day, th shalt walk upon the high places." What d He mean by "doing thy pleasure"? He me secular amusements. A man was telling how he was afflicted when during the time an earthquake he heard the bellowing of cattle in the field, and even the barnyard f screamed in horror. I tell you that it was time of earthquake, and when the mounta were full of fire, that God sent forth the ent ment: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep holy," the agonies of nature emphasizing divine injunction.

"Oh," says some one, "we ought to have these grave in other cities—we ought to h those grand SACRED CONCERTS!"

I saw a man who had seen one of these gr sacred concerts. He said interspersed amid music they had a dance and a tight-rope w and a trapeze performance. I suppose it w holy dance and a consecrated tight rope. not know about that, but I am certain it w "grand sacred concert." Oh, will a man God? Yes, he will; and every place of sec amusement that is open on Sabbath in any is grand larceny against the Lord God Almi The sailor was right. The captain discha all his crew because they would not wor Sabbath when they were in port. The cap went out to get another crew. He said to man: "I should like to have you on my sh The man said: "I should like to be employ "Will you work on Sunday?" "No," he not?" "Because a man that will rob God mightily will cheat me out of my wages."

Oh, have you ever looked at

THE MEANNESS OF THE DESECRATION of the Sabbath? Suppose you were a poor n and went to a dry-goods merchant, and begged for some articles of clothing, an should say to you, "I will give you nov yards of cloth," and while he goes off at one of the counter to bind up the six yards of c you slip in behind the counter and steal and yard. That is what every man does when he breaks the Sabbath. God gives us six days, and we want to steal the other.

"Oh," says some, "haven't you any regard for the people's rights?" Yes, I believe in the people having their rights, but has not the Lord any rights? You govern your family, and the governor rules the State, and the President rules the United States. Do you really think the Lord Almighty, who made the heavens and the earth, has a right to rule the universe? Had He a right to make the enactment, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy"? There is no higher court than that. I declare it now, in the presence of all the people, whether it be a popular or an unpopular thing to say, the people have no rights except those which the Lord God Almighty gives them.

I am opposed to all these infractions of the Sabbath because they are attempting to introduce in this country

THE PARISIAN SUNDAY.

Suppose now while I am speaking you should hear the gun of a foreign ship coming up the harbor. Suppose a bombshell should be thrown from a foreign frigate into this city. How soon the Tabernacle would be cleared, and we would be all ready for the contest, and where there was a gun it would be brought into requisition, and all the ships in the Navy Yard would be swung from their anchorage, and we would all be ready to confront such a foreign enemy. Now, they are trying to introduce into this country the Parisian Sabbath. How do you like it? Ye who were born under the shadow of the Adirondacks or the Catskills—ye who were born on the banks of the Tennessee or the Savannah, how would you like to have the Parisian Sunday introduced into this country?

We say to all who come from other lands, Come, come. I would have all the gates of the continent swung open. I would have the gates of San Francisco swung open toward Asia, and the gates of the Atlantic swung open toward Europe. If next year there should come eight hundred thousand from foreign lands, I would say, Let them come. You have not been to Texas, you have not been to Oregon if you are afraid. If you have any idea of the vast reaches of this country yet unoccupied, you are willing they shall come, and the more that come the better. But among those people who will come there is a division, the same as among people in this country—the law-abiding and the law-breakers. The law-abiding people, we want them to come. The law-breakers we do not want them. We do not want the monarchies of Europe. We do not want the Parisian Sunday. We do not want the Brussellian Sunday or the Dresdenian Sunday. We want to keep the quiet of our Christian Sabbath.

I was awakened in Paris by a great racket in the street, and I rushed to the window to see what was the matter. I said to some one: "What is the matter?" I said to another, "What is the matter?" "Oh," they replied, "it is Sunday!" Sunday! All the vehicles rushing hither and thither. People talking at the height of their voices and in the most boisterous manner. The Champs Elysées one great mass, one great mob of pleasure-seekers. Balloons flying; parrots chattering; footballs rolling; Punch and Judy shows in scores of places, each with a shouting audience; hand-organs and cymbals and all styles of racket musical and unmusical. Sunday! Sunday! And then as the day passed on toward night I stood and saw the excursionists come home, fagged-out men, women, and children, a great Gulf Stream of fatigue and irritability and wretchedness. A drunken Fourth of July instead of a Christian Sunday. How would you like to have such a Sunday as that in this country?

Compare it with

in one of our best cities. At day-dawn a holy silence comes down. The business man tarries longer on the pillow because there are no store doors to open, no hard work to be engaged in.

The family tarry longer around the table. There is no rushing off to business. After awhile there is a song sung. After awhile there is a prayer offered, and after awhile, about ten o'clock, there is a long procession churchward, and there they praise God for His goodness, and they contribute to the poor, the suffering, and the wandering. Which Sunday do you like the best?

THE SABBATH BOAT.

I will tell you in which boat the Sabbath came to this country, and in which boat it will go out. The Sabbath came to this country in the Mayflower, and if it ever leaves, if the Sabbath ever leaves this country, it will go in the ark that floats above a deluge of a destroyed nation. If you have ever been in Brussels or in Paris on the Sabbath day it requires no great persuasion for me on my part to get you to pray morning, noon, and night that such a Sabbath may never come to this country.

Then it is such

AN OUTRAGE ON EMPLOYÉS.

Where do these bartenders get their Sunday? Do they get any more wages? No. The breaking down of Sunday, what does it mean? It means that a few men who toil shall toil seven days and get no more than they get for six. Then there are all the employés of the opera houses and the theatres—the scene-shifters, the ballet-dancers, the call-boys, the supernumeraries, making up thousands and thousands in this country. Where are they going to get their Sunday? You see them on the stage, with the tinsel and the tassels and the halberds, or you see them in gauze whirling in the toe tortures, and they seem queens or fairies; but after twelve o'clock at night see them going along the street in faded dress, shivering and cold and hungry, to their garrets or their cellars. It means that these people shall have no rest for the body and no rest for the soul. When you talk about opening places of secular amusement on the Sabbath, while there may be people outside of such establishments who are wanting them, there are many of these employés who are practically praying, "O God, let the crushing Juggernaut stop one day in seven!" It is a swindling process upon employés. It is a proposition to give no Sabbath to thousands and thousands and thousands of people in this country.

Then all these movements are

A WAR UPON OUR POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS.

When the Sabbath goes down the Republic goes down. Dissoluteness is inconsistent with self-government. Sabbath-breaking is dissoluteness. What is the matter with republicanism in Italy and in Spain? No Sabbath. What is the matter with republicanism in France? France got a republic, but one day the modern Napoleon rode through the Champs Elysées, and the republic went down under the clattering hoofs. France has a republic again, but how often it quakes from end to end, and one of the Commune has only just to plaster an insurgent advertisement against a stone wall, and all France is aquake and in fear of revolution that is to come. France will never have any quiet, happy, and permanent republic until she quits her roystering Sabbaths and recognizes God and sacred things. Abolish the Sabbath, and then you have

THE COMMUNE IN AMERICA.

Abolish the Sabbath, and then you have revolution, and then you have the sun of prosperity going down in darkness and in blood. May the Lord God of Lexington and Bunker Hill and Gettysburg avert the catastrophe! O men and women who believe in Christian things, O men and women in favor of popular liberty, stand in solid phalanx in this Thermopylæ of our national history, for as certainly as I stand here and you sit there, the triumph or overthrow of republican institutions in this country will be decided in this Sabbatic contest.

Rally your voices, your pens, your printing-presses and all your influence in the Lord's artillery corps in behalf of the Christian Sabbath. Decree before high heaven that the Sabbath which you received from your ancestors shall go down undamaged to your children. For those who die battling in this contest we will chisel the epitaph: "These are they who came out of great tribulation, and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb." But for that man who proves recreant to the cause of God and his country in a crisis like this, there shall be no honorable epitaph, and he shall not be worthy of any burial-place in all this land, but perhaps some steam tug at midnight may take him out and drop him in the sea where the lawless winds which observe no Sunday may gallop over the grave of him who in life and death proved himself a traitor to the cause of God and American institutions. Long live the Christian Sabbath! Perish forever all attempt to overthrow it!

REMARKABLE FAITH-CURES.

A PECULIARLY interesting case, very distressing in its earlier features, and correspondingly joyful in its results, has been brought to our notice. We gladly publish the particulars. During the latter days of last month a gentleman residing at North Vineland, N. J., visited an adjoining town to make purchases for his household. A heavy affliction was preying upon his heart. His beloved wife had been for five months in a critical mental condition, the result of physical causes, and was rapidly becoming worse owing to insomnia. He was led to buy a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and read it on his way home. Providentially it was the number containing an account of the cure of an afflicted lady through faith and prayer, in which Captain Pennington was instrumental. The narrative inspired the distressed husband with hope, and he immediately wrote to Captain Pennington begging for his advice and his prayers. "My dear young wife," wrote the husband, "suffers greatly in mind, and we have tried doctors of different schools and medicines, but without effect. Be so kind, Captain, as to pray that she may be restored to her mind again."

Captain Pennington replied on January 20th, quoting our Saviour's words on the gift of healing, and praying that upon her reading them the afflicted lady might receive healing for the mind and conversion for the soul through faith. There was no doubt in the mind of the writer, and he was therefore not surprised when, on February 7th, he received the news of the lady's complete recovery. It was told in three letters—one from the lady herself, the second from her husband, and the third from a lady residing in the same house who witnessed the malady and its removal. Peace and rest and joy in the Lord have succeeded a mental distraction so fierce that the sufferer and those about her were led to believe that she was the victim of demoniacal possession.

A brother said recently at Bethshan: "It is twenty years since my health failed, through BLOOD-POISONING."

From 1864 to 1874 I tried to continue my work in spite of bad health. At last I became so much worse that I consulted a physician in Manchester. At this time I had become so distressed in body and soul that I would spend days and nights in weeping, sitting over the fire with one thought—that of self-destruction—continually before me. The doctor ordered me to take a voyage to Australia. I obeyed his order, but was no better on my return. A second time I made the voyage to Australia, but only grew worse. While away, I lay for exactly twelve months in a hospital. I did return, however, in 1879, but was no better than when I first left home in 1875. Then for a long time I tried one means of cure after another, but with no result. At last I went to a testimony meeting, and there heard people tell how they sought Jesus in their distress, and had been delivered. I thought the Lord surely could not, and would not, find in His heart to turn such a one as me away. I then found I could raise enough shillings to take me to 161, Islington, Liverpool, where I went, and was healed.

THE COMING REVOLUTION IN ENGLAND.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

As chroniclers of passing events, we cannot omit to notice the great political revolution which is slowly and surely being prepared by Democracy in Britain. We have now for twenty years maintained by voice and pen that before the end of the nineteenth century Britain will, according to Scripture prophecy, be revolutionized by a red communistic convulsion, exceeding in violence the French Revolution. As the chief violence of the French Revolution was from 1789 to 1796, so the chief coming Great Revolution will be one hundred years later, about the period 1889 to 1896.

The Land League agitation in Ireland, which has now spread to some parts of Scotland, is one commencement of it, and Mr. Chamberlain's recent announcement* that the Radical programme is to apply the new Irish Land Act in due time to the whole of England, and extensive land reforms are to be introduced, indicates extensive changes in the future, which will cause a great commotion. It is a startling fact that Mr. Chamberlain is most likely to succeed Mr. Gladstone on his retirement or death, and thus Britain may soon have a Prime Minister who is pronounced by even some Liberal journals to be more or less an advocate of Communism.

At first sight, the plan of confiscating excessive accumulations of land, or other property, especially that which has been dishonestly acquired, and giving it to the State or community for the benefit of the people, seems very plausible, for when two infants are born in a parish, why should one inherit all the land without doing a stroke of work, and the other be condemned to work hard all his life on starvation wages, through no fault of his own? The theory that both being brought into existence by the same Creator should therefore share and share alike the produce of the land seems more just and fair than that a monopoly of wealth should be dealt out to one and of misery to the other.

Why, for example, should Lord Dudley inherit coal mines and land producing him five thousand dollars a day, while colliers have to slave all the week to get the coal out of those mines and enable him to realize that wealth, for doing which work they receive less than one dollar a day? It would certainly seem fairer to insist that they should have a larger share of the produce of their own labor. They have, in fact, been robbed for years of part of their just wages, although competition has forced them to accept less wages than was their proper share.

Justice would seem reasonably to suggest that great landowners and capitalists, whose property has come to them by Court favoritism, or monopolies, or inadequate payment of their workmen, or gambling speculation, or who have used that wealth for selfish indulgence, instead of the good of their fellow-creatures, ought to have their wealth taken from them, and be compelled to take off their coats, and for the first time in their lives do an honest day's work for their living. They might raise the cry of "robbery," but it is they who have robbed their fellow-creatures of their just dues.

The difficulty, however, is to keep the system of just confiscation within reasonable bounds. When once commenced, it will never stop. The French Revolution of 1792 began with a hopeful reformation of existing abuses, but it soon degenerated into riots, tumults, and sanguinary conflicts, and finally cruel tyranny of bloodthirsty mobs. This is just what will be repeated in Britain and Europe during the next few years. Therefore it would be better on the whole for things to remain as they are, for it would be the less of the two evils. But we already see the revolution commencing, and every succeeding year will mark its onward progress.

We may add that the startling political programme announced by Mr. Chamberlain is regarded by many newspapers as indicating momentous changes. The Daily Telegraph, which is one of the organs of Mr. Chamberlain's party, says his proposal to apply the Irish Land Act to England, is an announcement, the importance of which can hardly be exaggerated. The Standard says it indicates that capitalists as well as large landowners will presently be dispossessed of their accumulated wealth. All agree with the correctness of his statement, that the result of the Franchise Bill is that, "For good or for evil, Democracy has established itself in the seat of authority, and the government of the many will be substituted for the government of the few."

NAPLES AFTER THE CHOLERA.

A CHRISTIAN lady in Naples recently spent a day in visiting the poor who live in the quarters in which cholera did its most fatal work last fall. Her guide was Mr. Jones, an active Christian worker who has established a mission in the city. The following extracts are from a letter in which she describes the scenes she witnessed in the course of her exploration:

"We left the carriage at Bassoporto, as the streets after that were too narrow to allow it to pass, and Mr. Jones and I made our way through Purgatorio, Sedile del Pomo, Orifici, Pendino, Bassa Mercati, Divino Amore, La Giudica, or Jews' quarter, all historical names, which, with the aspect of the streets, seemed to transport one back into the middle ages; the massive arched entrances into the old Pallayos, which could easily withstand a raid of Saracen pirate fleets, the funny little shops all along the ground floors, each street occupied by one trade as in the times of the ancient trades guilds. The Orifici consists of several streets with a pretty little square in the centre, entirely devoted to the manufacture of pearl jewels for the contadine, or peasant woman.

"The Bassa Mercati is a narrow street swarming with life, and continually traversed overhead by arches to prevent the houses from falling against each other. Here there are little dens of shops where they sell pieces of rich old silks and brocades, embroideries and lace, for altars and priests' garments. It is only the central street of each quarter which contains these shops. The side and cross-streets are beyond description squalid and depressing; some were so narrow that two foot-passengers must go sideways to pass each other. After going through them it seemed quite cheery to come out into the street leading to the Divino Amore, entirely occupied by the workshops of the makers of church ornaments in gold and silver.

"I have dwelt on the local features of these quarters because the decree has gone forth to demolish these dens of picturesqueness and pestilence. In a few years they will be remembered only in name, and replaced by wide streets, up which the sea breezes can blow, and where we shall be blinded by the scorching, searching, wholesome sun. It was in the Pendino that during the worst days of cholera they could not bury the dead quickly enough, and they were piled at the corners of the streets. One day there were twelve hundred deaths, when the burial register only gave five hundred. It was here that the splendidly-made young marinari, boatmen and fishermen, gathered in from the Marinella, and walked the streets in religious procession all day, with naked feet, carrying heavy crosses of wood on their backs, and wearing crowns of thorns, the blood trickling down from temples and cheeks. The shops were shut, and the streets forsaken, except for some despairing woman, who would rush out, tearing her hair and weeping for children, uncomfortable because they were not.

"The first woman Mr. Jones took me to see lived up a narrow staircase of rough stone, worn into holes, sloping, and slippery with mud; half the width of each landing was occupied by the rubbish heaps swept out of the rooms opening on either side—heaps which made one hold one's breath. On the fourth floor we turned into a room containing six beds. A little girl showed us with pride the clothes she wore, which were a gift from the Methodist Ladies' Sewing Society. A little crowd of poor, ill-fed women gathered round, and listened to the good and comforting words of Mr. Jones, addressed especially to one in bed whom he came to see.

"In visiting the next family, we entered by a cow byre, containing a brown and a white cow, evidently the important personages of the family; besides the cows there was a handsome young woman nursing a baby and a curly-headed child leaning against her knee—a living counterpart of so many pictures in Italian galleries of the stable at Bethlehem. Thence we went up to a second floor where were five beds, occupied by four families. The object of our visit was an old German lady in reduced circumstances. She and her family, consisting of her son, his Neapolitan wife, and seven children, rented the best corner of the room. One of the other three families, a husband and wife, were making cigarettes. I thought if some of the young loungers on the Chiaia, who were so terrified of cholera, could see where their cigarettes were made!

"Another family lived very high up; it was like going up a church tower. The last story overtopped the surrounding houses, and we looked over a tract of flat roofs, cut by what seemed narrow black ditches—these were the streets.

"In going from street to street, curiosity prompted me to peep into some of the dreadful Fondacci, courtyards surrounded by very high houses, the only access being a long, low, dank little tunnel. These places are very dark and dirty, the smells overpowering, and the dwellers there look at one with a kind of savage, sullen resentment. I do not wonder; it must seem to them a very offensive curiosity in prosperous people to come and spy out the nakedness of the land. I felt inclined to beg their pardon, and curb my exploring propensities.

"The aspect of the courtyard of one very high house I looked at haunts my memory. It was the size of a moderate-sized room. Half of it was occupied by the well, with a parapet round it, into which dangled six or seven ragged, knotted black ropes from the different stories, each story having its rope and bucket. The other half was a pool of green, stagnant, ill-smelling liquid, which one would have to cross to reach the foot of the common stair, which was built on arches open on one side, innumerable rooms opening on to it, and obtaining the only light they had from the staircase; and all the refuse thrown out of them falling into the well or the filthy pool which filled the rest of the court. It was almost like looking up the shaft of a mine to strain one's neck back to see the square patch of sky at the top.

"A woman passed me to go up the stairs—comely looking woman—with a face perfectly clean, though quite bloodless and hollow-eyed. She asked what I wanted. I said I was only looking at the house; but I knew there were tears in my eyes, for she gave such a sick, wilt smile as she looked all round, and realized the impression it made on me, and make a kind of hopeless wave of the hand and apologizing movement of the eyebrows, as if not to fail to do the honors of the place, such as it was. Mr. Jones spoke some kind words about the love of God brightening the darkest place. She looked all round it again with her wan, hopeless smile never speaking a word, and not looking much persuaded. I thought how loving Jesus was in beginning by relieving hunger and pain and deformity, and so winning the heart and converting the soul.

"The last of Mr. Jones's friends we visited lived on a fifth floor in a little upper chamber with some broken panes of glass in the window. She was a beautiful old woman, with delicately cut features, as white as marble on her pillow her splendid dark eyes dim from cataract, shcould only see us as moving shadows between her and the window. She had a broken leg, and lay on a mattress of vegetable hair, all worn into bumps and hollows. She also had seen better days, and spoke beautiful Tuscan Italian. She expressed herself with passionate eloquence as she reiterated her faith in Jesus as her only Saviour; the soul's life and fire seemed to assert its own separateness and superiority to the poor, enchained body, which lay like a beautiful carved image on a tomb. Mr. Jones prayed with her in his fluent Italian, she repeating the words after him. When we took leave she wound her fine, slender hands round my neck, and drew my face down and kissed me repeatedly and lovingly. I hope those beautiful blind eyes will soon open on the light and glory of Him in whom her soul trusted. Mr. Jones brought me home, telling me that on this day he had taken me to the aristocracy of his poor, and promising me another day with him among the more miserable, which I hope soon to claim."

ATHEISTIC FRANCE.

A STARTLING incident, which shows the direction in which public feeling in France is tending, and how lawlessness is increasing and spreading, is the ovation recently accorded to Madame Clovis Hugues. That lady, who is a wife and mother, deliberately shot a man whom she suspected of slandering her. She was placed on her trial for the murder, and was triumphantly acquitted. She did not deny her guilt—she rather gloried in it, and said that she would have killed another person at the same time if she could have found her. After her release her friends surrounded her and carried her in triumph to her home, and a perfect deluge of bouquets of choice flowers fell upon her from the hands of spectators who applauded her murderous conduct.

As public feeling here is fast tending in the same direction, it may be useful to notice the accompaniments of this sign of the times in France as they are described by Dr. Pressense. "The cause of Madame Hugues, and many others of a similar character which might be mentioned," says the French preacher, "argue a return to a state of barbarism; it is the old savage warfare reappearing in the midst of modern civilization, and facilitated by the more deadly appliances of the present day. The powers of evil have indefinitely multiplied their weapons of late, even apart from dynamite, the favorite tool of the anarchists everywhere. If might is allowed to override right in the nineteenth century, the sacrifice of life will be more terrible than ever. A chemist or pyrotechnist will be more formidable than Attila the Hun."

"The cause is a deterioration of the moral sense. Several leading journals, such as the Débat and the Temps, have frankly admitted this, and is to be found in the false philosophy which is saturating our intellectual atmosphere. This is the philosophy which recognizes nothing but matter and mechanical motion, which eliminates God from the world, which owns no morality but the morality of self-interest; and denying conscience, makes a clean sweep of duty, justice, and right. Force is the logical application of its morality, and no room is left for the State, which is nothing if it be not the embodiment of justice. The masters of this school of materialistic evolutionism are men of culture and moderation, incapable themselves of any acts of violence. Nothing could be more calm and cold than their learned lucubrations. And yet, to borrow M. Taine's expression, it is these very philosophers who let loose the savage in man, for as soon as the moral restraint is removed, as soon as man ceases to believe in the moral law and in the God who upholds it by the sanction of His justice, he becomes the mere slave of unrestrained passions.

THE NEW SECT

just founded at Ménémaulont will not do much to restore order in the disordered realm of morals. Its first meeting was held in a music-hall, a fitting birthplace of this travesty of religion. The following are some of its articles:

"Art. 2. The object of the society is to suppress the Word of God in all the languages of the world. As God is a fiction, His name has no meaning. It should therefore be expunged."

"Art. 3. No writer, journalist, or poet who is a member of this society is permitted to use the words God, Divine Power, or Providence, except to denounce them. They are never to be invoked, for such invocation perpetuates error by fostering the delusion that there is a supernatural power. The same rule is to be observed by all members of the society in their conversation and correspondence."

"Art. 4. In order to be consistent with the principles of our society it is well understood that the Word of God is not to be spoken in a funeral address over any member of the society. It is customary to close such funeral harangues with the word, Adieu. This custom must be broken through, and the words, In Memoriam, substituted."

"Art. 5. Every citizen, male or female, can belong to this society from birth. Fathers will sign for their children; the guardians for minors or orphans."

This blasphemous society, contemptible and ridiculous as it is, is one of the most significant signs of our times. It is perfectly logical, for men who ignore the government of God may reasonably be anxious that His name should be banished from human speech. This organized effort to suppress it marks another milestone in the world's march to the era in which it will pay honor to, and welcome the rule of "Antichrist, who denieth the Father and the Son" (1 John 2:22). A creed so impious finds its natural expression in contempt for human law as well as divine, and leads its votaries to pay their tribute of homage to a murderer.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Between the Moments.—Mr. Ralston, speaking at a recent meeting on the keeping power of Christ, said: "A little girl who had lately given her heart to the Lord went to her mother, and inquired, 'Mother, now that I am saved, how am I to be kept?' The mother very wisely answered, 'Just by looking to the Lord every moment, my child.' 'But, mother,' answered the little girl, 'I want to be kept between the moments.' 'Yes, my darling, He will keep you always and everywhere. He will never leave you, nor forsake you.'"

Good News on the Stairs.—The Rev. Mr. Andrews related: "Before admitting new members into the church, I always go to their own house and have some personal conversation with them. On one of these occasions I called upon a young woman, who told me that at the end of a Tuesday night meeting she was personally dealt with by a Christian friend there, and then she gave her heart to the Lord. On my way down stairs I met a woman, who said to me, 'I am glad to see you, Mr. Andrews; for I wanted to tell you that you were the means of my conversion years ago. A few words which you spoke were the means used to turn me to the Lord. How happy I felt for this unexpected intelligence!'"

Destroyed by Worms.—The Rev. Mr. Lee said: "There was an old oak tree that had stood the storms of winter for a hundred years, and under its friendly shelter two dear friends frequently met to speak of spiritual matters. One morning they went as usual to their meeting place, and found that the tree had fallen in the night, and they wondered that so strong a tree should fall without apparent cause. True, there had been a slight storm, but it had withstood far greater storms before. The two friends examined the tree to find the cause of its fall. The bark was perfectly whole, but when they looked at it more closely they found that the work of destruction had been going on gradually for years. The worms had been at work for a long time, and had eaten the inside of the tree almost completely away, although the outside looked as if there was nothing the matter. This is just like backsliding from the Lord; men and women do not all at once fall from their Christian profession, but they gradually leave off prayer, and the reading of the Bible; although it may not be noticed, the work of destruction is nevertheless going on until, like the tree, they surprise the world by their fall. Beware of the worms—and there are many—which eat away the Christian life, and deprive it of both beauty and vitality!"

A Drunkard's Son and Daughter.—A Christian gentleman related: "At the end of a meeting which I took part in lately, I spoke to a young girl about her soul; she professed to give herself to Jesus before leaving the meeting. We found, after she had gone, that about two years and a half ago her father's name was on the list of drunkards to be prayed for; and since that time his son, and now his daughter, had given themselves to the Saviour, although there was no change in him. We may notice that if we pray for a certain individual, though the Lord does not see fit to answer our prayers at once for that particular soul, He will answer it in converting perhaps some one in the house of the individual for whom special prayer has been made. Praying breath was never spent in vain."

A Fortunate Escape.—The Rev. Dr. Boyd said: "A story is told of a man who had to reach a certain place at a certain time, and on his way he came to the top of a hill, from which he could view the seaport town which he had to reach before nightfall. He got down just in time to see the white sails of the vessel in which he had to go disappearing from the shore; so he turned away very much disappointed, and a very miserable night he spent in consequence. The next day he heard that the vessel was wrecked, and now his misery turned into earnest gratitude to Him who had so wonderfully preserved his life. Dear friends, when things seem to be going wrong if you will wait patiently you will see the hand of the Lord working, for 'all things work together for good to them that love God.'"

Converted in a Circus.—Mr. Simpson, an Energetic worker, said: "About two years ago, at the close of an evangelistic meeting in a circus, a man came in, if I may use the expression, roaring drunk, and walked up and down the building, crying, 'I am going to heaven; I am going to heaven.' One of the workers went up to him and said, 'You are going down to hell as fast as the devil and the drink can take you.' On hearing this, the man flew into a great passion, and said many hard things to the worker. Another worker took him in hand, and talked and prayed with him. When I saw him next he was not only sober, but was also a saved man through faith in Christ; I may add that he has been kept by divine grace, and constrained to keep a firm hold of Christ ever since, and is now an earnest laborer, successful in winning many souls for Christ."

A Ship Saved through Prayer.—A Preacher of the Gospel related the following incident: "A captain's wife had a very vivid dream. She awoke one night, and went straight to the minister's house, and told him that she could not take rest because she had dreamt that her husband was in great danger. She said, 'I thought that his vessel was sinking; let us pray that he may be preserved from danger.' They both went down on their knees, and the minister prayed for the safety of her husband. After the prayer she went away comforted. When her husband returned subsequently from his voyage, he told her that on the very night in which she had been praying there was a great storm at sea, and the ship had gone over on its side. Everyone on board thought all hope was gone, but in some mysterious way the ship righted herself. He remarked to the sailors, 'Lads, there are some good saints praying for us just now, and for their sakes we are being saved.' 'Prayer moves the arm which moves the world.'"

per annum, payable in advance.

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

Will subscribers oblige us by making their Post-Office Orders payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD? Many of them continue to make them payable to individuals, and thus cause us serious delay and inconvenience.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Washington Monument was Dedicated on Saturday with imposing ceremonies. The Freemasons of the Grand Lodge of the District of Columbia took a prominent part in the celebration. The tools they used were relics of Washington himself. The Bible and the gavel were both those used by him when he was master of his lodge. The Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, who was to have delivered the oration, was absent through sickness, but he sent an address which was read by ex-Governor Long, of Massachusetts. President Arthur, Senator Sherman, and Mr. John W. Daniel, of Virginia, also delivered orations. As is stated on another page, the monument is the highest edifice in the world, being sixty-nine feet higher than the great Pyramid, and more than double the height of the London monument.

The House of Representatives has Defeated the bill for the retirement of General Grant. General Rosecrans appears to have been the leader of those who opposed the bill on its merits. The majority of those who voted against it appear to have done so in order to retaliate on the President for his veto of the Fitz-John Porter bill. As the Democrats in the Senate, including the Southern members, voted for the bill, and the general feeling of both parties in the country is in its favor, it is probable that Mr. Cleveland will recommend it in his first message. The vote in the House was one hundred and fifty-eight in favor of the bill to one hundred and three against it. A two thirds vote was necessary.

An Effort to Influence the President-Elect in favor of the silver dollar has been made by the followers of Mr. Blaud. He has been asked to suspend his judgment on the subject until the sentiment of the party can be ascertained. The effort will probably fail, as it deserves. The "sentiment of the party" was declared in its platform, in which it declared itself in favor of "honest money," which certainly does not properly characterize a dollar worth only eighty-five cents. Those who defend the dollar on the ground of protection, and desire that the government should continue coining it in the interest of the silver producers, are unwise. It would be better for the government to pay a bounty to the silver producers equivalent to the amount by which the price declined rather than to risk a financial crisis by making coins which the public refuses to use. Mr. Cleveland's reputation for sagacity will suffer if he does not recommend the suspension of the coining of the useless, cumbersome coin.

Renewed Assurances of Civil Service Reform were given by Mr. Cleveland during his visit to New York last week. He did not, he said, propose to remove any Republican officer who had been faithful to his duties, and whose administration of his office had been satisfactory to the public immediately concerned. When the terms of such officers expired he expected to fill their places with good men of his own party, if they could be found, which he did not doubt. That intimation qualifies the assurances formerly given, which encouraged the hope among Republicans that many officials would be reappointed, especially those chiefs of post-offices who have become popular through an efficient discharge of their duties. It is understood that Mr. Cleveland is being urged by certain Democratic politicians of eminence to make more changes than he is disposed to make. If that is true, he will have to decide which kind of popularity he prefers—popularity with his party, or popularity with the public.

A Series of Disastrous Fires Occurred in Philadelphia last week. A large business block on Chestnut Street was burned on February 19th, causing a loss of two lives and the serious injury of five persons. Property to the value of a quarter of a million dollars was destroyed. On the next day the firemen were kept busy with fires in various parts of the city. On Saturday another disastrous fire occurred, in which five persons lost their lives. It is suspected that incendiaries were at work.

The Attempted Assassinations of the Dynamiters may possibly go unpunished unless public opinion forces the officials to do their duty. Captain Phelan has returned to Kansas City, being wearied out by the adjournments of the trial of Short, who tried to stab Phelan to death. He was also unable to bear the expense of hotel life from week to week in New York. Rossa also failed to appear against the woman who shot him when she was arraigned for the offence. These dynamiters may, for reasons of their own, prefer to allow their enemies to escape, but the trials should go on. Both Short and Mrs. Dudley have broken the laws of the State, and they ought not to escape through the indifference of the persons they injured. Nor should they, as is probably intended, be punished by the friends or agents of the men they attacked. Lawlessness cannot go unpunished without danger to society.

Gloomy Reports from the Soudan Follow each other with startling rapidity, and the fact that General Wolsley will not allow the newspaper correspondents with the army to send intelligence to their journals, leads to the belief that the worst has not yet been told. It is now announced that General Stewart, who fought the desperate battle of Abu Klea, has died of his wounds. He was one of the youngest and most able generals in the British army. Lord Wolsley has recalled both the expeditions despatched against the Mahdi. That which was despatched across the desert to Khartoum under General Stewart is in danger of being hemmed in, and has been ordered to evacuate Gubat and fall back on Korti. General Earle's brigade, which since his death has been commanded by General Brackenbury, has also been ordered to retreat to Korti, leaving the attack on Berber unaccomplished. Even Korti is not considered a safe place. It is expected that when the two advanced wings arrive, the whole British force will retreat northward as speedily as possible. The loss of prestige this disastrous campaign and the ignominious retreat involve, is expected to produce a serious effect on the minds of the natives in India, who will naturally conclude that England is not so powerful as they supposed her to be.

The British Parliament Assembled on February 19th for its regular session. Numerous questions were addressed to the members of the Cabinet respecting the disasters in the Soudan. Mr. Gladstone said that he had done all he could for General Gordon, and was not responsible for his death. The country, however, has arrived at a different conclusion. It is perfectly well aware that when General Gordon appealed to Mr. Gladstone for help, soon after his arrival at Khartoum, Mr. Gladstone did not send it, though he could then have sent an expedition and rescued the gallant soldier. Later, when General Gordon was invested, and could make no further appeals, Mr. Gladstone was urged by the people to endeavor to rescue him, and still refused. He made no movement until his own popularity was endangered, and then it was too late. Mr. Gladstone is therefore rightly held responsible for General Gordon's death. A vote of censure on him has been proposed.

The French Quarrel with China has made no progress toward adjustment. Hostilities, however, have not been reopened. A despatch from Tai-Wan-Foo says: "The Chinese are exasperated over the treatment by the French of the Chinese prisoners at Kelung. When the prisoners were unable to work for want of food the French attacked them with bayonets. If that failed to move them they were shot. Three large French men-of-war were recently seen pursuing and firing big guns at one little Chinese junk. The ill-feeling of the Chinese is extending to the English for allowing the port of Hong Kong to be used as the base of such operations. The situation is dangerous."

A Riot in the Streets of Paris Occasioned some alarm on February 16th. A newspaper writer, one Jules Vallés, was being buried at the cemetery Père-La Chaise. He was one of the boldest and worst of the leaders of the Commune. There was a general gathering of the anarchists, and in the procession banners were carried with incendiary inscriptions. Cries were also raised at intervals by men in the procession, some of which were "Long live the social revolution," "Long live the Commune," "Hail to anarchy." The procession passed unmolested until a contingent appeared, composed of deputies from the German anarchists. Then the college students who lined the sidewalks made a rush, and there was a free fight, which was kept up all the way to the cemetery. Sticks and stones were used, and many persons were injured. Finally the students were driven off. They appear to have made the attack not against the anarchists, but against the Germans.

An Ominous Outbreak in London Occurred on February 16th. Three thousand unemployed workmen paraded the streets with banners and bands of music. They went to the Department of Public Works to ask that they might be taken into government employ. Sir Charles Dilke, the head of the department, was absent; when the procession learned of the fact roars and howls of execration issued from it. The procession then marched to Mr. Gladstone's official residence in Downing Street, where a Cabinet Council was in session. The men tried to penetrate to the room in which the Council was sitting, but a strong detachment of police were sent for, who charged the rioters with their staves, and dispersed them. They afterward gathered again and tried to storm other government offices, but were repulsed. Violent speeches were made at a meeting of the rioters subsequently held, which indicated that the rioters are in league with Continental anarchists.

Volume VII. of the Christian Herald, containing the Numbers for 1884, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office; price $3, including postage. A few volumes of 1882 and 1883 are also for sale. We have none left of any date prior to 1882.

"A Stray Copy of the Christian Herald," says a correspondent in Colorado, "was the means, in God's hand, of showing me my need of a Saviour, and now I have found refuge in Jesus." Several others through this correspondent's labors have, under God's blessing, been converted. We are always glad to hear of these instances of God's blessings on the paper, and a larger number than ever before have come to our knowledge this year. Our correspondent's meaning is perfectly plain, but he doubtless does not now really regard the copy of the paper that fell into his hands as "a stray copy." When we come to know more of God's ways than we do in this world, we shall find that very few of the instruments He uses ever go astray. Whatever became of all the thousands of copies printed that week, the one that was the means directly of one conversion and indirectly of several others could not have been a stray copy; that, at any rate, was on the Master's business.

A Legislative Attempt to Secularize the Sabbath in New York is being made at the State capital. The attack on the institution is in two directions. The first shows the evil of the present tendency to choose rum-sellers for our representatives in municipal and State government. It is a bill to permit saloons to be open for six hours on Sundays. As Mayor Grace is reported to approve of the bill, it will probably become law unless a vigorous protest is made against it. The second bill proposes to amend (!) the Sunday laws, so that acts now prohibited on Sundays shall hereafter be permitted when they do not disturb the peace. If that act should pass, the theatres and other places of amusement would be opened, and New York would have its Sundays made as thoroughly secular as those of Paris. The voice of the Christians of the State ought to make itself heard at Albany.

The Eightieth Birthday of Mr. Moody's mother was celebrated on February 5th at her home in Northfield, Mass. The three hundred pupils of the Northfield schools participated in the celebration. Hundreds of congratulatory letters and telegrams were received from all over this country and beyond the sea, sent by those who delighted to honor the mother through her eminent son. "One of the most touching sights," says a visitor, "was the in-pouring of the citizens, old and young, who came bearing tributes of love to the dear old mother and her boy, who sat side by side as lovingly as in the far-away years. This tribute was even more dear, we doubt not, to these recipients than the telegrams, cable despatches, letters, flowers, books, silver, arm-chairs, and the profuse gifts which came from various parts of the world. Four sons and one daughter were there to grace the occasion, while Lemuel and Samuel J. Holton, of Boston, and Cyrus Holton, of Northfield, were also present to gladden their aged sister with their love."

The Distribution of Bibles at the New Orleans Exposition is proceeding actively under the auspices of the American Bible Society. Its current editions are on sale and for gratuitous distribution in the main building, and copies are supplied to visitors who read the Spanish, Portuguese, German, and French languages. Thus persons from Mexico, Central America, and South America may obtain the Bible who could not be reached so readily in any other way.

Interesting Gifts for Missionary Funds have been received in New York. Some of the native Christian women in China have sent articles to the mission rooms in New York, to be sold for the benefit of the orphanage connected with the mission. The Christian women of Japan have also sent articles to be disposed of to aid the native clergy.

An Open Letter from Dr. Talmage has been published in reply to the strictures upon him in the New Jersey Legislature. The members of that body having heard that Dr. Talmage adverted to the profanity of the Speaker of the House uttered in open session, desired to call him to account; but, on investigation, finding that the sermon in which the remarks occurred was preached on April 6th, 1884, nearly a year ago, they refrained from taking any steps in the matter. They, however, used some hard words about the Brooklyn preacher. Dr. Talmage, in his open letter, quotes from the report of the proceedings of the House the passage on which he based his remarks, and makes further pointed comments on the disgraceful exhibition. He adds: "As these my acrimonious antagonists threaten me with a lawsuit and arraignment before the bar of their House, I will say that I am at home every evening, when in the city, at seven o'clock, and will be ready to receive any document they wish to serve on me; or if they want me to appear before the bar of their House, although I am not under their jurisdiction, and would not answer to formal summons, on polite invitation I would come in pure missionary spirit and teach them a lesson in common decency which they are woefully in need of learning."

A King on the Witness-Stand was the unusual spectacle witnessed in Rome, Italy, recently. A European journal states that a few days ago the King of Italy, from good-natured motives, volunteered his testimony before a magistrate in Rome. A shopkeeper named Maranzoni had unfortunately injured a little girl by riding over her in the street, and King Humbert, who had witnessed the accident, came forward to say that in his opinion Maranzoni had been in no wise to blame, and that, in fact, his horse had run away with him. The accused was fortunate in having his king to speak for him; he must have felt confident of acquittal. It is so with the Christian, who in his king has an all-prevailing Intercessor (Heb. 9: 24).

A Mouse Caused a Panic in a Menagerie in Brooklyn on February 18th. The spectators had left the place, and there was no one around but the night watchman, when suddenly the large elephant commenced trumpeting loudly, and the other animals set up a responsive roar, which shook the place and aroused the sleeping attendants. They found the elephant wildly waving his trunk in the air in a paroxysm of alarm and the inmates of the other cages wildly moving about in a state of dangerous excitement. They obtained no clue to the cause of the panic until, a minute or two later, a tiny mouse was ejected violently from the elephant's trunk, when the elephant and his companions were soon pacified. It is supposed that the mouse, in its nightly wanderings, had inadvertently strayed into the elephant's trunk, and terrified the huge beast, whose cries alarmed the other beasts. There is something exquisitely ludicrous in so small a creature frightening one so large and powerful; but fear, even in men, is sometimes produced by insignificant causes. Such a timorous state of mind is one of the punishments with which God threatens the disobedient (Lev. 26: 36).

A Night of Terror and Physical Suffering was passed on February 9th by a few people who live on a small island in Lake Michigan. The snow had drifted ten feet high around the edges of the island, and had frozen. On Monday night a hurricane blew over the waters of the lake, and the waves dashed over the icy bulwark and could not flow back again. The people were aroused by the flood, and many narrowly escaped death trying to cross the ice to the mainland. This ice was found broken, and they had to return. They were thoroughly drenched by wading through the slush, ice, and water knee-deep. When it was found that escape was cut off, they repaired to the second stories of the larger houses, and wherever they could perch out of reach of the water. The night was one of horrors, and the sufferings of the poor people were excruciating, as the mercury was 18° below zero. The gale subsided by daylight and the angry waters receded. Many of the people were almost crazed by fear and suffering. They will now take the first opportunity of trying to reach the mainland. In such matters people are more prudent than they are in their spiritual concerns. The warnings uttered now of the coming storm of God's indignation, and the offer of the way of escape, are often unheeded, and will be recalled with self-reproach when it is too late (II Chron. 36: 16).

A Marriage that Saved a Life Sentence was solemnized recently in Wisconsin. A woman who was charged with murdering her husband was tried, convicted, and sentenced to the State prison for life, but the Supreme Court granted her a new trial, and on the second trial the jury disagreed. Since then she has married the principal witness against her, which renders his testimony worthless. On February 18th she made an application to have her bondsman relieved by giving her own bond in the sum of $8000, which was granted. She having married the State's most valuable witness, and the other witnesses being widely scattered, it is not likely that the case will ever be called. The accused woman displayed remarkable craft in effecting this marriage, but neither the State nor the bridegroom can be congratulated on the affair. If the woman is really guilty the marriage does no more for her than enable her to evade justice. It is not so in the scheme of salvation provided in the Gospel for guilty sinners. Their union with Christ, of which marriage is a type, completely satisfies justice, the penalty having been suffered by the innocent Victim (Eph. 5: 25-27).

A Sneezing Congregation is the Subject of a paragraph published by the New York Sun. It states that a congregation in a church in Boston, Mass., was mysteriously seized, in the midst of a service of song, with a paroxysm of uncontrollable sneezing. First the children, then the choir, and at length nearly the whole assembly, the preacher included, broke out into involuntary convulsion. When the premises were searched by the astounded sexton, amid the laughter of the boys, the cause of the ridiculous catastrophe was found to be a cargo of pepper, which, during the previous week, had been stored in the cellar. The enterprising trustees had rented the place to a wholesale grocer. If the trustees of that church are not more bent on making money than on providing for propriety and solemnity in worship, that grocer will either have to quit, or store his pungent stock elsewhere. A church in which congregation and preacher are sneezing is not the place in which good can be done. On one occasion sneezing was the glad sign that life had entered into the dead (II Kings 4: 35); but though churches are often the scene of greater miracles than that Elisha wrought, and the spiritually dead are there brought to life, the signs of the miracle and the Agent of it are spiritual (Eph. 2: 4-6).

The Melon Shrub is One of the Latest and most interesting importations from Central America. It is being successfully cultivated in California, both in Los Angeles and San Diego counties. The San Diego Union, in the course of an article describing the new shrub, says: "The fruit is of the size of a goose egg, and very much of the same shape. The color is lemon, or pale orange, with streaks of bright violet. The interior of the fruit, for it partakes of the nature of a muskmelon, but has a much thinner rind, is a solid pulp, similar to that of a pear, also of a pale yellow color, and in taste again resembling the muskmelon, but has besides a pleasing acid, said to be so wholesome and delicious that when partaken of on a very warm day it takes all the thirst away for hours. As it is an enormous yielder, the fruit pleasant and wholesome, and commanding a good price in the market, the melon shrub undoubtedly has a good future before it." Our contemporary is right in its prediction. When the broiling days of summer come upon us there will be no lack of purchasers for a fruit which "takes away thirst for hours." Neither nature nor art has offered such a boon to thirsty humanity before. Neither of them has ever been able to do anything for the relief of the spiritually thirsty, who are in worse case. It was not until Christ came and offered the water, of which whosoever drank would never thirst again, that the world learned that permanent relief was provided (John 4: 14).

CORDS AND CART-ROPES.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Woe unto them that draw iniquity with cords of vanity, and sin as it were with a cart-rope."—ISAIAH 5: 18.

A Singular Text—I. The Description—Light Cords becoming Strong Ropes—Frisivolous Jest—Captious Questioning—A Lawyer's Blunder—New-Fashioned Consciences—Natural Dislike to Religion—Deference to Companions—Apologizing to the Devil—Forming Gradual Evil Habits—II. The Woe Entailed—Hard Work Already—The Weight Increases—The Road Becomes Worse—The Horse Crushed at Last—Change Growing more Difficult—III. Encouragement for Breaking Loose—The Spirit's Help.

This is a very singular text. It is not very easy to understand it at first sight. Here are some who are said to draw sin with cords of vanity, which are slender enough, and yet they also draw it as with a cart-rope, which is thick enough. They are harnessed to sin, and the traces appear to be fragile, insignificant, and soon broken. You can hardly touch them, for they are a mere sham, a fiction—vanity. What can be thinner and weaker than of vanity? Yet when you attempt to break or remove them they turn out to be cart-ropes or wagon-traces, fitted to bear the pull of horse or bullock. Motives which have no logical force, and would not bind a reasonable man for a moment, are, nevertheless, quite sufficient to hold the most of men in bondage. Such a slave is man to iniquity, that unworthy motives and indefensible reasons which appear no stronger than little cords nevertheless hold him as with bonds of steel, and he is fastened to the loaded wagon of his iniquity as a horse is fastened by a cart-rope. That is our subject at this time, and may God make it useful to many. Beyond all things I would have you saved, you who are tugging away in the harness of sin. God grant it. May the free Spirit set you free.

I. First, let us explain the singular description. Here are persons harnessed to the wagon of sin—harnessed to it by many cords, all light as vanity and yet strong as cart-ropes. Let me give you a picture. Here is a man, who, as a young man, heard the Gospel and grew up under the influence of it. He is an intelligent man, a Bible reader, and somewhat of a theologian. He attended a Bible-class, was an apt pupil, and could explain much of Scripture, but he took to

LIGHTNESS AND FROTHINESS.

He made an amusement of religion and a sport of serious things. Sermons he frequented that he might talk of them and say that he had heard the preacher. After the sermon, when others were impressed, he was merry. He had discovered some mistake in the preacher, in his pronunciation, in the grammatical construction of a sentence, or in a misquotation from a poet, and this he mentioned with gusto, passing by all the good that was spoken. That was only his way; he did not mean any hurt by it; at least, he would have said so had any one seriously reproved him.

He came under the bond of this religious trifling, but it was a cord of vanity small as a packthread. Years ago he began to be bound to his sin by this kind of trifling, and at the present moment I am not sure that he ever cares to go and hear the Gospel or to read the Word of God, for he has grown to despise that which he sported with. The wanton witling has degenerated into a malicious scoffer; his cord has become a cart-rope. His life is all trifling now. You could not make him serious. He spends his time in one perpetual giggle. Every holy thing is now the subject of comedy. His life is a sneer. He would pull a feather out of an angel's wing and wear it in his cap. On the solemn day of Pentecost he would have drawn a picture of the cloven tongues upon his thumb nail that he might show it as a curiosity. There is nothing sacred to him now, nor will there be till he is in hell, and then he will have done with his jibes and flouts. The habit of being contemptuous has grown to be a cart-rope with him, and it holds him most securely.

I have seen the same thing take another shape, and then it appeared as

CAPTIOUS QUESTIONING.

We are not afraid to be examined upon anything in the Word of God; but we dread a cavilling spirit. I, for one, believe that the more the Word of God has been sifted the more fully has it been confirmed. The result has been the better understanding of its teaching. The pure gold has shone the more brightly for being placed in the crucible. But there is a habit which begins thus—"I do not see this;" and I do not understand that; and I do not approve of this; and I question that. It makes life into a tangle of thorns and briars where ten thousand sharp points of doubt are forever tearing the mind. This doubting state reminds one of the old serpent's "Yea, hath God said?" If the statement made had been the opposite, the gentleman would have questioned it; for he is bound to doubt everything.

He is one who could take either side and refute; but neither side and defend. He could do like the eminent barrister, who had made a mistake as to his side of the case, and he got up and gave all the arguments most tellingly, till his client's lawyer whispered to him, "You have done for us, you have used all the arguments against your own client." The barrister stopped and said, "My lord, I have thus told you all that can be urged against my client by those upon the other side, and I will now show you that there is nothing in the allegations;" and with equal cleverness he went on to disprove what he had proved before. There are minds constructed in such a way that they can act in every way except that of plain up and down. Their machinery is eccentric, it would puzzle the ablest tongue to describe it. I like the old-fashioned consciences that go up and down, yes and no, right and wrong, true and false—the kind which are simple and need no great intellect to understand their methods.

We are growing so cultured now that many have become like the old serpent, "more subtle than any beast of the field." The act upon the principle of compromise and policy, which is no principle at all. People of that sort begin at first with an inquiring spirit, then go on to an objecting spirit, then to a conceited spirit, and then to a perpetually quibbling spirit. Such a man at last gets bound as with a cart-rope; he becomes an atheist or worse; for all capacity for faith departs from him. Oh, take heed of tying up your soul with cart-ropes of scepticism; take heed of a truth-denying spirit. God help you to break the bonds. Cavilling is a curse, and carping is a crime. Escape from it while yet it is but as a cord of vanity, lest it come to be a cart-rope which shall bind you fast.

I hear one say, "This does not touch me. I have not fallen either into trifling or into questioning." No, but perhaps you may be a prisoner bound with other cords. Some have a natural and cannot be brought to attend to them. Let me qualify the statement and explain myself. They are quite prepared to attend a place of worship and to hear sermons, and occasionally to read the Scriptures, and to give their money to help on some benevolent cause; but this is the point at which they draw the line—they do not want to think, to pray, to repent, to believe, or to make heart-work of the matter. Thinking, you know, is awkward work, and to them it is uncomfortable work, because there is not much in their lives that would cheer them if they were to think of it. They had rather not see the nakedness of the land.

They have heard some people say that all conversation about God, the soul, and eternity is dull Puritanic talk, so they have picked up an expression, as parrots often do, and they say "No, we do not want to be Puritans. We do not care to be extra precise and righteous over much." What a misery it is that there should be persons who are bound with such cords of vanity as those! These are unreasonable feelings, insane aversions, unjustifiable prejudices; the Lord save you from them, and instead thereof give you a mind to know Him, and a heart to seek after Him. You see it is such radical work; regeneration cuts so deep, and it makes a man so thoughtful. Who knows what may have to be given up? Who knows what may have to be done? O my hearer, if you indulge in such demurs and delays and prejudices in the first days of your conviction, the time may come when those little packthreads will be so interwisted with each other that they will make a great cart-rope, and you will become an opposer of everything that is good, determined to abide forever harnessed to the great Juggernaut car of your iniquities, and so to perish. God save you from that.

I have known some men get harnessed to that car in another way, and that is by

DEFERENCE TO COMPANIONS.

The young man liked everything that was good after a fashion, but he could not bear for anybody to say on Monday morning, "So you were at a place of worship on Sunday." He did not like to say outright, "Of course I was; where were you?" But the rather he said, "Well, he did look in at the chapel, or he did go to St. Paul's or the Abbey to hear the music." "Oh," says one, "I hear you were at the Tabernacle the other day." Yes, he went in from curiosity, just to see the place and the crowd. That is how he puts it, as if he were ashamed to worship his Maker and to be found observing the Sabbath day. Oh poor coward! That young man at another time was charged with having been seen in the inquiry-room, or weeping under a solemn sermon. He said it was rather affecting, and he was a little carried away and over-persuaded, but he apologized to the devil, and begged that he might hear no more of it.

He began giving way to his ungodly friends, and soon he became their butt. One companion pulled his ear that way, and another pulled his ear another way, and in this manner he developed very long ears indeed. He did not go very far wrong at first; but having allowed sinful men to saddle him, they took care to ride him harder and harder as the days ran on. Young men have flung away all hope of salvation in order that they might be thought to be men of culture; they have abjured faith in order to be esteemed "free-thinkers" by those whose opinions were not worth a pin's head. I charge you, dear friend, if you are beginning at all to be a slave of other people, break these wretched and degrading bonds.

Some men are getting into bondage in another way; they are forming

GRADUAL HABITS OF EVIL.

How many young men born and bred amid Christian associations do that! It is a little sip, and such a little. "I do not take above half a glass." Then why run such great risks for so small an indulgence? "The doctor"—O you doctors, what you have got to answer for!—"The doctor says I ought to take a little, and so I do." By and by the little thread becomes a cart-rope; the tale about the doctor ends in doing what no doctor would justify. Will he say, "The doctor says I ought" when he comes rolling home at night, scarce can find his way to bed, and wakes up with a headache in the morning? He would have done better to ask God for grace to escape while yet he had small pleasure in the fascinating fire-water, and was the master of his appetite. The cart-rope is hard to break, as many have found, though I would encourage even these by God's grace to struggle for liberty.

"Well," says the young man, "that is not my sin." I am glad it is not; but any other sin if it be persevered in will destroy you. I will not try to describe your sin. Describe it yourself, and think over it; but will you please recollect the deceitfulness of sin—the way in which it comes to men, as the frost in the still evening in the wintry months comes to the lake? The pool is placid, and the frost only asks that it may thinly glaze the surface. The coating is so thin, you could scarce call it ice; but having once filmed the pool, the sheet of ice has commenced; soon it is an inch thick, and in a few hours a loaded wagon might pass over it without a crash, for the whole pool seems turned to marble. So men give way to one evil passion or another—this vice or that; and the habit proceeds from bad to worse, till the cords of vanity are enlarged into cart-traces, and they cannot escape from the load to which they are harnessed.

II. But, oh, how I wish that every person here who has not yet found liberty, but is harnessed to his sin, could escape to-night, for—and this is my second point—there is a woe about remaining harnessed to the cart of sin, and that woe is expressed in our text. It has been to tug at sin's load. If I am addressing any here that have fallen into great sin, I know that you have fallen into great sorrow. I am sure you have. Much of history is happily covered with a veil, so that its secret griefs do not become open miseries, else were the world too wretched for a tender heart to live in it. Could we lift the tops of the houses, could we exhibit the skeletons hidden in closets, could we take away the curtains from human breasts—what sorrows we should see; and the mass of those sorrows—not the whole of them, but the mass—would be found to come from sin. When the young man turns to paths of unchastity or of dishonesty, what grief he makes for himself; what woe, what misery! His bodily disease, his mental anguish we have no heart to describe. Ah! yes, "The way of transgressors is hard." They put on a smile; they even take to uproarious laughter; but a worm is gnawing at their hearts. Alas, poor slaves!

But remember, if you remain harnessed to this car of sin,

THE WEIGHT INCREASES.

You are like a horse that has to go a journey and pick up parcels at every quarter of a mile; you are increasing the heavy luggage and baggage that you have to drag behind you. Grinning devils, as they bring the heavy packages and heap them up one upon another, must wonder that men are such fools as to continue in the harness and drag on the dreadful load as if it were fine sport. Alas! that men should sin away their souls so lightly, as if self-destruction were some merry game that they were playing at, whereas it is a heaping up unto themselves wrath against the day of wrath.

Further, I want you to notice that as the load grows heavier, so the ruts are deeper, the hills are steeper, and the sloughs are more full of mire. In the heyday of youth man finds beaded bubbles about the brim of his cup of sin, the wine moveth itself aright, it giveth its color in the cup; but as he grows older and drinks deeper he comes nearer to the dregs, and those dregs are as gall and wormwood. An old man with his bones filled with the sin of his youth is a dreadful sight to look upon; he is a curse to others, and a burden to himself.

Remember, friends, if any of you are still harnessed to your sins, and have been so for years, the day will come when the horse. It is a dreadful thing when the sins which were drawn at last drive the drawer before them. In the town where I was brought up there is a very steep hill. You could scarcely get out of the town without going down a hill, but one is specially precipitous, and I remember once hearing a cry in the streets, for a huge wagon had rolled over the horses that were going down the hill with it. The load had crushed the creatures that were supposed to draw it.

There comes a time with a man when it is not so much he that consumes the drink as the drink that consumes him; he is drowned in his cups, sucked down by that which he himself sucked in. A man was voracious, perhaps, in food, and at last his gluttony swallowed him; at one grim morsel he went down the throat of the old dragon of selfish greed. Or the man was lustful, and at last his vice devoured him. It is an awful thing when it is not the man that follows the devil, but the devil that drives the man before him as though he were his laden ass. The man's worst self, that had been kept in the rear and put under restraint, at last gets up and comes to the front, and the better self, if ever he had such, is dragged on an unwilling captive at the chariot wheels of its destroyer.

I am sure that there is nobody here who desires to be eternally a sinner; let him then beware, for each hour of sin brings its hardness and its

DIFFICULTY OF CHANGE.

Nobody here wants to get into such a condition that he cannot help any longer sinning; let him not be so unwise as to play with sin. When the moral brakes are taken off, and the engine is on the down-grade, and must run on at a perpetually quickening rate forever, then is the soul lost indeed. I am sure there is not a man here who wants to commit himself to an eternity of hate of God, an eternity of lust, an eternity of wickedness and consequently wretchedness. Why then do you continue to harden your hearts?

III. Now I want to offer some

ENCOURAGEMENT FOR BREAKING LOOSE.

It is time I did. I do not wish to preach a sad, unhappy sermon to-night; but I do long to see everybody here saved from sin. My heart cries to God that as long as I am able to preach, I may not preach in vain. God knows I have never shunned to speak what I have thought, and to speak very plainly and very home to you. I never come into this pulpit with the notion that I must not say a sharp thing, or somebody will be offended, and I must not deal with common sins, for somebody will say that I am coarse. I care not the snap of a finger what you choose to say about me, if you will but forsake sin and be reconciled to God by the death of His Son.

Now, listen. There is hope for every harnessed slave of Satan. There is hope for those who are most securely bound. "Oh," you say, "I am afraid that I have got into the cart-ropes stage; for I seem bound to perish in my sin, I cannot break loose from it." Listen. Jesus Christ has come into the world to rescue those who are bound with chains. That is to say, God Himself has taken upon Himself human nature, with this design—that He may save men from their sins. That blessed, perfect babe, such as never mother before had ever seen—that virgin's child—when they named Him, it was said, "Thou shalt call His name Jesus, for He shall save His people from their sins. He has come to this world in our nature on purpose to save men from their sins. He can cut the traces which bind you to Satan's chariot. He can take you out of the shafts. He can set you free to-night. You have been dragging on for years, and you think there is no chance for you; but there is more than a chance, there is the certainty of salvation if you trust in Jesus.

The Lord will make a new creature of you. When and brings you out from between those shafts which have so long held you, you will not know yourself. When old things have passed away you will be a wonder unto many. Is it not said of Augustine that after his conversion he was met by a fallen woman who had known him in his sin, and he passed her by? She said, "Austin, it is I;" and he turned and said, "But I am not Austin. I am not the man you once knew, for I have become a new creature in Christ Jesus." That is what the Lord Jesus Christ can do for you. Do you not believe it? It is true, whether you believe it or not. Oh that you would look to Jesus and begin to live! It is time a change was made; is it not? Who can change you but the Lord Jesus?

I will tell thee another cheering fact to help thee to overcome thy sin, and break the cart-ropes that now bind thee—There is in this world a mysterious Being whom thou knowest not, but whom some of us know, who is able to work thy liberty. There dwells upon this earth a mysterious Being, whose office it is to renew the fallen, and restore the wandering. We cannot see Him, or hear Him, yet He dwells in some of us, as Lord of our nature. His chosen residence is a broken heart, and a contrite spirit. That most powerful Being is God, the third person of the blessed Trinity, the Holy Ghost, who was given at Pentecost, and who has never been recalled, but remains on earth to bless the people of God. He is here still; and wherever there is a soul that would be free from sin this free Spirit waits to help him. If thou believest in Jesus Christ, the Son of God, believe thou also in the power of the Holy Spirit to make thee a new creature, and cleanse thee, and deliver thee from every fetter, and make thee the Lord's free man.

I will tell thee one thing more, and I will have done. Our experience should be a great encouragement to you. I have tried to preach to you that are in the traces; poor worn-out post-horses of Satan that seem never to have a holiday, dragging your cart of sin behind you through the slush of the foul city of Vanity. The mercy is that you are not horses, but men born for nobler purposes. You may be free, for some of us are free. Oh, what a load I had behind me once; my wagon of inbred sin was a huge one indeed. Had it not been for the grace of God I should have perished in the impossible attempt to move it. O my beloved hearers, believe in Christ as I did. The Gospel comes to each sorrowing sinner, and it says, Trust the Saviour and there is joy for thee. Ask Jesus to break thy bonds, and with a touch of His pierced hand, He will make thee free as the swallow on the wing which no cage can hold. Thou shalt see Him, and see thy sin never again forever. Amen.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

THE CROKER CORRESPONDENCE

and Diaries, edited by Mr. Louis J. Jennings, who was formerly the editor of the New York Times, are a most valuable contribution to the history of Europe during the first half of this century. John Wilson Croker occupied a unique position in England for about forty years. For more than half of that time he was the chief of the Navy Department and a prominent member of the House of Commons. Later he entered the field of journalism, writing for the London Times and the Quarterly Review. His official life brought him into personal contact with kings George III., George IV., and William IV., and led to his becoming an intimate friend of the great Duke of Wellington, Sir Robert Peel, and the chiefs of the Tory party, while his connection with journalism made him familiar with all the prominent men of letters of his time. While in office he was acquainted with the most secret affairs of the government, and after he quitted it the chiefs of his party continued to trust him, and supplied him with information that he might advocate their cause intelligently in the press. It is obvious, therefore, that Mr. Croker was better fitted than almost any one else to give the world authoritatively and accurately the history of that most eventful time. His valuable knowledge, however, might have been lost, had it not been for his methodical habits. He kept a diary in which he scrupulously and regularly entered the events of the day, and even the substance of conversations in which he had taken part. He was also a voluminous letter-writer, having among his correspondents the men who were the most prominent in social, political, and literary life. These letters and diaries, only one half of which filled twenty-eight large volumes and the other half made scores of large packages. Mr. Jennings has now arranged, edited, and published. They abound in interesting anecdotes of great men who were Mr. Croker's friends. Chief among these was the great Duke of Wellington, who chatted familiarly with Croker about his campaigns, about the battle of Waterloo, the French Emperor and his generals, and other matters in which he took a leading part, and whose remarks Croker committed to paper while they were fresh in his memory. He also relates anecdotes at first hand of Sir Walter Scott, Lord Macaulay, Lord Palmerston, Lord Brougham, Lord Byron, Tom Moore, Southey, Wilberforce, and many other eminent men who were his contemporaries. Some idea of the extensive character of these remains may be gained from the fact that, as printed, they fill eleven hundred and forty-four octavo pages. Their historical value is priceless, for they are the memoranda of a man whose opportunities of knowing the exact facts, and whose ability to describe them were unequalled. Price $5. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons.

THE MESSAGES OF THE BOOKS, by F. W. Farrar, D.D., F.R.S., is a volume of sermons preached to his London congregation by the well-known author of the "Life of Christ." Dr. Farrar's object, as stated in the preface, is to examine each of the books of the New Testament as a whole, and to point out the general form, the peculiar characteristics, and the special message of each book. Such a method of study is one we cannot afford to neglect. The present tendency to dwell on isolated passages and to compare single sentences written by one author with single sentences by another author is a fruitful cause of difficulty and misapprehension. The method adopted by Dr. Farrar in this work tends to the removal of many such mistakes. The character of the writer, which led him to dwell with especial delight on some particular aspect of the truth, the time of his writing, and the character and circumstances of the people to whom he wrote, are all elements which should be considered by students desiring to form a clear idea of his work. That is the method we adopt with the works of secular authors, and the meaning of the sacred writers becomes plainer as we pursue it. Dr. Farrar's eminent scholarship and his lucid style of writing render his work a most delightful study. It is, however, doubtful whether any of his readers will be able to indorse his views entirely. We cannot but regret, for our own part, the tendency he displays, especially in dealing with the book of the Revelation, to spiritualize passages evidently to be understood literally, and to refer to past events passages which are clearly prophetic and are still unfulfilled. His book, therefore, while giving much information and affording valuable aid to the study of the New Testament, needs to be read with caution and discrimination. Ph. 532. Price $3.50. Published by E. P. Dutton & Co., New York.

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.

There are some books which we can afford to read in the cheapest and poorest shape; we read them once and cast them aside, not needing to give them a second glance. But there are others, very few in number, to which we turn with pleasure and profit again and again. They are the books which we find helpful in our daily lives, and we go to them as for daily food. Of such books the "Pilgrim's Progress" is held, in the majority of Christian households, next in value to the Bible. We are treading the same path, pilgrims on the same road, and we meet with such experiences as Christian did in John Bunyan's allegory. To very few men has the privilege been given, as it was to the Puritan tinker, of ministering to the profit and encouragement of generation after generation of men, who treasure his book with a concurrence of admiration without a parallel in literature. The "Pilgrim's Progress," therefore, as a Christian classic of unequalled value, should be found in Christian homes in a shape and dress indicative of our appreciation of its worth. We are pleased to learn, from a prospectus issued by Messrs. Anson D. Randolph & Company, that a beautiful edition of it is being published by that firm, printed on heavy toned paper, containing one hundred illustrations by eminent artists, and elegantly bound. We have seen specimen pages of the volume, which prove it to be a marvel of typographical art. The price is $4; by mail, $4.25.

ANECDOTES

Illustrative of New Testament Texts is the title of a new volume published by Messrs. A. C. Armstrong & Son. Price $1.50. It contains six hundred and thirteen short, pithy anecdotes culled from all sources—chiefly foreign—each one illustrating some New Testament passage. Clergymen and Sunday-school teachers, who know well how an anecdote fixes the attention and recalls the wandering thoughts of listless hearers, will easily understand how valuable such a collection must be. The following anecdote will illustrate the character of the book: Two miners were down sinking a shaft, and to do this they blasted the solid rock. They had placed in the rock a large charge of gunpowder, and had so fixed the fuse that it could not be taken out. Through some mistake fire was struck, and the fuse began to hiss. On seeing this both men dashed to the bucket and gave the signal. The man above, in vain attempted to move the windlass. One of the miners, seeing that only one could escape, leaped out again and said: "Escape; I shall be in heaven in a minute." The bucket sped up the shaft, and the man was safe. Eager to watch the fate of his deliverer, he bent down to hear. Just then the explosion rumbled below; a splinter came up the shaft and struck him on the brow, leaving a mark that would remind him all his days of his rescue. They soon began to search among the fallen rock for the dead body. But to their surprise a voice was heard, and they found that their friend was yet alive; a piece of rock had roofed him over, and he was without injury of any kind. When asked what induced him to let the other escape, he replied: "I knew my soul was safe; I was not so sure of his" (Rom. 8: 16).

HOW A MOTHER'S PRAYER WAS ANSWERED.

"Is not Tom come yet?" said a feeble voice. The speaker was a woman who lay very near to death. She was near seventy years of age, and her life had been one of many troubles. Happily her heart had been given to her Saviour in her youth, so that in all her troubles she had been sustained, and in going down to the dark river she had no fear. At times she felt that the burden of life had grown so wearisome that death would be a relief. She would have liked to live to see her favorite son, Tom, become a Christian, but it seemed it was not to be. He was now forty years old, and though doing well in the world was little better than an infidel. Her other children were all grown up too; some were, to her great joy, converted to God, but Tom, the clever man of the family, her joy and pride, was still in spiritual darkness.

"Tom cannot be here for nearly an hour yet, mother," said her youngest daughter, who was watching in the sick-room. "Is there anything I can do for you?"

"Yes, read me a chapter; read the fourteenth chapter of John, and then leave me alone a little while. I must pray for Tom. It will likely be the last time."

The chapter was read slowly, with frequent pauses, as the dying woman indicated by raising her hand when she wanted silence, as if she were letting the blessed, comforting words drip gently on her thirsty soul. When it was ended her daughter quietly withdrew, and the Christian mother was left alone to wrestle for her son's soul. When her daughter returned she found her mother lying peacefully, with a light in her countenance as of one whose shoulders had been relieved of a heavy burden, and who was resting peacefully after a toilsome journey.

"Tom is come, mother," she said. "Will you see him now?"

"Yes, dear; let him come at once."

A minute or two later a strong, broad-shouldered, bearded man entered the room and, bending down over the bed, kissed his mother tenderly.

"Tom," said the dying woman, "I am going to die. I have been praying for you for the last time. All these years I have been praying, ever since you were a baby, and the answer has not come yet, but I believe it will. I want you to love the Saviour."

"Dear mother, you are true to the last; always concerned for others more than yourself. Are you suffering much pain?"

"No, Tom; I'm just tired, that is all. But I know I am dying. I was in trouble awhile ago as I thought of you, but I have given you into the Lord's hand now, and I am quite at rest. You will not resist Him, Tom?"

"I don't understand you, mother. If the Lord is the omnipotent Being you believe Him to be my resistance is of no account."

"Ah, Tom, I am too weak to argue. You were always too strong for me in argument at the best of times. The Lord will draw you to Himself, but He may not do it against your will. Promise me that you will not stand out against Him."

"I cannot see your meaning yet, mother; but if I learn it afterward I promise you I will not be obstinate."

"Thank you, my boy; remember it is your solemn promise to your dying mother. Hold my hand, Tom, the room seems to be slipping away from me. I feel I am going, but it is all bright ahead. Good-by, Tom. Remember." A deep sigh followed the words, and the son saw that his mother was dead. He knelt down and reverently kissed the hand he held, and for the first time in many years he prayed.

Months passed, and Tom lived, as before, the same godless life; but his mother's words and his own promise were frequently in his mind. He wondered if there could be anything in his mother's faith and prayers. He was immersed in business, and it was only in the evening or on the Sabbath, which he spent in recreation, that he thought of it and watched for, without being able to detect, some subtle, mesmeric influence which he supposed he would experience if his mother's prayers were effectual. That influence never came; but when, years after his mother's death, he had suffered successively the loss of children, the loss of property, and the loss of friends, and saw himself a desolate, solitary man, he learned that God had answered the dying prayer, and by a painful process had forced him to turn to the Friend of the weary and the heavy-laden. Many a time in later years he told his own story as a warning to others, urging them to accept Christ at once without waiting for the discipline which He, who will have all men to believe, may use to bring them to Himself.

THE JEW'S WARD.

Light in Darkness.

CAROLA, disturbed by what she had seen on the river, hurried homeward, still thinking of the scene which suggested the belief that a crime had been committed. As soon, however, as she stood at the door of her home she recollected her grandmother and blamed herself for her own tardiness.

Matthias Levi was looking out anxiously for the girl, and shook his head sadly at her uncertain and faltering gait. Carola had been away nearly an hour; and he did not know but that the old grandmother might be dead. Though it was not the Sabbath he had put on his best clothes, with a curious reverence for the approaching presence of the mysterious angel of death, who came alike to Jew and Gentile. He hurried the girl upstairs, and stood at the foot of the ladder, watching her climb up it with her unsteady feet and trembling hands.

"Tell me how she is, Carol," he said, eagerly; "you're yourself enough to know how the poor creature is? You're not too much overcome to see how she is, my dear?"

Carola turned round, and looked down upon him with streaming eyes.

"You think I'm drunk," she said, "and it's miserable I am. Why can't grandmother go on livin' as she's always done? I've never done ought to vex her. I've kept myself good because you and her was forever and ever goin' on at me. I don't know any other girl as good as me. Haven't I always kept myself a good girl?"

"Yes, yes, Carol," he answered, soothingly, "and if you'd never take any drink you'd be a jewel. And you are a jewel to me, my dear. Only you go on now and tell me how your poor grandmother is."

On the low shelf which formed the chimney-piece of the garret a candle was burning in an old gin-bottle. It had burned dull during the girl's long absence, and cast a mere glimmer of light on the yellow and sunken face of the old woman. Her head was tossing to and fro on the hard pillow, and her ragged gray hair lay in thin and tangled knots about it. But her dim eyes glistened a little at the sight of Carola, and at the strong scent of the dram which she hastened to give to her, lifting up the gray head tenderly as she held the cracked cup to her lips. With a satisfied sigh the dying woman fell back as soon as the dram was swallowed; and Carola sank down on the floor beside the bed, watching the parched and withered face, as it seemed to grow darker and colder every minute, in spite of her faithful gaze.

"There's money for you, Carol," she said, speaking with great difficulty, and in a whisper; "plenty o' money, nigh upon a pound a week. You're a heiress. Matthias is takin' care of it; and I've been a good grandmother to you. The money's all safe, and I've never drunk more of it than I promised. I've never been bad to you, have I, Carol?"

"No, no," answered the girl, sobbing.

"And now you're nigh on eighteen, and you're a good girl yet," she gasped; "you've never stole or gone wrong, and I'm not afraid to give account to them as left you with me. There's not a many girls as don't go to the bad, and you're a pretty girl; but you promise me you never will, will you, Carol?"

"Never!" said Carol, fervently.

There flashed across her mind the recollection of how George Bassett had kissed her in the street a day or two ago, and how she had given him a fierce blow on the cheek, which had left the marks of all her fingers. She would do it again, and sharper, if there was any need.

"Will God Almighty be very hard on me?" exclaimed the old woman with a sudden cry of terror. She started up in her bed, and glared with sunken and bloodshot eyes into the black shadows under a gable of the roof. Carol looked that way with beating heart and shuddering frame; but there was nothing she could see. The crooked fingers that had gripped her hand slackened their hold, and the worn-out body of the dying woman fell back on the bed. When Carol withdrew her fascinated eyes from the blackness of the shadows she saw that her grandmother was dead.

The next Monday all the neighborhood was astonished at the magnificence of the funeral which went from Matthias Levi's house. The old woman had not been seen for years, and very few of her neighbors knew anything of her, except that Carol had a grandmother, on whose account she neither went into service nor into a factory. The hearse that carried the coffin to the distant cemetery was covered with handsome plumes, and the horses that drew it and the mourning coach that followed had the longest and blackest manes and tails which had ever been seen in that street. There was no one but Carol in the great coach, for Matthias had not deemed it right as a Jew to be present at the funeral of a Christian, and there was no woman among her numerous acquaintances whom the girl cared to ask to go with her. She had slept on the floor of the garret, where the silent and motionless corpse lay, and many questions had thronged to her excited and quickened brain. They were in her mind still, as she followed the coffin down the cemetery paths and watched it lowered into the grave. The chaplain read the burial service decorously but officially, and was turning away, when the loneliness of the weeping girl and her pale and tear-stained face struck him, and he turned back again, after going a few paces, to speak to her.

"Is there no one to go home with you?" he inquired.

"No; I'd nobody else but her," she answered, pointing down into the open grave; "and I don't know nothin' about where she's gone, or however I'm to find her again when I die. Isn't there nobody as knows?"

"You should go to your parish priest," he replied, "and he will tell you. What parish do you come from?"

"I don't know about parishes," she said; but Matthias "ll know, I dare say."

"I've a book here," said the chaplain, "that will teach you more than anything else, if you read it very carefully. You can read, I suppose?"

He took out of his pocket a small Testament, with well-worn binding, and leaves that were somewhat thumb-marked. Carol held out her hand eagerly.

"Are you poor?" he asked again, glancing at her handsome dress, and thinking of the plumed hearse which had brought the coffin to the grave.

"Oh, no," she answered, promptly; "I've plenty of money. I've no need to cry for that; but I want to know all I can about what has happened to her, for it 'll happen to us all, you know. There was somethin' in her that went out all in a moment, like when a candle is blown out. One moment it's all light, and then it's all darkness. Where does the light go to?"

"I have not time to stay with you," said the chaplain, who had another funeral waiting for him; "but you must go to your parish priest and ask him. And you may take this little book with you. You may keep it," he added; "it did not cost much."

Carol turned slowly away; but when the chaplain was out of sight she retraced her steps to the open grave. The hearse and the mourning coach had left as soon as they had set down their burdens, and there was no one to speak to her, or to distract her thoughts from the solemn questions which were in her heart. The deep gloom of the little funeral, its sable plumes, and the unrelieved blackness of the hearse she had followed, had depressed her spirits. It was all new to her. There was no cemetery in the crowded part of the city where she lived, and this was the first time she had stood beside an open grave; she had not even seen a place of graves before, and all about her stood the white tombstones of the dead, in thick array.

Folks died and were carried away in coffins; that she had known from her infancy. But death had never touched her strong young life before; it had never come home to her. And now the poor old bed-ridden woman, who had been content to lie still all day, slowly consuming her daily allowance of gin, was gone into that dark and dreadful mystery. Matthias had told her last night, with a face of awe, that he could not say what became of people that were not Jews, and neither her grandmother nor she were Jews. What was the terrible place whither she must go when her own hour came?

It seemed most strange to Carol that the street should look just the same as usual when she returned to it. Her old companions were lounging at their doors and the children were playing on the dusty pavement as if nothing had happened. Only they looked at her with something like unfriendliness in their aspect, and not one invited her into any of the spirit-vaults near at hand. The costliness of her mourning struck a kind of awe into their minds, and they felt that a dress so handsome ought not to come into contact with dirty floors. Matthias was at work at his stall, and he only gave a brief glance at her pale face and reddened eyes as she went softly and sadly past him up the spiral staircase. His heart was heavy for her; but what could he say? what comfort could there be in the death of an old drunken Christian like her grandmother?

Carol ascended to the empty garret, which had never been empty before. She threw herself down on the bed, and broke into a passion of tears and sobs. Matthias had taught her early that she must honor the old grandmother, in the place of her father and mother, who were dead; and of late years there had been a kind of pitying affection in her heart for this poor, helpless, drink-besotted creature, who was the only person in the world belonging to her, and who was so utterly dependent upon her.

How lonesome this garret was without her! Now and then there had been a gleam of love for her, and pride in her, breaking through the stupid lethargy of the old woman's torpid brain; and Carol could not bear to think that never more would she see those bearded eyes light up for a moment or two at the sight of her, or feel the withered hand touch her cheek caressingly. She had seen this rare and kindly light gleaming through the old grandmother's eyes only a few minutes before the change came, when the glimmering went out suddenly into utter darkness.

The twilight had deepened into night before Carol roused herself, and bethought her of the little book she had brought from the cemetery. She lit the candle, and set the bottle which held it upon the little round table, and drew up her chair beside it. Matthias was still at work, and she could hear the tap of the hammer in the shop, for his door and her window were open. The street was noisy with the usual clamor, and on the river there was still the sound of belated steamers passing by to the city piers. She leaned her head upon her hands, and looked down with smarting eyes upon the little page before her, on which was the first chapter of the Gospel according to St. Matthew.

Carol could read well; but it was hard work to get through the long genealogy; and it conveyed little meaning to her. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob she had heard of; and David, the king, and Solomon, and the carrying away into Babylon; or possibly she might never have gone beyond the first two or three verses. But the name of Jesus Christ was quite new to her; that was a name which Matthias could never have uttered. She knew nothing of Joseph and Mary; but the thought of an angel coming to Joseph in a dream was very pleasant to her. Perhaps an angel might come and tell her what she wanted to know. The second chapter promised to be still more interesting as she read the heading.

The brawling in the street died away into deep stillness, and the tapping of Matthias's hammer ceased; and out on the river the vessels lay at anchor for the night; but still Carol's pale young face and reddened eyes bent over the little book, and her brown fingers went from line to line, and her lips moved with the words she was reading, long after all the sounds were gone. She miscaled many of the words; yet the charm of the story held her as no story had ever yet done. Her bright intelligence pictured all she read. She could see the star shining, and the wise men looking up at it, and following it as it went before them. She saw them entering the house and falling down on their knees before the young child and His mother; they were Jews like Matthias, not like the men who were only English, and not Jews. And the children being slain, and Rachel weeping, how plainly she could picture it! John the Baptist was a real man to her, almost as real as Matthias.

But oh! how much there was that she could not understand? Who could this Jesus be, whose birth was foretold to Joseph in a dream, and of whom the angels took such special care? The wise men called Him the King of the Jews; and a voice from heaven said, "This is my beloved Son." Matthias had never spoken of Him. And they had brought unto Him all such people as were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those which were possessed with devils, and those which were lunatic, and those that had the palsy; and He healed them all. No wonder that great multitudes followed Him; she could see closely packed crowds like the crowds on Lord Mayor's Day thronging through the streets. And now He is going up on to a hill, and all the people are gathered thick about Him; and she herself is there in the front, and He opens His lips. What is He going to say?

What He said she could only partly understand, and she still needed some one to explain it to her. But after a while she came to a passage so plain that a child could see much of its meaning. "After this manner therefore pray ye," said Jesus Christ. "Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil: for thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen."

Carol lifted up her bended head as she came to the word Amen. Oh, how far better this prayer was than the few Hebrew words without meaning which she had picked up from Matthias! She rose from her chair and went to the window, where she always stood to pray. The waning moon had risen, and was shedding a pale, sad light upon the water. But she had forgotten her own sadness; her brain was too full of the new and strange things she had been reading.

To-morrow she must learn every word of this beautiful prayer, which Jesus, the Son of God, had taught the people. The other prayers were good for the Jews, but Matthias himself had been doubtful if they would do her any good. But this prayer was in English, and must be meant for English people. She lifted up her eyes to the midnight sky, and said softly, "Our Father, which art in heaven." It was all she could remember; but the tears sprang to her eyes with the warmth with which she said them, though they were no longer sorrowful tears.

There was something so sweet and strange to her in those words, that she kept whispering them to herself after she lay down on the bed, until sleep came to her excited yet weary brain.

The next day Carola pored over her new book, with the ardent intensity of an unoccupied yet intelligent mind. There was no dull familiarity to make the marvellous story slip by unheeded or be read half-heartedly. She did not throw the incidents into a far-off past of many centuries, through which the book had gathered rust or mould. They were as fresh to her as this day's newspaper. She had not even an idea that Jesus, the Son of God, whose star was seen in the East when He was born, and who had done so many and mighty works, and said so many wise words, was dead. All the narrative was so life-like to her that she could hardly stay to read more, before starting off in search of this Son of God.

The crucifixion came upon her as an utterly unexpected and terrible grief. It stunned and bewildered her. There had been so much triumph and gladness in her heart, as she read of Him working miracles, and being transfigured before Peter, and James, and John, and entering into Jerusalem with the crowds shouting Hosanna! that, like the disciples themselves, she could not believe that He would really suffer His enemies to put Him to death. She read the words as if in a dream, and turned back to the beginning of the chapter with a wretched feeling of mingled dread and unbelief, and looked at the heading of it again.

With a low cry, which went to the heart of Matthias as he heard it in his room below, Carola threw herself on her knees beside the window, and hid her face in her hands. Oh, how interested she had been in this Jesus, from the time she read of Him as a little baby, with the wise men worshipping Him, all through His life among men, healing them, and teaching them, and talking to them in parables; loving them and blessing little children; and she had felt how kind He was, and wished she could go and see Him; but now they had put Him to a cruel death, and all was over! How could such a thing be? The light that was in Him had suddenly gone out, and the darkness had come again. And this was the most terrible darkness of all. She had not thought that the life in Him could ever be extinguished in death.

PAUL BEFORE FELIX.

S. S. Lesson for March 8, Acts 24: 10-27. Golden Text, ver. 25. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Paul Indicted—The Charge—His Defence—The Formalists Offended by his Sincerity—Real Faith an Offence in these Times—Testimony to Resurrection Power—The Trial Adjourned—Paul's Spiritual Growth in Retirement—Summoned to Preach before Felix—Probable Preparation—God's Words Given him for Felix—The Truth Spoken—Felix Trembles—His Procrastination.

THE Jews were not long in coming to the charge against Paul. The chief priest came down to Casarea in person, and, in order to strengthen his cause, he brought with him, besides the elders, a popular orator named Tertullus, thinking, no doubt, by this means to gain his cause and work Paul's destruction. This hireling, whose ready utterance could serve any cause which answered best for his own interests, after a fulsome flattery of the governor (a man living in open sin), began to accuse Paul. The terms of his

were as follows: that he was "a pestilent fellow, a mover of sedition among all the Jews throughout all the world, and a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes; who hath also gone about to profane the temple." In all this there was nothing to prove that Paul had broken one single law, civil or ecclesiastical. The law does not take cognizance of what a man is, or of what others may say he is, but of what he does; and of the testimony by which his deeds can be proved. Tertullus also accused Claudius Lysias of interfering with the execution of Jewish law by taking Paul, with great violence, out of their hands. To all this the Jews assented, but as yet nothing was really substantiated against him.

The governor beckoned Paul to speak. No fear of consequences, no nervous terror that a word might betray him and his cause be lost, no hesitation or tremulousness, could be seen in Paul; in his own words he cheerfully answered for himself. Paul stood before Felix for God's cause, not his own, and he told out the simple facts as they were, saying what God led him to say, and no more. He told how twelve days previously he had gone "up to Jerusalem for to worship;" how that the Jews found him in the temple neither "disputing with any man, neither rousing up the people, neither in the synagogues, nor in the city. Neither can they prove the things whereof they now accuse me." Here was his simple answer. No amount of eloquence or declamation can establish an accusation against a man if no proof of it can be found. "But this I confess unto thee, that after the way so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets." "I worship the God of my fathers believing." This was Paul's confession, "I hold as real, and treat as real, all which God says; this they call heresy." Yes, this is what the majority of professing Christians throughout the world call heresy. That which was mere doctrine to the Jews was life, power, and experience to Paul; that which to them was "the letter" which "killeth" was to him the Spirit which giveth life. He believed the same things as they did; their Scriptures were his, but Christ filled them all to him, and they could not see Christ in them anywhere. So is it now; after the way which men call heresy, we trust Jesus dwelling in us by faith to keep us from sin in reality, and we find He does, so that sin does not have dominion over us (Rom. 6: 14). We trust the Holy Spirit dwelling in us to quicken our mortal bodies (not our dead bodies in the resurrection merely, but our mortal bodies down here) "by His Spirit that dwelleth in us;" dwelleth now in us. And we trust that the Holy Ghost to apply to us the blessed fact that Jesus took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses (Matt. 8: 16, 17). This men call heresy, but it is only the Word of God taken as real, as meaning just what it says.

Speaking of the resurrection, Paul said: "I have hope toward God which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." But Paul did not stop at the doctrine; to him it was a power in his life. Heret (i.e., in his knowledge of the resurrection) "do I exercise myself, to have a conscience void of offence toward God and toward men." To Paul the resurrection was not a doctrine which he as a Pharisee could argue with the Sadducees; it was

A FACT.

He saw eternal issues in all which transpired day by day; nothing was small to him, because nothing could be as though it had never been. God was in everything, eternity was in everything, and he held it his life's vocation to have a conscience void of offence, to have all things right with God, all things right with man on his side. A conscience yielded to God for God to rebuke when He will, and teach what He will, is kept by Him continually "void of offence." Paul's exercise, as he tells us elsewhere, was the good fight of faith (1 Tim. 6: 12). "Now after many years I came to bring alms to my nation, and offerings. Whereupon certain Jews from Asia found me purified in the temple, neither with multitude, nor with tumult. Who ought to have been here before thee, and object, if they had aught against me. Or else let these same here say, if they have found any evil doing in me, while I stood before the council, except it be for this one voice, that I cried standing among them, Touching the resurrection of the dead I am called in question by you this day."

Felix had no particular interest in the trial; he was not a man of God, and he had no object to attain in specially favoring the Jewish elders, so he deferred them, and said: "When Lysias the chief captain" (the only party against whom any substantial charge had been laid) "shall come down, I will hear the uttermost of your matter." All this time God's hand was manifestly at work overruling men and circumstances and working out His own ends for Paul and for the truth. Felix commanded a centurion to keep Paul and to let him have liberty, to forbid none of his acquaintance to minister or to come unto him. Paul had many acquaintances at Casarea, and his being a state prisoner would not prevent their coming to him to learn of God. Thus the Lord gave him a place of ministry. True he could no longer travel hither and thither to preach the Gospel, but it is possible that it was at this time that he was trained in that life of effectual prayer which we see coming out in all his Epistles. As he decreased (John 3: 30), both in opportunities and extent of active service, a wider, more glorious area opened before him, in which God should be the Worker, and he should stand behind God, simply praying and counting on His faithfulness.

Something, however, of what Paul had said must have struck Felix. After some days the governor sent for him to preach before him and his wife Drusilla, if wife she was, for her own first husband was living. The subject of

was to be "the faith in Christ." The very words spoken by God to Ananias at the time of Paul's conversion were beginning to be realized, "He is a chosen vessel unto me to bear my name before the Gentiles, and kings and the children of Israel." Paul's ministry among the Gentiles was drawing to an end, and the time of his testimony before kings or rulers was dawning. He saw God's glorious opportunity in this call to preach before Felix. Did he get into a state of agitation, revolving in his mind by what argument such a man could best be convinced, and did he spend the previous night in deep study and careful preparation? We are not told; but we could say almost certainly, "No." Was he much in prayer? Probably he was; but it was praying in the Holy Ghost, led of the Spirit; no feverish urging of God to bless as though He were unwilling, but a settled, calm assurance that the Lord would undertake both his discourse and also its effect upon the hearers.

God knew the audience, and led Paul to speak of "righteousness;" God's standard of righteousness, God's own righteousness, God's way of righteousness, His demand that we His people shall be righteous. And the unholy man who sat to judge him felt the truth of God entering his conscience and bringing him before the bar of impartial holiness and justice. Paul went on to talk of "temperance," of a holy life and the power to live it, and then the man with clear conscience preached to the man of guilty conscience concerning the "judgment to come," which had no terror for himself, but which must condemn the sinful man before whom he stood, either now or when it was too late.

The prisoner stood calm and firm in his God, eloquently pleading His cause. The judge trembled; his countenance fell; he would not so much as look his prisoner in the face. "Go thy way he said, this first time in which God had spoken to him with power. He felt free to put off God's advances toward him, and said to Paul, "When I have a convenient reason, I will call for thee." "God must wait my convenience." Is this a sinner's position? Felix had something else in view; he saw how Paul was prized by his friends, and he hoped to make money out of his detention, and hoped that among his friends a bribe for his release might have been raised. How little Felix knew a heart which can trust God! For two years God permitted him to detain Paul, but all this time God's purposes were being worked out.

FOR THIS TIME,"

THE CELEBRITIES OF THE BRITISH CAMPAIGN IN THE SOUDAN.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

IN our news column we have endeavored to keep our readers acquainted with the progress of the remarkable war the British Government is now waging in the Soudan. A brief recapitulation, therefore, is all that is necessary here. Originally, the Government decided to abandon the Soudan, concerning themselves with Egypt proper. Egypt itself they have again and again declared they do not intend to hold permanently, but only to occupy until its government is well established and its finances adjusted on a prosperous and efficient basis.

It was found, however, that the Mahdi intended to overrun Egypt. He believes himself, or rather represents himself (for we do not know what he believes), as the successor of Mohammed, commissioned to extend the Mohammedan faith over the whole world. Egypt could never be secure with the Soudan on its borders boiling over with fanaticism, and therefore it became necessary to commence a campaign in the Soudan. Peaceable measures were tried first. General Gordon, who had once, under the former Viceroy of Egypt, held the position of Governor of the Soudan, and was very popular with the people, was sent to assure them that England was desirous only of their welfare, and wished them to establish a government of their own. The Mahdi had, however, aroused the fanaticism of the people, and they hesitated whether to trust to General Gordon or to join hands with the Mahdi. Finally, General Gordon was surrounded in Khartoum by the Mahdi's forces. His appeals to England for assistance were disregarded until it was too late to rescue him, and he is believed to have fallen a victim to treachery.

The army sent to the relief of General Gordon has undergone severe privations, and has fought several desperate battles. On the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week are portraits of some of the men who have distinguished themselves in the campaign—men whose names figure prominently in the cable dispatches our daily journals are publishing, and with whose features our readers may like to familiarize themselves.

GENERAL LORD WOLSELEY.

Commander of the Gordon Relief Expedition.

LORD WOLSELEY, better known by his former title of Sir Garnet Wolseley, is descended from a family originally belonging to the County of Stafford, where they had been settled before the Norman Conquest in 1066.

General Wolseley is fifty-two years old, having been born in Dublin on June 4th, 1833. He was educated at a private school and under tutors. He entered the army as an ensign in the Twelfth Foot, in March, 1852, but on the 13th of the following month was transferred to the Eightieth Regiment.

HIS FIRST MILITARY SERVICE was in the Burmese War of 1852-53, for which he received the medal for Pegu, and he was with the expedition under Sir John Cheape, against the robber chief Myattoon, being severely wounded in the attack on that chief's stronghold. Landing in the Crimea with the Ninetieth Light Infantry, in December, 1854, he was employed in the trenches as acting engineer until Sebastopol was taken, being severely wounded in a sortie, and several times mentioned for skill and valor in dispatches. For his services he received the medal with clasp, was made a Knight of the Legion of Honor, received the fifth clasp of the Medjidie and the Turkish medal.

IN THE INDIAN MUTINY

he served with distinction against the savages for the rescue of the besieged garrisons. He was repeatedly mentioned in dispatches and received the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and the medal with clasp. In the war of 1860 in China, he served upon the quartermaster-general's staff, and was present at the assault of the Taku forts, and in all the engagements throughout the campaign, receiving another medal with two clasps.

Ten years later he commanded the expedition sent from territory for the suppression of the rebel government established at Fort Garry, and was created a Knight of St. Michael and St. George for his services upon that occasion. He was governor and commander of the forces on the Gold Coast during the Ashantee War of 1873-74, and for his services then was promoted to be major-general for distinguished service, nominated a Grand Cross of St. Michael and St. George and Knight Commander of the Bath, and received the medal with clasp.

In the last-named war he was dispatched to Natal to administer the government of that colony from November, 1875, till November, 1876, was inspector-general of the auxiliary forces at the headquarters of the army, at the latter date was appointed a member of the Council of India, and in 1878 High Commissioner and Commander-in-Chief of the Island of Cyprus. In June, 1879, he was sent to South Africa as High Commissioner and and the Transvaal, to reorganize the affairs of Zululand, and on that occasion conducted the operations against Secocoeni, whose stronghold he destroyed. Returning in May, 1880, he was appointed quartermaster-general at the headquarters of the army, and succeeded Sir Charles Ellice as adjutant-general of the army. He was appointed general officer commanding-in-chief, with temporary rank of general, of the expeditionary force proceeding to Egypt in 1882. His smart and masterly conduct of that campaign won for him his peerage and the pension of $125,000.

In September, 1884, he was authorized by the government to organize an expedition for who was then in a perilous condition in the besieged city of Khartoum, and on the 9th of the same month he arrived at Cairo. He got together a sufficient number of camel and other corps for his purpose, and on Saturday, October 4th, commenced his forward march into the Soudan, via the River Nile, with Khartoum for his destination. His headquarters are at Korti, on the edge of the Soudan desert.

Lord Wolseley is an earnest advocate of total abstinence principles, and in his "Soldier's Pocketbook for Field Service," published in 1866, he strongly inveighs against the serving out of grog to soldiers, and inculcates upon them habits of temperance and self-control.

SIR HERBERT STEWART, K.C.B.

who has died from the wounds he received at Abu Klea, was carried with the army to Gubat. While he lay ill he was promoted to the rank of major-general for "distinguished service in the field." He had the arduous task intrusted to him by Lord Wolseley of establishing a line of posts across the Great Bayuda Desert, in the Soudan, between Korti, Lord Wolseley's headquarters, and Metemma. He was, in the estimation of competent judges, one of the most promising cavalry leaders in the army. He began his career in the infantry, his first commission being that of ensign in the Thirty-seventh Foot, of which regiment he became adjutant. He exchanged as captain into the Third Dragoon Guards. But he had not done much regimental duty for many years until the present campaign. He is said to have been as good a man of business as he was a gallant soldier.

A few years back, when ordered off on one of the many campaigns he has taken part in, he found it necessary to dispose of his London house. He did this to such advantage that he realized a considerable profit. The capital thus acquired he employed with shrewd judgment in the purchase of other house property, his operations gradually increasing till he became a landlord on rather a large scale. The management of all this property he kept in his own hands; and the story goes that after the battle of Tel-el-Kebir, in which he had been actively engaged as assistant adjutant-general of the cavalry division, Sir Herbert, at the first moment of his leisure, dismounted to give a brief attention to his private affairs. An agent or employé had followed him out from England with a large bundle of leases and other legal documents, which Colonel Stewart proceeded to sign in a business-like fashion, using a drum-head as a table.

Sir Herbert Stewart's march to the wells of Gakkul and Shebach, across nearly two hundred miles of savage desert, defying hunger, thirst, sleeplessness, against overwhelming odds, will long have place in the military annals of England as an exploit brilliant in conception, and dashing in the manner of its execution. He was shot in the stomach during the engagement at Abu Klea, on January 19th. He was a man of temperate habits and a spare, active frame, a water drinker, and comparatively young. The surgeons, however, knew from the first that from the nature of his wound recovery was hopeless.

AFTER the battle of Abu Klea, in which General Stewart was shot down by the Arabs, Sir Charles Wilson, who was serving under him, took the command and is now endeavoring to conduct the retreat of the little force to Korti. He is well experienced in the ways of Eastern nations, having served as commissioner for the Serbian frontier in 1878, and as Consul General in Anatolia during the following year. When General Stewart formed the zereba under the heavy fire by which he was eventually wounded, and while the exulting Arabs formed a circle, which enveloped the little square in what their enemy intended should prove for the English a veritable Sedan, Sir Charles Wilson rallied the men and encouraged them to stand firm under the attack of the mighty host opposed to them. Thrice did the British square seem in danger of being overwhelmed; three times did the fierce Arabs recoil before the steady, unmoved, dogged resistance of the British. At length they retired, despairing for the time of overcoming them.

After the victory at Gubat, Sir C. Wilson went, on January 24th, to Khartoum, in one of General Gordon's steamers, and arriving there on January 28th, found by the Mahdi's army, and had great difficulty in escaping back to Gubat, as his steamer was fired on from the banks of the Nile, and was also wrecked in a cataract. He and his companions, however, were carried in another vessel to Gubat.

Of the other officers who have distinguished themselves in the Soudan campaign, and whose portraits appear on our front page, we need only state that LORD CHARLES BERESFORD, R.N., made for himself a famous name by his courageous conduct as commander of the Concor during the bombardment of Alexandria. He now has charge of the Nile flotilla.

CAPTAIN THE EARL OF AIRLIE

holds a responsible appointment on the staff of General Wolseley as brigadier-major. He was wounded at the very commencement of hostilities, but is said to have bravely continued on the field in spite of much suffering. He has since received a second wound, from which he is slowly recovering.

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR REDVERS BULLER is the chief of Lord Wolseley's staff. He is an old and tried officer, having served under his present chief in most of his undertakings in the Red River Expedition of 1870, in the Ashantee War of 1874, and in the first Egyptian Expedition, 1882, besides in such subsidiary affairs as the Caffre and Zulu Wars.

THE LATE MR. CAMERON,

Correspondent of the London "Standard."

MR. CAMERON was one of those who fell on the field of battle near Metemma on January

9th. For six years previously he had acted for the same journal in different parts of the world. From the very first his indefatigable energy, daring, and enterprise placed him in the front rank of special correspondents, and the position which he gained in the Afghan War was more than maintained in each succeeding campaign in which he took part. Mr. Cameron loved his profession, and his leading characteristic was his sense of duty. Like many other special correspondents who have made a high mark, Mr. Cameron had no training for journalism; he took to it with instinctive aptitude; his genius as natural, and showed itself at the first opportunity.

Intended originally for commerce, he went out to India, and was there engaged in mercantile pursuits when, at the outbreak of the Afghan war in 1875, the chance presented itself, and, relinquishing his business, he applied for and obtained the post of special correspondent for the Bombay Gazette. The brilliancy and thoroughness of his work attracted attention, and, when, toward the end of the following year, the advance of Ayoub Khan, and the British defeat at Maiwand, caused the war to break out afresh, he offered his services to the London Standard, and was immediately instructed to join the column which, under General Phayrer, was preparing to march to the relief of Candahar.

On a journeying night and day, he reached Quetta seven days after leaving Bombay, having ridden up the Bolan Pass from Sibi in thirty-six hours. He was the first to ride with the news of the victory of General Roberts to the nearest telegraph post, beating his competitors and the government couriers by a day and a half. Then, turning with equal rapidity to Candahar, he accompanied the first party who went out to the field of Maiwand, and sent home a description of the scene and of the fighting which established his reputation as one of the ablest as well as most enterprising of journalists.

Soon after his return to Bombay the Boer insurrection broke out. Mr. Cameron at once crossed to Natal, arriving there long before the correspondents dispatched from England could reach the spot. He was present at the battles of Laing's Neck and Ingogo, and at the fatal one on Majuba Hill, where he was knocked down and the Boers, but contrived, nevertheless, on the following day to get through a long message, descriptive of the battle. After peace was declared he returned to England, but upon news of the first riots in Alexandria, left for Egypt, and was present on board the admiral's ship, the Invincible, at the bombardment of Alexandria. He continued with the British forces until their arrival at Cairo, having witnessed and described every engagement which took place.

He had now earned a long rest, but was eager to be at work again, and, after a short interval, returned for Madagascar. His visit to the capital and the letters which he dispatched during his stay attracted great attention, as being the trustworthy accounts of the state of affairs in the island. As the French delayed their attack, and it was altogether uncertain when hostilities would commence, he crossed the Pacific to Melbourne, and then made his way to Tonkin, where the fighting between the French and the natives had just begun.

English correspondents not being allowed to remain with the French forces, Mr. Cameron, on his way home when Osman Digna's forces began to threaten Suakim, and no sooner did he reach Suez than he took ship for that port. He was present when Baker Pasha's force was crushed by the Arabs, and there he NARROWLY ESCAPED WITH HIS LIFE.

He remained at Suakim until the British expeditionary force arrived, accompanied them in their advance upon Tokar, and was a witness of the recent battles of El Teb and Tamanieb. His return to England after his return from this long absence was brief, for in a few weeks he again started for Egypt, and pushed up the Nile with the advanced boats of Lord Wolseley's expedition. The Arab bullet which ended his brilliant, and promising career, has carried away the foremost of the little band of correspondents who daily risk their lives for the public good; it has also deprived journalism of one of the most indefatigable and unselfish of workers, and his friends of a most genial, lovable, and kindly comrade.

In his sermon on Sunday morning, February 1st, the Rev. J. G. Rogers, a Congregational minister in the environs of London, mentioned that Mr. Cameron had sat, years ago, as a slim youth, and last summer as a stalwart man, in the church of which he is the minister. Ere starting on his journey to Egypt he had expressed a fear that he would not return. Mr. Rogers uttered words of profound sympathy with his widowed mother.

"SCATTERED AND PEELED."

DURING the past few months little information has appeared in the daily journals respecting the condition of the Jews. The shocking outrages which occurred in Russia two years ago brought into unusual prominence the miseries endured by God's chosen people. The silence now observed respecting them might lead to the inference that persecution has ceased. The following survey, however, of their condition throughout Europe, written by a Christian lady whose work among the Jews is indefatigable, shows that they are still enduring terrible hardships and are yet a nation scattered and peeled" (Isa. 18 : 2) :

Persecution is still active, and is increasing. The Jews in Roumania are suffering under the oppressive laws recently brought to bear upon them in that country. The unfortunate people are driven out of every industry by which they could earn their bread, forbidden to live in rural districts, precluded from working as artisans or trading in the towns. The following cases show the brutal manner in which the law is carried out. Here is

A RECENT INCIDENT.

A Jew was lately murdered by a native Christian. The criminal was brought to trial. His advocate pleaded that the man ought not to be punished, though proved to be guilty, and urged that as every Jew kills the souls of Christians (whatever that may mean), it is not wrong for a Christian to kill the body of a Jew! The murderer was acquitted!

The Jewish Chronicle of January 9th, 1885, gives the following appalling account: Two alleged cases of cattle disease having broken out at Darabani, the Prefect of the district instructed the local Commissary of Police, Filipescus to take the necessary measures for preventing the spread of the disease. This functionary carried out his instructions in the following extraordinary manner. In the first place, he caused ten, and subsequently thirty, Jews to be seized, and forced them, by dint of most inhuman treatment, to erect a wall around the town, although they knew nothing of building operations. Day and night, in storm and rain, they were mercilessly kept at their work by their taskmasters, à la Pharaoh, until at length a veterinary surgeon was induced to intervene, and advise that the construction of the wall might be discontinued as the rinderpest did not prevail in the place. So harshly were the Jewish laborers, among whom were several aged men, dealt with, that they were even compelled to work on the Day of Atonement. On the Feast of Tabernacles the synagogue was actually closed, because all the men were at work.

FUMIGATION.

Perhaps still worse was the treatment which the Jews who were spared from the work in the fields had to endure on the Day of Atonement. Scarcely had the thinned congregation assembled within their synagogue when Filipescus arrived with several policemen, and having posted them at the several exits, in order to prevent any egress from within, he caused a quantity of sulphur to be burned inside the building, in order, as alleged, to thoroughly disinfect the place. The unfortunate worshippers were almost suffocated; women fell to the ground unconscious, and it was not until the tyrannical Filipescus perceived that it would be dangerous to prolong his amusement that the doors were opened and the prisoners liberated. Meanwhile terrible scenes were being enacted in other parts of the town. Bands of ruffians broke into houses inhabited by Jews, destroyed and plundered everything on which they could lay their hands, and ill-treated the persons, mostly women, whom they found in the dwellings. These barbarities were continued on the following day, although a number of Jews had fled from the town during the night. The results of these atrocities were of a fearful character, and women died from fright.

In addition to these gross persecutions, the Jews were also exposed to various annoyances of a more or less vexatious character. The slaughtering of animals was absolutely forbidden; but the poultry which the Shochet was allowed to kill were rendered unfit for consumption owing to all the birds being immersed in a solution of sulphur and carbolic acid. When the men who had been engaged in building the wall were released from their involuntary labor, they were sprinkled by some officials with carbolic acid. So roughly was this done that several of them were severely burned.

AT ODESSA

The Jewish merchants have suddenly received notice of expulsion at the new year unless they pay the fee of one thousand roubles (about five hundred dollars) annually for license as first-class merchants. The date is purposely fixed to interfere with the usual getting in of trade debts at the end of the old year. The Jews will have to go—pay all their debts, sell off at a loss, and leave before getting in the payments due to them. In two great provinces a cruel law of Emperor Nicholas is now revived, driving all Jews near the frontier into the interior. All this in the depth of Russian winter!

Matters are not much better in Austria. There has been a serious outbreak, with loss of life, at Cracow. In Hungary outrages still continue; and though the Austrian Government is by no means unfriendly, local judges and officials join actively in ill-treating Jews.

Mr. F. D. Mocatta reports that in the capital of where the Jews till lately have been at peace, they are now in fear of disturbances, on account of Russian and German influence. He adds that the position of Jews in Servia and in Turkey is everything that can be desired. In Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia there is nothing to be complained of, so far as the law is concerned; but the pamphlets industriously circulated, often with sensational illustrations about the "blood accusation," are doing much harm, and the Jews are very much depressed about their future.

In Germany the anti-Semites are busy with active propaganda against the Jews both there and abroad.

A terrible persecution has long been going on in Morocco unchecked. Emigration is the only resource left, but whither shall Jews go? Most European States, as well as America, now refuse to admit refugees unless they bring funds with them.

Turkey and the land of promise are again open; thither the homeless wanderers must and will assuredly turn their steps. Many have already gone there. There are now many refugees in Galilee and also in Jerusalem, where among the eighteen to twenty thousand Jews, mostly destitute, are many refugees from Europe, Arabia and Africa.

During the last two years we have been enabled to help in various places, and many ways, a very considerable number. We feel assured that Christian sympathy with persecuted Jews will not fail; and that, in view of the increasing distress, increased help will be afforded.

THE BLOOD.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached last Sunday Morning, March 1, 1885.

[It was Communion Sabbath at the Tabernacle, and Dr. Talmage gave the right hand of fellowship to one hundred and eighty-nine new members, raising the total membership of the church to thirty-two hundred and eighteen.]

"The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin."—1 JOHN 1: 7.

It was Royal Blood—The King Dying—Human Blood—II. A Brother's Blood—Who Slew Him—III. Substitutionary Blood—A Place to Bring Sin—That Old Sin—The Backslider's Guilt—The Pride of Morality—Not as Pure as you Think—One Man against a Million Sins—Different Kinds of Hands—Reception at the Gates.

This is a memorable day in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. On other days we throw out the Gospel net. To-day we haul it in. On other days, as the Lord's servants, we carry out the invitations to come to the King's feast. To-day we sit at the banquet. On other days we go out to fight the battles of the Lord. To-day we shout victory.

To many of you has the promise been fulfilled, "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy." I congratulate the church of Jesus Christ upon what has been accomplished through the prayers and the earnest efforts of the people. But the

is not for any human instrumentality. The victory of Agincourt was so great that after the battle the king commanded the chaplain to read the psalm of David, in which occur the words, "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory;" and when the chaplain came to that phrase, the king got off his horse, and all the cavalry dismounted, and the entire army prostrated itself upon the face, and they echoed the voice of the chaplain, crying, "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory." Here have been great victories of grace. God has gone forth from conquest to conquest. It has been a great battlefield, in which Jesus Christ hath won a triumph, and it seems to me it is time for the hosts of earth and the hosts of heaven to come down on their faces, crying, "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory."

CHRIST'S MANLY BEAUTY.

Nearly nineteen centuries ago there appeared one Jesus. Publius Lentulus, in his letter to the Roman Senate, describes Him as being of stature rather tall, with hair the color of chestnut fully ripe, smooth to the ears, and then flowing and curling down over the shoulders. In the midst of the forehead, says the writer, a stream or a partition of the hair. His beard the same color, and very full but not long. Eye gray and clear. The nose and the mouth formed as no description on earth could represent them. His face without spot or wrinkle, and a lovely red. His posture one of gracefulness and symmetry beyond description. So the letter to the Roman Senate describes Him. But He must die. The French army in Italy found a brass plate containing a copy of that death warrant signed by John Zerrubabel, Raphael Rabboni, Daniel Rabboni, and Capet. When other victims have been taken to execution, there has been danger that the mob would rescue the victim. There is no prospect of that in this scene, for the mob are aiding Him. From 9 A.M. to 3 P.M. Jesus hung a-dying. It was a scene of blood. We are so constituted there is nothing so exciting as blood. If a child have fallen in the street, his bitter cry does not affect us so much as the crimson dripping from the lip. Going through a dark hall, if we find finger marks of blood on the plastering, we say, "What dreadful deed has been done here?"

The whole scene of Calvary was

A SCENE OF BLOOD.

Blood dripping from the thorns and nails. Blood rushing from the temples. Blood soaking the garments. Blood gathered in a pool beneath the cross. Oh, there is one crimson word in my text that arouses all our sensibilities, stirs all our emotions, and brings before us the most tremendous scene of the centuries—just one crimson word: "The blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth from all sin."

I. First, it was

ROYAL BLOOD.

In this country, with our democratic preferences, we pretend to despise royalty; but let some foreign potentate come to this land, and if he be king of some insignificant island, all the people turn out to gaze upon him. When the Prince of Wales visited this country some years ago hundreds of thousands of people came out and huzzaed in the streets because some day he would probably wear a crown. It is considered a great honor to have in one's veins the blood of the House of Stuart or the blood of the House of Hapsburg; but I have to tell you to-day that the blood that rushed from the cross is more royal blood. It is the blood of a King—the King of Earth and Heaven.

The honors of Henry were so great they were divided up among different reigns, and it was Henry I. and Henry II. and Henry III. and Henry IV. and Henry V. The honors of the name of Louis were so great in France that these honors were divided up among different names, and it was Louis I. and Louis II. and Louis III. But I can say in regard to our King, it is Christ the first and Christ the last and Christ the only.

THE KING IS DYING.

You remember the thrill of excitement in all the world when, a few years ago, the Czar of Russia was about to expire. He was known to be in his last sickness. The bulletins went out from the palace, every hour: "The king is better," "The king is worse," "The king was delirious last night," "The king slept well," "The king is dying," "The king is dead." The bells tolled it and the flags signalled it and the telegraphs flashed it. I have to tell you that Christ our King is sick in His last sickness. He is breathing the last groan. His body is shivering with the last anguish. The King is dying. The King is dead. But if a Roman surgeon had stood under the cross and had known enough to have analyzed one drop of that falling blood, he would have found in it the same plasma, the same disk, the same fibrine, the same albumen as characterizes the blood of others. In other words, it was unmistakably

HUMAN BLOOD.

That is a man hanging on the cross. It is sometimes said that the Unitarians make too much of the humanity of Christ. I reply, the Trinitarians make too little. When I see Jesus hanging upon the cross all my sympathies are stirred. If He had belonged to a higher order of beings, if He had been angelic in His nature, I could not so much have understood why we sympathize; but He is bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh, and heart of our heart, and we may imagine something how the spikes hurt Him, and how hot His temples grew, and what sickness seized His heart, and how countenance and city and mob swam away from His vision, and something of the meaning of that cry for help which has made the blood of all ages curdle: "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" Oh, it was royal blood, and it was human blood!

II. I go further and tell you it was

A BROTHER'S BLOOD.

If you go down the street and you find a stranger maltreated you are indignant; you rush upon the scene, you say: "You villains, what do you mean by maltreating this man? I never saw him before, but you have no right to run upon him in this way." But suppose you are going down the street and you see a group of desperate doers, and you find that they are running upon your own brother. You rush upon the scene and say to them: "That is my brother; awa with you; touch him if you dare!" You thro your own life between your brother and the desperadoes. I have to tell you this one hanging on the cross is your brother. They strue Him, they mocked Him, they spit on Him. How do you feel about that? How do you stand that indignity to your brother? Do you not feel as if you could put your back again the cross, and put your back against the suffering form of the Lord Jesus Christ, and then tal some good sword, and with it he w down the desperadoes that assail Him? But you cannot rescue Him, you cannot bring Him from the cross. He is your brother, and He is dying, and He dead!

And there is something else I will say abo it. Shall I tell you the whole truth? I will.

YOU SLEW HIM.

I charge the sin first upon myself, then I char it upon all who hear me to-day. Our sins, o follies, our wickedness put Him to death. O transgressions were the nails, the thorns, t spikes, the vinegar, the mockery, the darkne I charge it first upon myself, then I charge upon you. Fratricide, fratricide! A brothe blood! And we slew Him!

VICARIOUS BLOOD.

III. Another remark I want to make in rega to that blood, and that is, it was substitut ary. Our sins cry to heaven for vengean. Some one must die. Who shall it be? Let be me," said Jesus. You were drafted for t last war. You provided a substitute. He w out, and he was slain at Lookout Mountain o Gettysburg. He died for you. You have large debt to pay, and you cannot meet the o gation. A friend of great wealth comes in t pays that debt. He is your substitute. No you see—what I mean when I say that Chr blood was substitutionary. He fought our t le, He died our death, He paid our debt, suffered our agonies.

The blood of Paul, which soaked the dus the guillotine, the blood of Hugh McKail i simmered in the fire, the blood of the h souled martyrs that reddened the mouths o lions in the Coliseum, are worth just as m to you as the blood of Christ, unless you sea it was expiatory, substitutionary for you, and in that respect differing from all o blood. Well, if all this be true, then come get your sins pardoned.

I do not invite you to a private confessio I do not invite you to whisper your offence my ear, for I am like yourself; I need the s pardon, and the pulpit is on the level with pew; and if the grace that saves you is requ in any case it is requisite in my case. So not want your confessional, I do not want to tell the story of the offences of your li me. Just where you are seated, or where are standing, take the blood cleansing, take blood pardoning. First of all

THAT OLD SIN.

You say, "What do you mean by that? mean that sin five or ten or twenty years You know what I mean. That sin which accumulated, because sin is like a debt; added unto by the interest, and then it i times what it once was, that old sin, unlc has been pardoned, because of all the opp nities you have had of having it pardoned since. Now, that old sin, how are you goi get rid of it? Does that sin present its d the doorway of your soul? Does it say, 'me what thou owest'? Does it propose t you out? Does it propose to bring you int carceration? How are you going to get t that old sin? Bring all your bonds and r gages and certificates of stock and all your crament securities. Bring them all, and l count them. Not enough. Bring all the c things you ever did, bring all the clever t you ever said. Let me count them. enough. Bring all you have. But you say we brought it; I can't pay this debt, I can't meet this obligation." Then you must die? O. The blood, the substitutionary blood, the other's blood, the royal blood, can wash it all away.

I know that circumstances sometimes aggravate one's transgressions. If a child unwittingly does wrong you easily forgive him; but we have one wrong, and we knew we were doing wrong, every time a man sins conscience rings the funeral bell. We may pretend not to hear it, we may put our fingers in our ears and try to go away from that sound; but having transgressed, though we may have our fingers in our ears, we will hear the word coming: "The wages of sin is death. The soul that sinneth, it shall die. The way of the transgressor is hard." When you and I do wrong, when we have said that which we ought not to have said, when we have done that which we ought not to have done, we know it, we knew it.

Now, here is a man who twenty years ago knelt to a Methodist altar and gave his heart to God, and in some Presbyterian church professed faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. He went on seemingly in the right way for some time. He then went back to the world. He is a backslider. Is he happy? There is no nest of scorpions outside of hell so dreadful as the nest of scorpions in the backslider's heart. Oh, where is that roken-down family altar you once built? Where is that closet of private prayer you once had?

Common-sense tells us if a man come so near Christ that he feels the throb of His love and then goes back to sin again, he must have a bitter cup to drink, and the thunders that drive him away will roll and roar with the accumulated wrath of God omnipotent. And yet, my text warns a circle of pardon all around the sins of that backslider. Fires may not be able to burn them out, hoofs may not be able to stamp them out, hammers may not be able to pound them out; but here is blood that can wash them out.

So I can come to the man in this house who is the worst man here, I can come to the man in his house who declares he is the worst man on earth, and I can preach the Gospel with just as much confidence to him as to this man who has all his life preserved his integrity. Oh, the broadness of this Gospel that says, "Whosoever, whosoever!" However far you have wandered away from God you can come back, though you have gone through all the sins of the decalogue. "Whosoever, whosoever will, let him come."

"Oh," says some man in the house, "all that is very true."

FOR IMMORAL PEOPLE, but I have been a moral man all my life, and I don't need the gracious pardon. Have your thoughts always been right? Would you like to have the thoughts of the last fifteen years written out and presented before the eye of the world? No. And if you would not want the thoughts of the last fifteen years all written out before the eye of the world, certainly you could not stand the divine scrutiny. Now, there is my right hand, and there is my left hand. You see the one just as plainly as the other. Well now, the sin of the heart and the sin of the life are as plain before God, the one as the other, and a thought to Him is just as plain as an action. Ah! you need the pardon of the Gospel.

You say you have never committed this, and you have never committed that, and you would not have done as this man did, and you would not as this man have gone astray in this direction and as that man in another direction. Why, my brother, whether you know it or not, you have gone astray in many directions. You say you have never committed murder. How do you know? Have you ever hated anybody? Yes. Then you are a murderer. The Bible says so. Christ says so. "He that hateth his brother is a murderer." Do you hate anybody now? Is there anybody in all the earth you hate now? You are a murderer. "He that hateth his brother is a murderer." So, my brother, you are you were, you are not as good as you thought you were, if you say you have no sin to be forgiven.

You say you have never committed theft. I do not suppose you have ever wronged your fellow-man, but have you taken an hour of a day from God and devoted it to wrong purposes? If you have, then you have been guilty of robbing God. It is a mean thing to steal from a man. It is a worse thing to steal from God. The Bible cries out, Will a man rob God? Yes; we have all robbed Him. Now, let us come to confessional, and let us acknowledge that we need the mercy and the pardon of God. We all need it; there is not an exception. "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God. There is none that doeth good, no, not one."

Just let me blow the trumpet of resurrection, and let the sins of the best man in this house—all the sins of his past life—come up. Let the larger sin of the hundred be captain of the company, and let the greater sin of the thousand be colonel of the regiment, and let the mightiest sin of his life command the forces, vast as those of Xerxes, vaster, vaster. All the sins of that man's life coming down upon him.

ONE MAN AGAINST A MILLION transgressions, what chance has he? Where in the round of God's mercy is there any help for us? Rise, you seas, and whelm the host. Strike, you lightning, and consume the foe. The wave rolls back from the beach, and says, "No help in me." The lightning sheathes itself in the black scabbard of the midnight cloud, and says, "No help in me." Yonder I see the rider on the white horse. Make way for the courier. He swings his sword. It is the captain of salvation come for our rescue. Fall back, my sins. Fall back, my sorrows. All the transgressions of my heart and life are utterly scattered, and I cry, "Victory through our Lord Jesus Christ!" Oh,

WHAT A CHRIST HE IS!

Do you wonder that men and women have died for Him? Do you wonder that Margaret, the Scotch girl, would not give up her Lord when fastened down to the beach of the sea, and the persecutors thought as the waves rolled on she would give up her Christ? But fastened down at the beach when the tide was out, she continued in prayer until the tide came up, came to the ankles, came to the girdle, came to the shoulder, came to the lip, and with her last utterance she said, "My Lord, my God! He has been so good to me, I cannot surrender Him now, though the waves may go over me—my Lord, my Christ, my pardon, my peace," and the waves rolled over her.

Do you wonder that men and women and children have died for such a Lord as this? Oh, do you not want His consolation as well as pardon? How many of you have had misfortunes and trials, and you want this Christ. Oh, when those into whose bosom we have breathed our sorrows are snatched away, Christ's heart still beats; and when all other lights go out, we see coming out from behind the cloud something that we cannot at first tell what it is, but it gets brighter and brighter, and we find it is the star, the star of hope, the star of consolation, the star of Jesus!

Oh, there are DIFFERENT KINDS OF HANDS.

There is the hand of care that opens hard on you, and there is the hand of bereavement that snatches your loved ones away from you, and there is the hand of temptation that strikes you back into darkness; but there is a hand so different from all these, and it is so kind, and it is so gentle. It is the hand that wipeth away all tears from all eyes—it is the hand of Jesus. Do you not want Him? Would you not like to have that pardon to-day, which I offer indiscriminately to all this house? Would you not like to have His comfort?

As at the sea beach we join hands and go down and bathe, and let the waters roll over us and we feel great exhilaration, I wish we could by scores and hundreds and thousands to-day just join hands and wade down in this great Atlantic of God's forgiveness—not standing on the margin paddling the ripples with our feet, but wading clear down in the sea and letting the crimson billows roll over us. Oh, you must have this Christ! If you reject Him, all those gaping wounds will plead against you, and they will haunt you through eternity with the thought of what you might have been. Oh, take your feet out of Brother's blood! Do not go down condemned for fratricide and regicide and decide. Do not do it! Better for thee that Calvary had never borne its burden, and better for thee that those loving lips had never uttered an invitation, if, rejecting all, you go down into desolation and darkness, your hands and feet bedabbled with the blood of the Son of God. O dying but immortal men, O judgment-bound hearers, repent, believe, and live! How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?

There will be a password at the gate of heaven! I see a great multitude coming up, and they say, "Make way, open the gate, let us in, we were honored on earth; we had a great position in the world, and we want a great position in heaven." But the gate-keeper says, "I never knew you." Here come another throng. They say, "We did a great many magnanimous things, we endowed colleges, we established schools, and we were celebrated for our philanthropies. Open the gate now. Let us come in and get our reward." A voice from within says, "I never knew you." But here come up a great throng, thousands and tens of thousands, and they knock at the gate. They say, "We were wanderers from God, and we deserved to die, but we have heard the voice of Jesus." "Ay!" says the gate-keeper, "that is the password—Jesus, Jesus, Jesus! Lift up your heads, ye everlasting gates, and let them come in."

Christian Mission Work in Greece has Received an impetus from the visit of Dr. Somerville. Referring to this visit in a recent letter, Dr. Kalopothakes, of the American Mission in Athens, says: "There has been no hindrance to his preaching here, and large audiences have gathered to listen. It will probably deepen the growing feeling among the Greeks in favor of preaching in their own churches, of which there is very little, and the want is deplored by thoughtful people. We have been glad to notice a few priests in the audience. Our own work goes on quietly as usual, with an encouraging degree of interest shown in the various publications. The introduction of the New Testament in the original as a text-book for study in the schools is of marked importance."

Mormon Methods in the South are Graphically described by the New Orleans Times-Democrat. The "missionaries," it appears, are making many converts in the South, chiefly from among "the poor whites." Their course is exceedingly crafty. In their missionary tours they are men of quiet and well-ordered demeanor, affecting great piety, preaching temperance, defending the teachings of the Old and New Testaments, yet placing beside them the Book of Mormon as of equal authority, while of polygamy they say little. There are several special arguments they urge to the poor whites of the Southern States which are particularly strong with them. The elders go from house to house, wandering through the mountains, taking no money for their preaching. If lodging is made them free they accept it, but if a charge is made they pay without complaint. Against such missionaries, working among a class of people almost totally uneducated and ignorant, there can be no argument used but the law. It is only when their dupes approach Utah that the mask is taken off; then they discover that they are in the grip of a despotism worse than that of Russia, and under the control of men whose record is stained with blood.

THE VACANT CHAIR AT WESTWOOD.

MR. C. H. SPURGEON has again been forced by the fogs and damp of the English winter to seek a brief relief in a warmer climate. During his absence his sermons will continue to be published regularly in this journal. An evening sermon or one of his popular week-day discourses will take the place of the usual morning sermon. Our readers, whose esteem for the great preacher fully equals that of his own church, will be interested in the following particulars:

Mr. C. H. Spurgeon on his way to Mentone wrote from Paris to his church at the Tabernacle:

"The advice to take three months or more of rest comes to me when I am so broken down that I must of necessity agree to it. I have come quite to the end of my strength, and therefore I yield. I am never so happy as in the pulpit, and never so happy in any pulpit as in my own. Years have endeared us to each other. The great success which we have shared, and the trials which we have endured in common, have knit us together in one till death doth us part. I would not be absent from a single service all the year round if I could help it; but you know my infirmities, and you show your loving sympathy with me in them."

The following letter from Mrs. Spurgeon tells us how affects her: "I am sitting alone, in my husband's lonely study, the profound silence broken only by the ticking of the big clock; the volumes which line the walls look frowning and gloomy in the uncertain light of evening, and the precise orderliness of the whole room gives sad and significant sign of an absent owner. The first Sabbath of his absence is drawing to a close, and the day, so fair, so bright, is going to die. All through the past twelve hours, the horizon has been glorified with light which seemed unearthly, and looking south, from these windows across the many miles of country which stretch to the Surrey Hills, the vision has been so radiant that 'thick coming fancies' could easily picture therefrom the jasper walls and pearly gates of the city which hath no need of the sun.

"I turn again from the window, cherishing the sweet thought that perhaps

THE DEAR ONE A THOUSAND MILES AWAY has been gazing on the same glorious scene, and that, though so far separated, we have together been worshipping the great Creator of heaven and earth, blessing Him for the joy of being able to say, 'This awful God is ours, our Father, and our Friend.' Now, as I sit in the soft twilight, very tender thoughts steal into my heart, and delightful memories of sacred hours here spent with my beloved come crowding in upon me. The stillness constrains me to listen for the voice which has so often made music to my soul, and I look round upon the books which I have so many times taken down and read to him, as though they might also sympathize with me in the loss we together suffer by his absence. But they are dumb, and make no sign; all their wisdom, and learning, and piety are locked up within themselves; they are treasures, of which my absent lord has the key, they are like stones which only my philosopher

CAN TURN INTO GOLD.

"I almost begin to murmur against the circumstances which make the separation from my husband unavoidable, and I am fast falling into a fretful and peevish condition when—with a rush of joy no words can describe—I recognize the possibility of being no longer solitary or desolate; my soul is thrilled with the solemn and entrancing thought that in this very room the Master's divine presence, so often felt, may again be realized by faith, and enjoyed by my longing, waiting soul. The Lord Jesus has been so wont to come to this spot to help and bless His ministering servant, that maybe—I thought it, and now I write it with all reverence—maybe He will not have given up the blessed habit of such visits, and I shall find Him, waiting here with His hands full of blessing, and His heart full of tenderness—even for me!

"My spirit melted within me at this wonderful hope, and with bowed head and bended knee, BY THE PASTOR'S EMPTY CHAIR, I sought Him whom my soul loveth; I sought Him—and, blessed be His name—He would not let me seek in vain. My gracious Lord drew near, and strengthened and comforted His lonely child, and filled my heart with joy and peace."

ISRAEL IN THE LAST DAYS.

By Frank H. White.

A Time of Building—A Time of Physical Changes—The River from under the Temple—Re-arrangement of Tribes—The Ritual—A Perfect Worship—The Vision from God—Its Practical Use—An Editor's Warning—Where to Look for Comfort.

NEARLY all the apparent difficulties which belong to a literal interpretation of the last chapters of Ezekiel's prophecy are met by the consideration that of the temple he describes is elsewhere referred to as marked by an intervention on the part of God evidently miraculous. For example, great physical changes will then be wrought in the land of Israel. The prophecy of Zechariah contains the plainest predictions of such.

Among the events which we are there told will happen in "the day of the Lord," and usher in the millennium, we read in chapter 14:4, 10, "His feet [Messiah's] shall stand in that day on the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east, and the Mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west, and there shall be a very great valley; and half of the mountain shall remove toward the north, and half of it toward the south" (Zech. 14:4).

Ezekiel sees a river issuing from under the threshold of the Temple, whence it flows eastward to the desert and the Dead Sea. Of no great depth at first, for when the prophet crosses it in the inner court, the water reaches only to the ankles; this mysterious stream, although receiving no tributary from without, increases visibly as it advances in its course. When Ezekiel crosses it a little lower down, the water reaches to his knees, and farther on it rises to his loins; and when he has passed still lower down the river, he can no longer cross it on foot, "for the waters were risen, waters to swim in, a river that could not be passed over" (Ezek. 47:6). As pass through the barren lands to the Dead Sea, they are transformed into a fruitful garden. Fruit-bearing trees spring up on either side of the river. The Dead Sea becomes a sea of life. At present, covering with its waters the guilty cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, it is "saturated with salt and asphalt," so that no vegetable or animal life can live therein. But as Ezekiel saw it, how changed the scene! Like a sea in the blue Mediterranean, fish multiply and fishermen establish themselves on its banks.

Another difficulty relates to the arrangement of the tribes of Israel and the division of their land as described by Ezekiel, which differs in several important particulars from that which we find recorded in the book of Joshua. For example, the allotments are in equal portions, running in parallel sections from east to west. Seven tribes are placed north of the city and five south; while two tribes and a half which used to be east of Jordan are found on the west (Ezek. 48).

To some, the most serious difficulty of any in the way of a literal interpretation of Ezekiel's vision of the City and Temple is the re-institution of

ANIMAL SACRIFICES.

This they regard as "a return to the beggarly elements of the law, by which Christ by His one offering has once and for all set His people free." This, they say, would be "a practical denial of the all-sufficiency of the atonement." It would be so now; but does it follow that it would be so then? Of this we may be certain, that of whatever nature the ritual may be which will be found connected with Israel's Temple and worship in the day of their restoration, it will in no wise conflict with the truth of the sufficiency of the once for all offered Sacrifice at Calvary, where Jesus died for the nation as well as for the children of God scattered abroad (John 11:50-52).

Again: May not these sacrifices be commensurate, as is our observance of the Lord's Supper? Might they not have a retrospective, as those under Moses' law had a prospective, relation to the Cross of Christ? May not the national character of Israel's relation to God necessitate an entirely different testimony from that which the Church of this dispensation is called upon to give, or rather the same testimony, differently borne? What holds good as to ritual in this age, may not in that which is to come. Then, the outward and inward may be so combined as to present no opposing witness. There is nothing sinful in ritual if only it be of divine appointment. In Mosaic times the outward ritual was the more prominent. In these Gospel days it is more the inward truth. In the next dispensation it would appear that both shall be united—a perfect worship. Then there shall be no longer a divorce between the spiritual and the material—outward grandeur and inward beauty will alike characterize the temple worship of Israel in millennial times.

Moreover, can we judge what is best to impress the national character of Israel's standing with God upon the nations who will come up to Jerusalem?

I do not say this in proof of my belief that the sacrificial ritual contained in the vision of Ezekiel will be maintained, but to endeavor to show that such a view is not after all so improbable as at first sight it may appear.

Notice that what Ezekiel sees is described as "VISIONS OF GOD."

"In the visions of God brought He me into the land of Israel." They were visions revealed by God; visions of which God Himself was the author. Divine visions—not the fruit of the prophet's fancy, or the workings of a fevered brain. They belonged to the "divers manners" in which God spake by His prophets. They (the visions) therefore have the full weight of inspiration. Their record is Holy Scripture, and as such written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope. Pertaining particularly to Israel, they are nevertheless intended for our instruction, part of the Spirit's gracious ministry to the Church now. We may not, therefore, neglect their study. They will help to keep our feet in these last days.

That the time of the reign of the Prince of Peace is nearing, makes every day a day of gladness to the believer. Warned by the Scriptures, he is not deceived by the false cries of peace which he hears on all sides. Never was there a darker outlook among the nations in this respect than at the present time. "Never before," says the writer of a leading daily paper dated Christmas Day, December 25th, 1893, "in the history of mankind, have so many adult males been under arms; never before was the machinery of death and destruction brought to such shocking perfection, or directed to more deplorable ends. The thirteen years that have elapsed since the snows of Christmas were crimsoned with the blood of hostile hosts in the west of Europe, have been dedicated to fresh and yet more careful preparation for the conflicts of the future. Armageddon* yet remains to be fought; and the nations glower at each other under their only half-lifted visors. We look in vain to any form of institution to rescue us from the hereditary taint of fratricide that seems perodically to impel nation against nation, community against community, race against race. The progress to which we all render lip-service develops the capacities without quelling the passions of man. Life grows more complex, and, as the issues become less simple, the impatient yearning to solve them ends by setting armies in motion, and the sword is invoked to settle problems that baffle reason and irritate argument.

* Armageddon is but the gathering place of the anti-Christian armies, not the place of battle (Rev. 16:16). The final destruction of these mighty armies will take place in the Valley of Jehoshaphat, 200 miles from Armageddon (See Joel 3:12; Rev. 19:20).

"The more ardent champions of the rights and dignity of man, and who consider that these are wounded by the spectacle of a court, are equally resolved to carry the republican war into the enemy's country when the favorable opportunity arises. They are only waiting.

AT A GIVEN SIGNAL,

the crusade against crowns would be set in motion, and Europe would be deluged in blood, in order that, as the foremost advocate of this benevolent design has explained, Paris might become France, and France might become Europe. Nor are kings alone obnoxious to these self-constituted sponsors of the future. The altar must follow the throne; the cascock must be burned in the same fire that consumes the purple. Where, then, are we to turn for comfort?"

We answer, to the sure word of prophecy, which, while it stimulates us to renewed effort to spend and be spent in ministering to the necessities, spiritual and temporal, of our fellow-men, sheds light upon this dark picture, and fills us with a hope which, in spite of the obscurities that arise from our carnal and unbelieving hearts, is both a bright and blessed one. The vision of millennial glory presented in Ezekiel's temple will, if viewed not as matter for curious speculation, but as food for faith and hope, both sanctify and enlarge our hearts. At the sight thereof we shall "gird up the loins" of our minds, and "hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought to us at the revelation of Jesus Christ" (1 Peter i. 13). For then we shall be with Him and like Him, and reign in life, having as the sphere of our glory the throne of God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and Mount Zion.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Bad Paymaster.—At a Recent Meeting a Christian minister said: "I remember looking at two men in a railway station. I saw that they were iron-moulders, and very miserable they looked as they stood there, and I thought, 'Poor fellows, you must be out of work.' A respectfully dressed man joined them, and I overheard their conversation, and could learn from it that they were all employed in the same work. Addressing the new-comer, I said: 'Do these men all work along with you?' 'Yes,' he said; 'We all get the same.' 'What is the meaning of the great difference in appearances between you and them?' I asked, referring to the dress. 'Why, sir,' he said, 'they don't wear the blue ribbon, and I do; that is the meaning of it. They give their money to the devil, and are working for him and his cause, and now they are reaping their miserable reward.'"

A Mate's Solemn Vow.—"Every Man for himself," cried the captain of a sinking vessel, and each ran to secure a life-buoy. The chief mate and chief engineer were soon plunging into the raging billows. The mate was raised high on the crest of a wave, when he heard a voice calling him by name; it was the engineer saying, 'Oh, if you are saved, tell my wife and children about me, and may God have mercy on my soul.' He sank, and was drowned. The words startled the mate, and he prayed that the Lord would save his soul. The words of a text, which he had learned when a boy, came into his mind—'He that believeth is not condemned'—and he said, 'O Lord, I do believe now; I know that I have eternal life; but oh, let me live a little longer, and I will witness for Thee.' And the Lord did save him; a great wave threw him on to a rock, with an arm and leg broken, and his ribs crushed. He saw a light glimmering in the distance, and managed to crawl to the gate, but no further. When he regained consciousness he was lying in a comfortable bed, and the first thing which entered his mind was the text, 'He that believeth is not condemned.' They told him that he had been lying there for three weeks, although he knew it not. He kept his promise, and has ever since witnessed faithfully for Christ.

A Tight Grip for Life.—The Rev. Mr. Ross relates: "One very dark, stormy night at sea, a man fell overboard. The people on board witnessed the fall, but it was so dark that they could not see in which direction to throw a rope; but they threw one where they thought they saw a dark form in the water. Happily it fell near the swimmer. The drowning man grasped at the rope, not knowing what it was; his grasp was so tight that, when they had got him on board, they found that the rope had sunk so deeply into the flesh of his hands that it was taken away only with the greatest difficulty and pain. Dear friends, take such a hold of Christ that, wherever He leads you, and whatever pain or suffering it may cost you, you do not let Him go. 'Lay hold on eternal life!'"

Memory's Last Earthly Office.—"One Night in Springburn, near Glasgow, a message came to the minister and myself asking us to go and speak to a man who was dying, and the messenger said if we did not go at once it would be of no use. Upon our arrival at the house we found the man's wife wringing her hands and crying bitterly. As we entered we heard her say, 'O John, John! do you not know your own wife?' His only daughter was bending over him, exclaiming, 'O father, father, do you not know me?' A neighbor who was present turned to us and said, 'You are too late; he is past knowing anybody.' I went over to the bedside, and stooping over the nearly unconscious man, whose eyes were glazing in death, I said, 'John, do you know Jesus?' At the name of Jesus he opened wide his eyes, and cheerily replied, 'Yes, yes! I know Him, well.' A little afterward he gently passed away."

A Reformed Convict's Testimony.—Mr. Vans related: "A young man had broken the law of the country, and was put in prison, and when he was released he tried to get employment, and would have got it if he only had a certificate of character. He tried one place after another, but with the same unsuccessful result. At length a Christian gentleman employed him, saying that he would give him a trial without a certificate; and his employer was not disappointed; he turned out well. By and by he gave himself to the Lord, and in a meeting he testified thus: 'I thank the Lord that He has saved me. When I came out of prison I tried to get employment, but no one would take me in without a certificate, until a Christian gentleman gave me a trial; but, friends, as soon as I went to the Lord, He took me in without any references, and not even saying He would give me a trial, but took me altogether. Sinner, who ever you are, or whatever you are, no matter how far down in sin, if you apply, the great Saviour will take you in and forgive and bless you.'"

A Red Indian's Plot Frustrated.—An Earnest and successful evangelist said: "A few years ago I was in the north-west of America among the redskins, and there I met with a missionary, who labored among the Indians. His work did not seem to prosper in his hands, and he grew discouraged. One Sunday he was preaching in the open air, as usual, when all at once a troop of young men came and formed themselves into a semi-circle round him. He was certain that they meant some evil, and he thought that this was his time to preach Christ with all his might. In earnest tones he offered the Saviour to perishing sinners. He repeated the text, 'For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son that whosoever believed in Him should not perish but have everlasting life.' The chief of the troop stepping forward said: 'Stay, pale face! what is that you say? Your God gives something; our gods give nothing, but take all they can get.' The missionary told him how God gave His only Son for him that he might be saved. At a sign from their chief the troop went away, and the chief explained to the missionary that it was he who had brought the young men there for the purpose of putting him to death, as they were tired of his preaching. At a sign from him they were to throw the weapons at the preacher. The chief eventually accepted Christ as his Saviour. From that time the work of grace went on among them, and much good was done."

HOUSES AT ALHAMA, IN SPAIN, WRECKED BY THE EARTHQUAKE.

Our illustration on page 156 will give some idea of the devastation wrought in Southern Spain by the terrible earthquake which occurred on December 25th, last year. The district most severely visited lies in the provinces of Granada and Malaga, and forms a parallelogram measuring about seventy miles from east to west, and about thirty-five from north to south. This unfortunate town of Alhama is about twenty-six miles southwest of Granada, and is situated on a promontory of limestone. It is divided into an Old and a New quarter, the older portion being built on the higher ground on the side of a valley. The earthquake caused the upper town to fall upon the lower, so that both were practically destroyed. Out of seventeen hundred and fifty houses thirteen hundred were wrecked or completely levelled, but the loss of life fortunately seems to have been comparatively slight, as out of ten thousand inhabitants the killed barely amounted to three hundred and fifty.

"No bombardment," writes the Standard correspondent when visiting the town, "could achieve such complete and utter destruction. It was with extreme difficulty that we made our way up a narrow street flanked with tottering ruins, climbing over piles of fallen rubbish, jumping from one mass of broken masonry to another and progressing as best we could in single file. Every step we made revealed fresh scenes of ruin. Several convents as well as the fine churches have been destroyed, and the jagged outlines of the walls still standing were sometimes terrible and sometimes fantastic in their strange variety. Great caution was required in passing these lofty walls, for several times we felt slight tremors beneath our feet, and the silence hanging over the place was broken suddenly by the sound of the fall of blocks of stone and crumbling walls."

But bad as was the condition of the buildings, the pictures of misery afforded by the unfortunate inhabitants was far more melancholy. Some were sitting on the ruins, utterly helpless and speechless. Others were trying to find some remains of their property, while others again implored the authorities and soldiers for assistance. Huts were built in the open, and tents raised as some slight shelter for the sufferers, the square was made into a church, a large omnibus serving for altar, priests robing place, and the Tabernacle of the Host, and the authorities made all possible endeavors to supply the people with bodily necessities. On January 11 King Alfonso visited Alhama, walking through the city and distributing relief. He passed the night at the baths (El Hammam), from which the town takes its name, and which were famous in the old Moorish times.

These rapidly-recurring "earthquakes in divers places," as well as the "wars and rumors of war," with which all are now so familiar, are only "the beginning of sorrows," as predicted by our Lord in Matthew 24. Evil men shall wax worse and worse, and the earth will continue to groan, until the fury of the Great Tribulation shall burst upon mankind with its scenes of persecution, confiscation, bloodshed, and death; "and except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved." "So likewise, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors."

per annum, payable in advance.

Remittances by mail should be by bank checks, Postal orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

Will subscribers oblige us by making their Post-Office Orders payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD? Many of them continue to make them payable to individuals, and thus cause us serious delay and inconvenience.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Prohibition Prospects in Congress were never hopeful; they have now received an explicit and direct check. The House Committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution providing for the appointment of an Alcoholic Liquor Traffic Commission, report adversely, expressing the opinion that "To the several States of the Union properly belongs the right to enact such legislative local police regulations as will throw every proper restriction around the liquor traffic." The Committee add that, in their opinion, the interest of temperance and sobriety would seem to demand wise and stringent restrictions and effective safeguards in connection with the liquor traffic rather than "impracticable efforts at absolute prohibition."

Mr. Cleveland's Opposition to the Silver coinage was forcibly expressed in a letter to the Hon. A. J. Warner and others, which was given to the press on February 27th. Mr. Cleveland admits the importance of the subject, but thinks it unnecessary to wait in forming his judgment for an expression of the sentiment of his party, as his correspondents advised him to do. He believes that "a financial crisis," the result of the act requiring the coinage of two million silver dollars a month, is "now close at hand." He reminds the friends of the unpopular coin that the vaults of the Treasury and sub-treasuries are already filled with it to overflowing while the stock of gold is steadily diminishing. Only by a suspension of the coinage of silver, says Mr. Cleveland, can the danger be averted. The displacement of gold by silver would cause a financial crisis, which, following on so long a period of commercial depression, would involve the people of every city and every State in the Union in a prolonged and disastrous trouble. The revival of business enterprise and prosperity so ardently desired and apparently so near would be hopelessly postponed. Saddest of all, in every workshop, mill, factory, store, and on every railroad and farm, the wages of labor, already depressed, would suffer still future depression by a scaling down of the purchasing power of every so-called dollar paid into the hand of toil. From these impending calamities it is surely a most patriotic and grateful duty of the representatives of the people to deliver them. It may be hoped that this emphatic warning will receive more attention than has been accorded to similar words uttered by less distinguished persons. Few people have realized as yet the importance of the subject.

General Swaim has been Condemned by the court-martial before which he was tried to suspension from office on half pay for twelve years. The President twice returned the finding to the court with a recommendation that it be reconsidered, but finally he confirmed it. The sentence is ridiculed everywhere. If General Swaim is innocent, no sentence at all was necessary; if he is guilty, the sentence is a grossly inadequate punishment for his offence. There was a debate in the Senate on the subject, in which it was stated that General Swaim was being persecuted because he was "Garfield's friend." It is a pity that the late President's name was dragged into the case. The charge against the Judge Advocate General is, that he was guilty of falsehood and dishonesty—a charge too serious to be overlooked, even in a friend of President Garfield. The country regrets that he was unable to convince his judges that he was innocent.

The Grave Nature of General Grant's Illness has again been reported by the daily journals. It is explicitly stated that his trouble is cancer at the root of the tongue. The most skillful surgeons in the country have been consulted, but they agree that the malady is incurable. The position of the cancer prevents an operation being performed with any prospect of saving the life of the distinguished patient. The disease has, it appears, made more rapid progress since the financial troubles which have fallen upon the General have developed, and his fall on the sidewalk a year ago and his subsequent protracted confinement to his bed still further weakened him. It is feared now that his life cannot be prolonged at the utmost beyond a few months. Messages of sympathy from all quarters are pouring in upon him, and the General is evidently much cheered by the kindly feeling manifested toward him.

Riots Occurred in Philadelphia on Thursday and Friday of last week. The employés in the carpet-weaving works of Messrs. Leedom & Sons, at Kensington, have struck, and the attempt of the firm to replace the strikers caused the riot. One man named Cameron, a loom fixer, appeared to be the object of the most violent hostility of the strikers. A large force of police were sent to the mills to protect the man, but a large mob had assembled, which attacked the police, and several officers were knocked down and kicked. The crowd became so menacing that it was found necessary to charge the rioters, and the mob then dispersed, several of the rioters having been seriously injured.

Several of General Gordon's Letters have been published. They show how grossly the public was misled when he was represented as declaring he could hold Khartoum for years. One of the letters was addressed to General Lord Wolseley, dated November 4th, 1884. This says: "I have five steamers and nine guns at Metemneh awaiting your orders. I can hold out forty days longer with ease. After that it will be difficult." In another letter General Gordon said: "How many times have we written asking for re-enforcements and calling your serious attention to the Soudan, and no answer came! Men's hearts become weary of delay. While you are eating and drinking and resting in good beds we and those with us, soldiers and servants, are watching night and day trying to quell the movements of the Mahdi. Of course you take no interest to suppress this rebellion, the serious consequences of which are the reverse of victorious for you. Neglect thereof won't do." In a letter to a friend at Cairo, dated December 14th, General

Gordon wrote: "It is all up with us. I expect a catastrophe within ten days from the present time. It would not have been so if our people had kept me better informed of their intentions. My adieux to all."

The Inaction of the Mahdi has Permitted the little force which fought the two battles of Abu Klea and Gubat to escape to Gakdul, from which place the line of retreat to the main body of the army at Korti is comparatively safe. General Buller's arrival at Gakdul with the troops relieves public anxiety in England, where a repetition of the disaster which befell General Hicks was apprehended. The force is diminished by thirty officers and four hundred and fifty men since it started across the desert from Korti. A letter has been received at Korti from a nun who was taken prisoner when Khartoum fell into the hands of the Arabs, and who is now kept in captivity in El Mahdi's camp at Omdurman, a few miles below Khartoum. She confirms the statement that El Mahdi's troops massacred the soldiers of the garrison and many peaceful citizens, and she states that the number of persons slaughtered was fully two thousand.

The Vote of Censure on Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues for their base desertion of General Gordon was passed in the House of Lords on February 27th by a vote of 189 to 68. In the House of Commons it was defeated by a majority of fourteen. The members who voted for censure numbered 288, those voting to sustain the ministry were 302. Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues voted in their own defence. The Marquis of Salisbury expressed the popular opinion of the ministry by saying, in the course of his speech, that the conduct of Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues had been all along an alternation between periods of slumber and periods of rush. The rush, though, however vehement it was, was invariably too unprepared and too unintelligent to repair the damages done during the periods of slumber. He would not say that the government had been bad, because they had no policy worthy of the name. A rumor was in circulation after the vote that Mr. Gladstone would resign, the majority of fourteen being equivalent to defeat. It was, however, announced on Saturday that he would continue in office until after the bill had been passed re-distributing the representation of the House of Commons.

The Congo Conference at Berlin Concluded its labors last week. Its final sitting was held on February 26th. Prince Bismarck presided. He expressed great satisfaction that an agreement had been reached, and gave a résumé of the various points of the programme. He paid a special tribute to the conciliatory spirit the delegates had displayed, and alluded to the formation of the new Congo State as one of the most valuable aids toward rendering the work of the Conference lasting. The delegates then signed the documents, which were fourteen in number, and the Conference was closed.

The Prince and Princess of Wales are about to pay a visit to Ireland, taking with them their eldest son. The Prince's programme is to reside at first in Dublin, at Dublin Castle. Subsequently he will sojourn for a while in the south of Ireland, during which time he will be the guest of the Earl of Kenmare, at Killarney. The festivals which will be arranged in honor of the Prince, and which he will attend in person while he remains in the Irish capital, will include a royal levee at the Castle, a grand drawing-room reception, and a great ball in St. Patrick's Hall, besides a round of less stately and less formal balls at the Castle. The scheme of the visit is said to have originated with the Queen, who appears to think a sight of royalty may revive the loyalty of the Irish. The Prince's courage in undertaking the tour is worthy of admiration, though it is little likely to accomplish the purpose his mother has in view. It may be hoped that in risking his life at her request he will be preserved from assassination.

Temperance Prospects in California are Described as encouraging. Colonel George Babcock, of that State, in the course of an interview with a reporter of the Voice, said: "You seem to think in the East, that California is not a State where Prohibition is practicable, likely to succeed, or even desirable. You think that the wine industry of the State is making strides that are utterly resistless, has a tendency to monopolize things and thus to array both capital and labor, both the intelligent and the ignorant, against temperance movements. But I assure you that the growth and influence of the wine interest is not so great as the whiskey papers of the East would like to have you believe. It is true it is largely on the increase. But I believe the light now being thrown upon the subject will satisfy the grape-growers that it is far more profitable to raise grapes for raisins, table use and other purposes, than it is for wine." Many facts were cited by the colonel to show the progress made by the temperance cause, one of which is that the railroad companies not only insist that their employes shall be temperate, but forbid them even to enter a saloon.

Rev. E. W. Oakes, who has been Conducting Gospel work at the Annex Hall in Fourth Avenue, New York, has found it necessary to seek a brief period of rest. He sailed for Europe yesterday on the Cunard steamer Aurania, purposing to visit his aged mother in Ireland. During the past four months his labor has been incessant, and great success has attended it. The meetings in the Annex have been crowded, and many remarkable conversions have occurred. An official letter from the Committee in charge of the work, and other letters from private gentlemen who have watched its progress, have been sent to Mr. Oakes, expressing, in unqualified terms, their appreciation of his efforts and their hopes that his journey may be blessed to the restoration of his health. Rev. W. S. Rainsford, of St. George's Church, has kindly consented to take charge of the work at the Annex Hall.

An Agnostic's Evidence was Rejected as unworthy of confidence by the Swaim court, martial on January 9th. De Akers, the former telegraph operator of Banker Bateman, was put upon the witness-stand to prove discreditable business operations on the part of Bateman. Before a question was asked him, the judge advocate interposed an objection to his testimony on the ground of incompetency, because of his want of religious belief. After the witness had been asked the usual questions, and had said that he neither believed nor disbelieved in the existence of a Supreme Being, or the doctrine of future reward or punishment, but was willing to take "any oath prescribed by law, whether it be the one then offered or an oath by Mumbo Jumbo," the court ruled him incompetent to testify, and he was consequently unable to assist his friends.

A Law against the use of Opium both by smoking and hypodermic injection is rapidly becoming a necessity of the first importance. One of the victims of the drug recently said to a reporter: "The opium habit is far more powerful than the whiskey habit. Take myself, for example. Three years ago I was a travelling salesman for a New York house. I had a good trade, and was making money. I went out with a crowd of the boys in Denver, about three years ago, and hit the pipe for the first time. I liked it, and gradually became a confirmed smoker. I lost all energy and ambition. My trade deserted me, because I neglected it. I was discharged, and now I'm little better than a tramp. My whole ambition is to raise enough money to get enough opium to satisfy my appetite for the drug. Do you suppose I don't know just where it will end? I'll either be in the insane asylum on Ward's Island or in the Charity Hospital on Blackwell's Island within two years, and then—Potter's Field! Why don't I break myself of the habit? My friend, I've tried time and again. I'll go without it, or two or three days, and suffer torments. When my sufferings become so intense that I can bear it no longer,

I have to go back to the pipe, and then I'm worse than ever. It's a shame, the way the habit is spreading. I know personally at least two hundred men and women who are confirmed smokers now, who had never touched the pipe when I first got into the habit, and new recruits are coming in every day." This man's statement is true. Few people are aware how the use of opium is extending in New York and all our great cities. None know save those who have witnessed the effort, the misery, the almost hopelessness of emancipation when the chains of the insidious drug once hold a victim.

The Stoppage of a Fan was the Cause of an explosion on February 17th in one of the mines at Wilkesbarre, Penn. The journal of the "fan" which supplies the mine with air became overheated, necessitating a stoppage of the machinery. The mine is a very "gassy" one, and the gas began to accumulate rapidly as soon as the fan stopped. One of the miners entered the gangway with his naked lamp, and a terrific explosion followed. Twelve of the men were seriously, and it is feared fatally, injured, and the workings of the pit for a considerable distance were wrecked. Social catastrophes may be produced in the same way. The French king and court were eager to root out godly men from their land, and they succeeded; but the explosion of 1789 followed, and king and court went to the guillotine. If there had been no St. Bartholomew there would have been no Reign of Terror. Intelligent observers of society in our day see in the persistent efforts to ridicule religion and spread infidelity among the people a similar effort to keep the pure air of heaven out of the world. The effort is suicidal. The church now, as in past times, is "the salt of the earth" (Matt. 5:13).

A Community of Convicts may Eventually be established in Alaska. A prominent journal suggests that the vast Territory of Alaska cannot be put to a better use than to make it an American Siberia, to which each of the States may send prisoners condemned to imprisonment for twenty years or for life. It is argued that expense would be saved, as the convicts would support themselves when they were confronted with the alternative of work or starvation, and that they might be allowed considerable freedom of action, escape being well-nigh impossible. It is believed that the fear of banishment to Alaska would operate more powerfully as a preventive of crime than fear of the penitentiary. The punishment would undoubtedly be very severe. Beside the horrors of the climate it would be a dreadful thing to live in a society composed exclusively of the worst criminals from every State. The most hardened offenders against the law might well dread such a punishment, yet it is but a faint type of the condition of those who die impenitent, as Christ described it. Nevertheless men of education and intelligence, who would be horrified at the prospect of having to live in a criminal colony in Alaska, make no effort to avoid that worse fate reserved for those who die in their sins (Ps. 9:17).

A Miser's Curious Hoard was Exposed to public view in New York on February 23d. On the highest floor of a house in Third Street was the strangest collection of treasures. On a bed in one of the rooms lay the dead body of the late owner. She was an aged, unmarried lady, who came to America forty years ago from Germany. She was perfectly sensible and reasonable in her conversation, and she did nothing to excite suspicion of her sanity. She was reputed to be very wealthy, and was supposed to have in her rooms a large collection of valuable property. She lived for thirty-one years in one set of rooms, and when, nine years ago, she removed to the house where she died, her goods made three truck-loads. An amusing description of this property was published. It was absolute rubbish. An example was the collection of seven umbrellas of varying degrees of fadedness and tatters, but one common degree of uselessness and worthlessness. Then there were heaps upon heaps of clothing, or what was probably classed by its collector as clothing, but which was only rags. Kitchen utensils that had been rescued from the ash cart in all stages of dilapidation were there in great variety, and were hoarded with table ware, from common delf to the finest china, but all nicked or cracked or fragmentary. Everything worthless, yet as eagerly gathered and as carefully kept as if the articles had been gold and jewels. The spectators despised the hoard and the woman who called it her "property." Nevertheless it satisfied her acquisitive disposition while she lived, and a miser's gold does no more for him. When we see, with the clearer vision of the world beyond the grave, the value of the product in the two cases they will not appear very different (Eccles. 5:11).

An Engineer Narrowly Escaped Killing his own son on the Hudson River Railroad on February 24th. Some boys were boasting on the long, steep hill at Croton, N. Y., at the foot of which is the railroad track. Among the boys was one fifteen years old, whose father was the engineer of the south-bound express. As the boy was gliding swiftly down the hill on his sled he saw the lights of the locomotive, and realizing his danger he rolled off the sled just in time to save his life. The sled went on and was demolished under the wheels of the train. When the father learned how near he had been to causing the death of his beloved boy he was so unnerved that he fainted. Both father and son have an opportunity of realizing in some slight degree the meaning of the words of Christ Himself, "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son," etc. (John 3:16).

Three Fears Alarmed a Party of Boys in the woods near Lexington, Va., recently. Four school-fellows, having a day's holiday, proposed to go hunting. They took a dog and strolled out into the woods in the direction of Laurel Run. The dog took a trail and followed it to a hole under a big cliff. The boys, supposing a rabbit or fox had taken refuge there, got some poles and undertook to "hunt" him out, when, to their surprise, out came three large bears. The boys, having no means of capturing such large game and so much of it, ran as quickly as they could to the nearest house, about a mile and a half distant, where the father of one of the boys resided. Happily for them, they all arrived there safely. That does not always happen with hunters who become the hunted. Numbers of young men who go out in our great cities to seek pleasure fall into the clutch of the great enemy of souls, and have neither the disposition nor the power to fly for rescue to their heavenly Father, who alone can deliver them (1 Peter 5:8).

A Bride was held in Pawn at Norwood, Ga., recently. The Atlanta Constitution describes a novel scene which occurred after a wedding in the justice's room a few days before. A couple presented themselves to the judge, who performed the ceremony of marriage between them at their request. They were about to depart when the judge reminded the bridegroom that he had not paid the customary fee. The man said he had not a cent, and did not know where he should have to pay for being married. "The fee is $2.50," said the judge, "and you must go and get it." "I'll keep your wife here till you come back," he added, and handed the blushing lady to a seat. The bridegroom went away and did not return for more than an hour, during which the bride became uneasy, but was politely requested to remain until her husband returned. At length the man came back, paid the fee, and took his pawned bride away. How much she will be worth to him time will prove; but he evidently thought on the wedding-day that she was worth more than $2.50, or he would not have paid that amount to redeem her. That proof of his devotion may in some measure console her for her humiliation. It may be hoped that both bride and bridegroom may seek to become members of the church, the bride of Christ, whom He redeemed at a cost the world cannot realize (1 Peter 1:18, 19).

CERTAIN CURIOUS CALCULATIONS ABOUT LOAVES AND FISHES.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"When I brake the five loaves among five thousand, how many baskets full of fragments took ye up? They say unto him, Twelve. And when the seven among four thousand, how many baskets full of fragments took ye up? And they said, Seven. And he said unto them, How is that ye do not understand?"

—MARK 8: 19-21.

Christ's Serenity—Traacherous Memories—The Use of Looking Back—I. The Daring Project—Feeding Five Thousand in the Desert—The Problem of Problems—The Volcano under Society—The Feeding a Necessity—Christ's Nature Revolted against their Fainting—II. The Baffled Disciples and their Serene Master—Christ's Practical Command—III. Means Used but Christ Conspicuous—IV. Christ's Power Unexhausted—V. The Difference in the Miracles—Most Left when there was Least to Begin upon—The Giving Man Blessed.

The disciples had come on board the vessel, and had forgotten to bring bread with them; good men's memories sometimes fail them. For that reason they were greatly disturbed in mind, and they supposed that Jesus was disquieted also, and that He had shaped His speech so as to give them an indirect rebuke when He mentioned the leaven of the Pharisees. How little they understood His mind, though they had been so long time with Him! His thoughts were not occupied about bread for Himself; neither was there any carking care in His heart about bread for them. His mind was about all secular things; and even as to all spiritual things He was by no means tossed about. Notwithstanding all His trials and His sorrows, I suppose that there never was a serener mind than that of Jesus Christ our Lord.

Is it not well for us at this hour that it is so? We are fluttered and dismayed, but the mind of our great Lord is fearless and undisturbed. "He will not fail nor be discouraged." The child cries because the ship rolls, but his father at the helm smiles at the storm; and what a mercy it is for the child that father can smile, for if the captain were weak where would the vessel be? If the father's heart failed him, where would his boy look for comfort? Calm face of Jesus, we look up to Thee, and we are quieted!

The Master wishing to comfort His servants bade them consider what they already knew, and review what they had already seen. Usually the eyes of the Christian should be directed forward; it is foolish to try to live on past experience; it is a very dangerous, if not a fatal habit, to judge ourselves to be safe because of something that we felt or did twenty years ago. Yet, for all that, to gain practical lessons for times of service, and comfortable lessons for hours of trial.

The Master asks His followers whether they had used their eyes. "Having eyes, see ye not?" They had seen two wonderful miracles, by which thousands of persons had been fed; had they really seen them? Had they really heard the voice of what the Lord had done? "Having ears, hear ye not?" Had they missed the message altogether? Then He adds, "Perceive ye not yet, neither understand?" Do you not know what my action meant when I multiplied the loaves? Do you not see how it reveals my all-sufficiency? May we not also have missed our Lord's meanings full often? May we not have walked through a palace of wonders without observing the gleams of glory, the flashes of light eternal?

The Lord further asks them that tender question, "And do ye not remember?" Brethren, we remember much that we ought to forget, and we forget much that we ought to remember. It ought not so to be. Let us look back upon the whole of our past lives at this hour with a careful, leisurely glance, and see whether there is not enough in our diaries to condemn our doubts and bury our cares, or at least to shut up our anxieties in a cage made of the golden bars of past mercy, and fastened in with jewelled bolts of gratitude.

Not being able to read your own personal diaries, for these are only known to yourselves, I shall endeavor to take you back to the records of the disciples' memories, and we will think of the text as it brings before us the two great miracles of feeding the hungry. May we learn therefrom what the Spirit designs to teach us by them.

I. And the first thing I shall want to bring to your recollection is yet unavoidable. This was the daring project—to feed five thousand persons in the wilderness. Two hundred pennyworth was the calculation of one of the ready-reckoners of the hour. Some men are always very ready at counting the pennies which they have not got. Whenever there is a holy deed to be done, our mathematical-minded unbelievers are prompt with their estimates of cost, and their prudent forecastings of grave deficiencies. We are great at calculations when we are little at believing. Or else it is, "From whence can we satisfy these men with bread here in the wilderness?" "From whence?" as if there could be any "whence" but one. Whence comes everything by which man lives? Comes it not from God? It goes round about in different channels, but it knows only one source. When any of the channels fail, the fountain is still flowing; and he that has faith to go to it directly shall not want.

But it did seem to the disciples a very preposterous idea that with nothing but sand, and stone, and rock round about them, they should make a banquet for five thousand men. Is it not much more preposterous that the Christian Church should have to evangelize such a city as London? It may not seem so to you; but if you lived in the midst of the extreme poverty of the East End, you would think it how to reach the sunken multitudes. We little dream on what a volcano we live. The pent-up misery and the seething sin of London may yet produce a second edition of the French Revolution unless the grace of God shall interpose. The people are famishing bodily, mentally, morally, spiritually; and we must feed them. I marvel not in the presence of these dying millions you cry—"From whence?"

With the Saviour it was an unavoidable necessity. The great Shepherd must feed these hungry sheep. It is not with Him, "Can it be done?" or "Can it not be done?" but it must be done. One of the imperial necessities which sometimes took possession of of Christ had entered into His soul, and "He must needs" do its bidding. Just imagine that they had not been fed—that they had begun to faint and die of hunger all over those hills to which they had followed Jesus, how it would have marred His ministry! Why, surely, the disciples who had said somewhat cavalierly, "Send the multitude away," would have been oppressed with a lifelong sorrow if their wish had been carried out. They never would have forgotten that dreadful dreary day, and the starvation, and the fainting, and the death which followed it. Think of what mischief it would have done to Christ's cause. No; the Christ cannot have it so. He has come to save men's lives; He cannot let them die. He must feed the crowd.

Now, imagine, men and brethren, that we never carry out the commission which Christ has laid upon us to-day, that of teaching the multitude—imagine that henceforth we never labor to win souls—that we give up London as a forlorn case—that we abandon the heathen world as assuredly given over to destruction, like a vessel driven by a hurricane upon an iron-bound coast—imagine it, I say. Can you endure the imagination? I cannot abandon the drifting barque. Let us man the life-boat!

II. Brethren, hoping for the help of God's good Spirit, I would take you, secondly, to another sight:

THE BAFFLED DISCIPLES

and their serene Master. The Master has consulted Philip about supplies, in order that the difficulty of the case, and the insufficiency of mere means, might be seen of all. Philip found that all that was available was a lad's breakfast of five barley cakes and a few small fishes; and he anxiously added, "What are they among so many?" The prudent counsellor had done his best, but it did not come to much. He left this problem unsolved, "What are they among so many?" As for the rest of the disciples, they looked in Jesus' face with astonishment and blank despair, and said, "Whence should we have so much bread in the wilderness as to fill so great a multitude?" But all the time that they were thus full of fidgets and worries, there stood the Master, calm as a sweet summer's evening, not in the least disturbed.

Why was Jesus Christ, our Master, so calm? He knew what He would do. We shall get peace, brethren, when we also know what we shall do. "Oh," say you, "I thought you were going to say when we know what He will do." Oh, no! We probably shall not know that till He does it. It is enough for us to know what we shall do. "But," says one, "that is what we do not know." I answer, that is what we ought to know. We ought to know that we mean to leave everything with our Lord. If we once settled it in our minds that we would trust and not be afraid, what peace we should enjoy! If we will leave God's work with God, and simply trust, we shall drink into the peace of God.

One thing, I think, which made Christ so calm was that He really acted while they only questioned. He said, "How many loaves have ye? Bring them hither to me." He came at once to practical action. He that has something to do has less temptation to doubt than the man who has nothing else to do but to doubt. Heresies in the Christian Church come never from the city missionary, never from the faithful pastor, never from the intense evangelist; but always from gentlemen at ease, who take no actual part in our holy war. Those who criticise religion in reviews, and have nothing else to do except to put their hands to their heads, and press whimsies out of their brows, these are the men that trouble us. Our Lord Jesus Christ gave way to no sort of doubt, for He speedily took the bread and the fish in His hands, and began blessing and breaking them, while prompt upon His own action followed the divine energy which multiplied the little store. If you and I would but serve the Lord in earnest, we might end our calculations as to how much is to be done, and how it is to be done, and where it is to be done, and all that. Get to your work, my brother, and your doubts shall fly like chaff before the wind.

The baffled disciples, and the calm and quiet Master, make up an instructive picture; we shall have profited by it to the full if we also become calmly reliant upon God, and are no more carried away with unbelieving amazement.

III. Thirdly, and briefly, I want to set two more matters before your mind's eye for your comfort. In the miracles whereby we see the multitudes fed we see but Christ conspicuous. You perceive that our Lord says of the loaves, "Bring them to me." The means were used. When He has multiplied these very loaves and fishes, He gives them to the men that are round about him, and of these the multitudes partake. Whatever men in their folly may talk as to neglecting the outward means, and sitting still and doing nothing, because God will do His own work, we hear nothing of the kind from Jesus. Therefore, despise not means, and at the same time do not rest in them.

But observe how the fish, and the loaves, and the men, and all the means were made to sink. After the miracle is over, when they go round to gather up the fragments in their twelve baskets or seven baskets, Peter has a quick eye, but ask him whether he can find one of those original loaves. He may go from basket to basket, and he cannot find one. It is lost in the creation which God has made out of it. So it shall be if God will bless us, my brethren. People will gather about us, and say, "What is there in this man? We perceive no superlative talent. What is there in this woman to make her so useful? We see nothing special about her." Never your mind. Let them pick at any bit of fish which they think they can see in your native talent or vigorous character; but as for yourself, you know that if any of the multitude are fed, the provision came from the Master's hand, when He took your little, and blessed and brake and multiplied it so as to make it suffice for the occasion.

IV. Furthermore, we see in the miracles of feeding, work accomplished of a marvellous kind, but

POWER UNEXHAUSTED.

See those five thousand men, and the women and the children! They are all fed. It is a proverb that there never was a feast yet from which some one did not go away unsatisfied; but there is no rule without an exception. Here are two exceptions to that proverb. "They did all eat, and were filled," upon two occasions. It did not matter how many thousands there were, not one of them was overlooked by the ever-blessed Host. It did not matter how hungry they were, they all ate till they were full.

But this is the point I want to show you: the power that multiplied the bread and fish, and fed the thousands, had not come to an end. Their power to eat was exhausted, but not Christ's power to feed; for when they had received to their utmost capacity, great baskets were brought, and these were filled; in the one case twelve, and in the other seven of them. I cannot understand from the Greek what the size of these baskets may have been; the second set, the seven, have a name which shows that they were tolerably large, for Paul was let down in such a basket from the window when he escaped from his enemies in Damascus. The first sort which were used when there were twelve of them appear to me to have been larger still. They give you an idea of a coffin, or a coffin. They were large baskets of which it is said that men could sleep in them. Yet whatever their size may have been, were filled—twelve and seven; and if the Lord had willed so to do, He could have filled twelve thousand baskets, or seventy thousand baskets. Some seem to fancy that the Lord does everything by the inch and the ounce, keeping to stint and quantity; but this is rather the manner of men than the fashion of the Lord. We know that the Lord Jesus Christ redeemed His elect from among men; hence, some will have it that the merit of His atonement must be limited. No such thing. "He gave Himself for us," and there can be no measure to the value of such a gift.

"He died for our sins," and not for our sins only, but for the sins of the whole world. His object was definite, but He achieved it by an agency which cannot be limited. He not only did that which he mainly aimed at, but He did more; just as in this case He not only fed the thousands, but filled baskets with the fragments.

Moreover, brothers and sisters, whatever the Lord has given to you, He has still far more to bestow upon you. Whatever you may feast upon in this public service, there is yet a portion for you to take home with you in the basket, and lay up in the store. However God may have blessed you in your work for Him in the past, He is yet able to do exceeding abundantly above all that you ask or even think. However much the Church may have been increased by a true revival, God has never yet done according to the fulness of His ability in the Church as yet; even Pentecost was but the first-fruits. I hear a voice from heaven, saying, "Thou shalt see greater things than these." Let us not limit the Holy One, nor bound the Infinite. In our Father's house there is bread enough and to spare, even after millions have been satisfied from His supplies.

V. I am going to finish by observing that the DETAILS OF THESE MIRACLES were different, but they were equally instructive. Concerning our Lord's great free dinners, remark, first, that the remainder after the feast was greater than the stock when the banquet began. They began with five loaves and two fishes, they began on another occasion with seven loaves and a few fishes; but they left off with twelve baskets full in the one case, and with seven baskets full in the other. Never was this done at any of your tables, I am sure, when your children have gathered for their meals. They did all eat and were filled, and yet there was more left than when they began. This seems impossible, and yet it is the rule in the kingdom of grace. I have often found when I have come with a very small stock to feed you, brethren, that I have gone away with more than I came with. You have been refreshed, and I have been more full than when I handed out your portions to you. If this be fact, what a wide field it opens to our hope; and how it banishes our fear! It shuts the door of the counting-house where we calculate according to human reason, and it opens the doors of the treasury whence we may draw ever-growing supplies. Go, brother, and scatter your handful of seed, for you shall come again rejoicing, bringing sheaves with you!

Next learn that care is always taken by Christ of all the broken pieces. The Lord All-sufficient is yet the God of economy. Since Jesus could create as much food as ever He pleased, you might have thought that it was hardly worth His while to gather up the fragments; and yet He did so. Waste is of Satan, not of God. God is not lavish of creation, nor prodigal of miracles. Though the Lord can raise up in this place, if He pleases, fifty ministers in an instant, He may not do so; but what He would have us do is to make use of such powers as we have. If we are only fragments our place is not the ground, but the basket. We shall be of some use one of these days, if we are willing to be used. If you, my friend, are not a whole loaf, you are a crust, and no crust may be wasted. If you are not a slice of bread you are a crumb, and even crumbs are dear to hungry men. If you are not a big fish, yet you may be a little fish, and you must not waste yourself, nor must the Church of God allow you to be wasted, but use must be found for you somewhere. But what a wonderful thing this is—

OMNIPOTENCE PICKING UP CRUMBS!

Surely it ill becomes us to waste a penny, an hour, or an opportunity. Let us be severely economical for the Lord our God.

Notice a rather curious thing: there was most left when there was least to begin with. When they commenced the dinner with seven loaves they gathered up seven baskets full, but when they had only five loaves they filled twelve baskets with the fragments. I suppose the baskets to have been of the same size, for I do not discover that the second set of baskets were any larger than the first. However, from a stock of seven loaves, after all expenditure, there came seven baskets as a remainder; but when there were only five loaves, and a greater expenditure, there were twelve baskets full left for the waters. This is singular. The more they begin with, the less they end with; and the less they begin with, the more they have when the feast is concluded. Yet I have often noticed that this does occur. Have not you? When you and I have begun rather grandly, and God has blessed us, we have had great reason to thank Him; but when we have begun very feebly, He has frequently blessed us far more, and we have ended by praising Him upon the high-sounding cymbals.

Note again that there was less visible means when there was more done. There were only five loaves, but they fed five thousand; when there were seven loaves they fed only four thousand. The most was done when there was the least to do it with. And so it shall happen to you, oh worker for Jesus; for the more God blesses you, the less you shall see of any adequate reason in yourself why you should be blest. With your five loaves you shall feed your five thousand, while somebody who had seven shall do less than you.

You that have little ability should work hard with that little ability that you may increase it; and you that have great ability of course should do so, because you have so many talents intrusted to you. The Lord will allow no service to remain uncompensated; and work done for the poor and needy shall win its wage, not of debt, but of grace. Satan said, "Doth Job serve God for naught?" Suppose he had done so; the devil would have gone his way, and said that God was a hard master, whose service brought no sort of reward with it. Either way, Satan would have made mischief, and as we have no wish to please him, we admit that we do not serve God for naught, but that in keeping His commandments there is great reward. When the multitude have done feasting, your Master will let you sit down to meat, and you shall have abundant joy with Him.

The chief point for all of us is to get at the blessed work. In the name of the ever-living God, let us feed each one his man that is nearest to him till the whole company shall be fed; for the Christ is behind us, the Son of God is working with us; and the bread is not our bread but His bread; and the feeding of the multitude is not our work, but His; and the power is not ours, but all His own, and to His name shall be all the glory. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

THE ELEMENTS OF MORAL SCIENCE.

by Noah Porter, D.D., LL.D. The learned President of Yale College has rendered a service to Christianity, by the production of this work, which those can best appreciate who have mixed with the young men of the day, who, in their admiration for Herbert Spencer, Huxley, and other eminent unbelievers, are boldly proclaiming their contempt for Christianity. Dr. Porter meets such men on their own ground. Believing firmly in the supernatural origin of Christianity, he omits from his argument the claims based upon that doctrine, and shows that from the merely human side, and viewed simply as a code of ethics, the New Testament is infinitely superior to any school of philosophy the world has ever seen. Dr. Porter contends that, taking "the Christian system as we find it and comparing it with the other theories which preceded and followed it, simply in respect to its theoretic merits as tried by the ordinary tests of any speculative theory of practical duties . . . we cannot but acknowledge its superior insight into the nature of man and the unmeasured superiority of its speculative profoundness and its practical adaptations to the various and changing wants and circumstances of humanity." Had such a system appeared by itself, and did "it would not make no claims for himself . . . it would not be easy to hold ourselves back from the conclusions which its striking and manifold excellences force upon us, that both are from God." The work is divided into two parts. The one deals with the theory and the other the practice of duty. The latter part contains many pregnant thoughts on burning questions of the day. The work is an excellent one to place in the hands of an intelligent and well-educated young man whom the sceptical philosophers are seduclabor and the procession of families on the road to meeting, but Sunday morning in the most degraded quarter of a great city. The meat markets were open, and the grocers were busy. Slatternly women stood waiting their turn to spend the poor remnant of the week's wages which their husbands had brought home the night before. Those husbands were at home now, sleeping off the effects of the vile rum sold in the saloons of the neighborhood. Church bells could be heard above the noise of the streets, but the sound was meaningless to people who "never troubled the church" with their presence. The faces of every one who went in or came out of those poor stores bore marks of misery, degradation, and some of them of ill-usage. It was a depressing sight for a Christian man. Bibles innumerable in the city, yet in this quarter probably not one to be found. Preachers of the Gospel by the hundred, yet of these poor creatures not one in ten had heard the name of God except in profane sentences. Yet every one carrying a burden of sorrow and misery. Every life dull and desolate, illumined now and again only by some orgie which left the hours succeeding it still more wretched than those that went before. A piteous dumb cry for Gospel light seemed to go up from those streets, yet such a barricade against its entrance. What a change in the moral atmosphere would that Gospel work could it enter! What a revolution in every home! How the forms which now bear no sign of having been made in the image of God would change were the heart within once filled with Christ's presence!

A young Christian clerk, his heart heavy with such thoughts, passed through those streets. His way from the bank in which he was employed to his boarding-house lay through that miserable quarter, and during the past six months of his residence in the city he had walked through it morning and evening. He made inquiry, and learned that in all that precinct there was not a single church. There was a police station, cells which were full every night, a theatre, two variety theatres, nearly a hundred saloons, plenty of pawn shops, but no church. The inhabitants seemed given up to the devil, and all of whom he inquired regarded any attempt at Christian work in that quarter a hopeless undertaking. Young Keene, however, had been brought up in a home where religion was something more than a theory. His father and mother believed in the power of God, and had taught him to think of it as a living force. He resolved to try what he could do alone, God helping him.

The previous evening he spent alone in his chamber in solemn prayer to God for help and guidance, and on Sunday morning, armed with a pocketful of tracts and some twenty copies of the Gospel of John, he entered the reeking, pestiferous, foul-smelling neighborhood. He gave away his tracts to those he met, and they were taken respectfully but silently, the recipients passing on with pre-occupied faces, giving him no opportunity for speech. Presently he turned a corner where a shoeblack was at work on the boots of a man whose face was that of a genuine tough. Coarse, brutal, unshaven, with bleary eyes, in which the only light was one of fierce cunning, he looked a type of the locality. A vicious little terrier was under his arm, and a short dirty pipe was held between his teeth. He had evidently found a side-door ajar, for the voice with which he cursed the shoeblack was thick and heavy with the effects of liquor. Keene handed him a tract.

"What's this, boss?" was the responsive question. "Not another election?"

"No. I'm no politician. I'm not on the make," Keene said, smiling. "You all seem very wretched here. I want to tell you how to be happy."

"Oh, well, that's kind, anyhow! I thought you were going to run for sheriff or coroner or something. Well, boss, you tell us how to get more money, and we'll be happy enough."

"Do you think so? There seems to be no scarcity of money. I noticed plenty of people going in the saloon yonder, and that's a ready-money concern, is it not?"

"Oh yes, they don't trust! We save money for that somehow, but not near enough. I wish I'd five dollars to spend there now; I'd spend it."

"I thought so," Keene answered. "That makes me sure that more money wouldn't make you any happier. You'd get drunk, and be miserable enough next day. No, it is not money you need."

"Well, what is it, then? Give us your notion."

"The happiest people I know are the religious folks. My opinion is, religion would be the thing to make you happy."

"Religion is for decent folks with plenty of money and a fine brown-stonehouse on the avenue."

"That's a mistake, religion is provided specially for the poor, though the rich can have it, too; but it is harder for them."

"Is that so? Well, I'm glad something's hard for them. They generally have a soft thing. Well, boss, I'll read your tract, leastways have it read; my little girl's quicker at reading than I am. You should see her, boss; the prettiest hair and eyes you ever saw in your life."

"I should like to see her, and I'll come with you now, if you'll let me."

"Come on, then," throwing his nickel to the shoeblack; "it's a poor place, but the best we can get."

Keene went with the man, talking as they went about the poverty and misery around, and winning his companion's heart by his sympathy and his evident desire to do something to make things better. He found a woman and a really bright, interesting child in the room to which he was conducted. The child went to the public school, and could read well. He spent nearly an hour talking with the family, always presenting religion not as a duty, but as a good thing to have, and telling them of Jesus, who was poor Himself, and whose friends were all poor people. He was asked to come again, and before many months had passed he had a regular meeting every Sunday in an empty room, where he had the happiness of seeing a work of grace begun which is slowly but surely permeating the whole precinct.

THE JEWS' WARD.

Seeking Light.

THE girl was faint and weary when she took up the Testament again, after an hour or two of mourning had passed by. She wanted to know what His mother and His disciples did when their Jesus was dead, and laid in a tomb, with a great stone rolled over it. They had seen Him crowned with thorns, and crucified with wicked thieves, and heard the chief priests mocking Him; ah! that was a thousand times worse than dying quietly at home, on His own bed. She turned languidly to the next chapter, and read how Mary Magdalene and the other Mary came to see the sepulchre, just as she would go some day soon to visit the grave where her poor old grandmother lay buried. Then with a beating heart Carola seemed to feel the earthquake, and see the angel of the Lord coming down from heaven, and rolling back the stone from the door of the tomb; and she knew, before reading further, that Jesus, the Son of God, lay no longer in that stony sepulchre.

Carola felt glad, as if she had known them and lost Him. She understood the great joy of the women who had gone to the sepulchre, without their fear. Like all unlearned people, she thought in pictures, not in words. Her imagination was not dulled by familiarity with what she read. Jesus Christ, the Son of God, was a man dwelling in a London house, walking about London streets, sitting in a boat on the Thames, and standing amid a crowd of the London poor and sick. When at last she lay down to rest a confusion of strange fancies passed through her wakeful brain; and as she fell asleep a face came to her in her dreams such as she had never looked upon before, full of majesty and tenderness, with eyes that seemed to pierce to her very heart—eyes clearer than the morning star, which she had sometimes looked at wonderingly. A crown of thorns was about the head, but the face was smiling upon her, and all about it was a light—far brighter it shone to her in her dream than the light of the noon-day sun. And she said to herself, "It is the Lord."

For three or four days Carola did not leave the garret; the wonderful book held her captive. Matthias, with mingled anxiety and relief, saw her staying in-doors at last; in fact, staying only too closely in-doors. He bought dainty morsels from the street stalls for her, such as he thought the girl would like, and brought them to the foot of the ladder for her to come down and fetch them. She did not appear to be crying much, but she was very quiet. In truth, Carola was living in a new world, among quite new friends, and she hardly thought of Matthias, except unconsciously to make the old Jew a type of these men she was reading about. Very soon she found that the wondrous history which she had read first in the Gospel according to St. Matthew was told again three times, in a different way and with fresh circumstances in each story. She read them through eagerly, and went on through the Acts of the Apostles; but the Epistles baffled her. They were all words here, and no pictures. So she returned to the Gospels, and read them again, and yet again. St. Mark's, with its swift and vivid life, and slight realistic touch, pleased her most. It did not seem as if she could ever grow weary of reading the Gospel.

But by and by it dawned upon her how much there was she did not understand; and as soon as this ignorance made itself felt, it filled her with anxiety and an overwhelming desire to know all she could about her Lord. For He was her Lord. He had not lived and died for the Jews alone, but for everybody who believed on Him. Though He was a Jew, He had come into the world to save the world.

"You ought to go to your parish priest," the chaplain at the cemetery had said to her; he who had given her the book. This she would do at once; and in eager haste she dressed herself in the handsome mourning she had not worn since the day of the funeral. She descended the ladder into the room where Matthias was ceremoniously washing his hands up to the elbow, before sitting down to the frugal supper. Her face was pale, but her dark eyes shone with suppressed excitement.

"I'm goin' out to find my parish priest," she said earnestly; "do you know where he lives, Matthias?"

"Priest! priest!" repeated the old man in a bewildered tone; "there are no priests now, there are no sacrifices. We call them Rabbi now."

"Yes, I know," she said, nodding her head emphatically. "Rabbi! Rabbi! Mary called Him Rabbi when she met Him in the garden, and thought it was the gardener. Oh! if I'd only been there with Mary Magdalene! But of course I cannot find Him, because He was taken up to heaven, and a cloud hid Him out of their sight. I want to learn all about it, Matthias; I want to be a scholar. There's such a many things I want to know; and I can't live up there any longer, knowin' nothin'. And the gentleman that buried my poor grandmother, and wore a long white gown, told me I ought to go to my parish priest. It's him I want to find."

"I'm sure I don't know where you'll find him," said Matthias.

He looked fondly from under his shaggy eyebrows at Carola's eager and pretty face, but he did not comprehend much of what she said. Mary Magdalene was a totally new name to him, and a parish priest he had never heard of. If she had asked him where she could find a clergyman his fears would have been aroused; and if she had pronounced the name of Christ it would have been a sword piercing through his very soul. But Carola, in her new-born love and reverence, could not call her Saviour by name in the hearing of Matthias as yet.

Matthias had but vague knowledge of the origin of Christianity. His Jewish teacher had told him that there had once lived an accursed impostor, who called himself the Son of David, and claimed to be the Messiah, and who was said to be their God by the wretched thieves, and drunkards, and blasphemers among whom he had his dwelling. These people, who made night and day hideous with their crime and misery, were the only Christians he was acquainted with. He was kindly in his feelings toward them, and patient in his manner, pitying them as some gentle and passive civilized Christian might pity and tolerate the degraded masses of some heathen population among whom he was compelled to dwell to gain his livelihood.

The one object of his life had been to keep Carola free from the false religion of these vile and miserable Christians. The idea had very early suggested itself to him, while she was mere infant, that if he could get her to keep the ten commandments, and never join in Christian worship, the God of his fathers might accept the service as being all that could be expected from the child of Christian parents, and would grant to her such favor in the world to come as the Jewish women might be reckoned worthy to receive. What that was he did not know, but he would do what he could to secure it for Carola. He could not make her a true Jewess, that was impossible; but he would guard her from becoming a Christian; and he might perhaps, if the Rabbi would teach her and receive her into the Jewish communion, find a Jewish husband for her. Carola's children should be sons of Abraham. The unbroken seclusion and isolation in which the old grandmother lived had aided him. No Christian teacher or minister had come into contact with the girl, until the day she had gone alone to lay her only relative in a Christian grave.

Carola did not tarry for any longer conversation with the old Jew, but passed swiftly on down the spiral staircase, and out through the shod-door. It was like leaving some quiet and peaceful sanctuary—for the lonely garret had been full of holy companionship to her these days past—and plunging into a wide world of debased and wretched life. The summer evening was close and thunderous, and the narrow streets were crowded with people driven out of doors by the heat. The heavy atmosphere was laden with foul, sickening smells, in spite of the nearness of the river, or partly, it may be, in consequence of it. Children were crying, women quarrelling, and men swearing. Carola felt a strange sense of repugnance, almost amounting to terror, as she passed through the familiar scene. It was as if she had been away into the kingdom of heaven, and had been thrust back to hell.

There were numbers of people anxious to speak to her, for she had been missing ever since the day of the funeral. There were young men, too, who had been watching for her to appear again, to exchange with her more of their low, rough jokes and their half-savage attentions. But what change had come over Carola? Her pretty face was pale and grave, and her feet went swiftly on their way, as if she was deaf and blind to her old acquaintances. Was this the romping, hoydenish hussy, whose tongue had been so sharp, and whose spirit had been so bold among them as long as they could recollect? If George Bassett was here, he would not let himself be kept at arms' length as they were.

Carola sped on as if she was passing through fire. She looked neither to the right hand nor to the left, for there was no one here who could help her to find the parish priest, or would if they could. But presently she came upon streets where she was not known. An elderly policeman was sauntering along on his beat, and she ventured to ask him.

"Parish priest?" he repeated; "perhaps it's the rector of St. Chad's you mean. You go down yonder street, round the corner, till you come to a big church. The house lies just behind it, in a corner of the old churchyard."

It was with a trembling hand that Carola lifted the great knocker on the rectory door, and let it fall with a single yet loud rap that made her heart leap. It was answered instantly, and she entered a large square hall, with benches set on two sides of it, on which some women were seated, waiting for their turn to see the busy rector. She watched them go into an inner room, and come out one after another, until she herself was called in.

The rector was an elderly man, with a worn and overworked look, but his eyes met Carola's gaze with an expression of very benevolent interest, which deepened somewhat as he saw how young and eager was the face of this new-comer. She had lost her tremulousness in her earnestness, and she did not wait for him to speak to her first.

"Are you my parish priest," she asked, "as I ought to come to?"

"What parish are you in?" he inquired, with a kindly smile, full of encouragement to the eager girl.

"Oh!" she cried, with clasped hands, "I don't know nothin' about parishes; and I don't hardly know nothin' about a priest. There were wicked priests as had my Lord crucified; but you couldn't ha' been one of them, I'm sure. P'raps you knew some of them though, and I want to know all about it. I want to go to a good school and learn everythin'. S'pose you aren't my parish priest, you could tell me to a good school."

"Where do you live, my girl?" he asked. "There's sure to be a school near your home."

"Oh! I must get away, right away," she said, almost sobbing with eagerness. "I couldn't live there any longer now I know what my Lord was like. He wouldn't like me to stay there. I want to learn about Him, and the disciples, and Mary Magdalene, and all the men and women as went about with Him. There's such a many things I can't understand, and nobody to tell me. And I wish to do everythin' exactly as He wants me, so as to be ready when He comes back again. Oh! I shouldn't like to miss doin' anythin' He wanted done."

Little by little Carola, standing before him, with her grave young face growing brighter as the rector listened so attentively, told her story to him, and showed him the wonderful book, which had held her captive ever since her grandmother's funeral. The Testament was so old a book to him that he merely glanced at it in her outstretched hand; and with almost a shock of disappointment she put it back into her pocket.

The aged clergyman, in spite of his Christian experience and his knowledge of divine truth, was astonished at this girl's strange feeling. He had been accustomed to see the story of Jesus fall like an idle tale on unheeding ears and take no effect. But this girl was transformed by it. Without teaching, without guidance she had realized its majesty and truth. This was the work of the Holy Spirit without a doubt; it was a miracle such as the good clergyman in all his half century of experience had never witnessed before.

"Do you mean that you never heard of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ before this?" he asked.

"Never!" she replied. "Nor of God Almighty?" he continued.

"Oh, yes!" she said; "but He is the Lord God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob; and this is my Lord. I've kept all the ten commandments ever since I can remember; but I was as mis'able as the rest of them, almost; and that made me take to drinkin'. But now I can't live any longer among folks as drink, and swear, and steal. I want to get away as far as ever I can, and live with folks like John, and Peter, and Mary, and Martha, and all of them. I don't mind what place it is, so, that the folks are like them in my book."

"That would be a place hard to find," said the rector to himself.

At length he sent Carola away with a promise that he would come himself the next day, and speak to Matthias Levi of her desire to go away somewhere into the country.

It was quite dark when she reached home again, and the streets were a little clearer. But she rushed into the little shop, where Matthias was watching for her on the door-sill, as if it had been a city of refuge; so fearful was she of being caught and held by one or other of her former comrades. The face on which the light of his lamp shone was radiant with hope, and a gentle smile of inward delight lit up the swarthy features of the old Jew, as he followed her up the narrow spiral staircase into his living-room.

"I've found him," she cried, standing with her foot on the lowest rung of the ladder, and panting before she went up into her garret. "I've found my parish priest, and he's a good man, and he'll come and see you to-morrow. He's goin' to find a place in the country for me, where I can learn everythin', and where the folks are good, and don't drink or swear, or do anythin' bad."

"That 'ud be a good thing, Carol," said Matthias.

But his heart felt very heavy as he brooded over the news when Carola was gone. To lose her would be like losing sunshine and eyesight both. It was all the joy he had in life to see her coming and going through his rooms, and to listen eagerly to every word she spoke whenever she chose to stay with him a few minutes. But he had of late been very chary of making any claim upon her time or affection, lest she should grow to hate the wrinkled old man, who tried to exercise any authority over her. The girls of her class would not brook any restraint, and he had left her as free as the air; but he was bound to her. Every word she spoke to him, and every sign of love or trust she showed, was a priceless treasure to him.

He awaited with deep anxiety the arrival of Carola's parish priest. The title had conveyed but little meaning to him; but as soon as he saw the rector of St. Chad's he knew at once that he was one of the ministers of the despised Christian race among whom he dwelt. He felt toward him as much repugnance, mingled with dread, as some mild Christian trader might feel toward a heathen magician, who wished to take from him one of his dearest possessions.

PAUL BEFORE AGRIPPA.

S. S. Lesson for March 15, Acts 26: 1-18. Golden Text, Matt. 10: 18. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Blessing in Prison—An Education—Agrippa Interested—Desires to Hear Paul—Paul's Address—A Happy Prisoner—His Appeal to Contemporaries—His Experience Narrated—A Prisoner's Freedom—His Appeal to Agrippa—A Sacrifice too great for the King.

GOD'S ways are wonderful. The two years of Paul's detention at Casarea were not lost time. To outward appearance it might seem as though Satan had all his own way. The most successful missionary living, one who had turned the world upside down, was kept comparatively useless and idle. In reality

GOD WAS TEACHING

His honored servant to trust Him as never before, and to pray "in the Holy Ghost" (Jude 20), believing that he received. It was as a prisoner, not as an active worker, that Paul prayed such prayers for the churches as none but Christ had ever prayed before, and he received answers, too, for the Word of God was spread abroad. And God was working to provide Paul with an audience which under no other circumstances he could have commanded.

Festus, although he left Paul bound, in order that he might curry favor with the Jews, would not go the length of putting him into their power. He summoned them to appear against Paul for the second time, but, although they brought "many and grievous complaints against Paul," they could produce no proof of them, and thus he remained, as before, uncondemned; and, led by the Holy Ghost, he appealed unto Cæsar.

Still

FESTUS WAS IN A DIFFICULTY.

He said to Paul: "Unto Cæsar shall thou go;" but he had no real, authenticated charge to bring against him, and, therefore, when King Agrippa and his sister Bernice came to Casarea, he took the opportunity to speak of Paul's case, and so interested Agrippa that he desired to hear Paul himself. The hearing came on; Festus, in the presence of King Agrippa and Bernice, who were present in great pomp, and of the chief captains and the principal men of the city, made a speech in which he assigned as his reason for this third trial of Paul at Casarea, that after examination made of Paul by Agrippa, he might have something to write to Cæsar. "For it seemeth to me unreasonable to send a prisoner, and not withal to signify the crimes laid against him." To Paul every court of justice was just a congregation of needy immortal souls, to whom he had a message from God. The issue of the trial before men, as far as he himself was concerned, could be of no moment to him. The God of the mighty universe was with him, who had power to reverse in one moment any decree of man. The man of God saw both living lives notoriously unholy; he had before him the great ones, but the miserable ones of the earth. He could see God in everything, and as soon as his turn came to speak, he began: "I think myself happy, King Agrippa." It is not often that a prisoner can so speak; but Paul was "the prisoner of the Lord" (Eph. 4: 1), and happy in being so. He saw the glorious chance which God gave him to bear His name before kings, and Paul was quite in his element. There was no desire to curry favor with great men by any policy on his part; he wanted God to use him as an instrument to speak in God's stead, as an ambassador for Christ. But all the time Paul acted in the most natural manner under the circumstances. We have no reason to suppose that any time was given him to prepare for his trial. He certainly had no counsel on his side save Him who is "wonderful in counsel," and he just yielded himself up to the Holy Ghost, who made his clear, open defence, to be a powerful appeal to his hearers. Just what his enemies could not do Paul did—he produced witnesses who could prove the truth of his statements, his witnesses were

"ALL THE JEWS."

The apostle was such a marked man that his early life was known as a household word among the Jews. "And now," he said, "I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers; unto which promise our twelve tribes instantly serving God day and night, hope to come." Yes, they hoped for what Paul possessed, they put in the future what Paul accepted in the present; here was the real point of difference between them. And then, forgetting all but "Jesus and the resurrection," his one life's theme, he cried: "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?" And then he went on to speak as he had already done on the castle stairs at Jerusalem, and probably hundreds of times in the synagogues, of his unspeakable experience.

Addressing himself to the king, who was "expert in all customs and questions which are among the Jews," he said: "I verily thought with myself that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth, which thing also I did." And then came the sad story of his days of persecuting the saints: "And I punished them oft in every synagogue, and compelled them to blaspheme; and being exceedingly mad against them, I persecuted them even unto strange cities." Neither Agrippa nor Festus would have any difficulty in finding living witnesses of the truth of these statements of their prisoner. But Paul went on to tell of how the Lord Jesus met him in the way, and of what passed between him and his Lord. Festus and Agrippa were fully accustomed to hear of controversies between man and man, but it was a new thing to hear of such between man and God. If Paul were speaking truth, then he was really a man sent of God, and the Jews were fighting against God.

Paul had not hesitated to repeat how the Lord had said: "I will appear unto thee; delivering thee from the people and from the Gentiles, unto whom I now send thee, to open their eyes and to turn them from darkness to light and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins and inheritance among all those who are sanctified by faith that is in me." Delivering thee from the people and from the Gentiles! The very fact that he stood a living man before them was evidence enough of how faithfully God had kept His word, and, if this was so, then part of Paul's mission was to open the eyes of the very men who sat in judgment on him at that moment. He had a divine commission to turn Festus, Agrippa and Bernice from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God.

WHAT AN ANOMALY!

Here stood the prisoner of man preaching the freedom of God to the very men who held him captive; he in reality the freest man in that court of justice, uncondemned by man, justified by God, he stood in a position of infinite superiority to his judges.

"Whereupon, O King Agrippa," he continued, "I was unto the heavenly vision; but showed first unto them at Damascus, and at Jerusalem, and throughout all the coasts of Judea, and then to the Gentiles, that they should repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance. For these causes the Jews caught me in the temple, and went about to kill me. Having therefore obtained help of God (he does not mention God's instrument, Claudius Lysias) I continue unto this day witnessing both to small and great . . . that Christ should suffer and that He should be the first that should rise from the dead." . . . The apostle did not attempt to conceal the fact that he continued to testify to Christ in his imprisonment whenever he had opportunity; how could he when he had God's authority for what he was doing?

How about his judges? Facts had been clearly stated; the change he spoke of either had or had not taken place in him. Was he under a delusion? The steady, firm, unwavering continuance in the vocation to which he believed himself called did not look like it. Yet Festus, the man of the world, could not but see that if Paul were not acting as a madman, he was; and he preferred rather to count Paul mad than himself. "Paul," he said, "thou art beside thyself, much learning doth make thee mad. But he said, I am not mad, most noble Festus; but speak forth the words of truth and soberness. For the king knoweth of these things, before whom also I speak freely; for I am persuaded that none of these things are hidden from him; for this thing was not done in a corner." Then turning right on the king, he put a question to him just as one would put to an anxious soul, "King Agrippa, believest thou the prophets? I know that thou believest." Paul had just testified that he taught none other things than "the prophets and Moses did say should come." If Agrippa believed the prophets, how could he not believe Christ? But this involved so much he must repent or change his mind, turn to God, and leave off sin. By this his popularity would be lost; he must leave his great pomp and be a despised, persecuted follower of Jesus, but with sin forgiven, the power of Satan broken, his soul saved, an eternity of joy before him. The balance trembled; it turned slowly but surely on the wrong side. "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." The die was cast; salvation slipped from him; he retained his position, his pomp and his sins, and lost Jesus.

The Late COL. FRED. G. BURNABY—A Convoy of Wounded Soldiers in the Desert.

THE LATE COLONEL F. BURNABY, Killed in the Soudan on January 17.

AMONG the names of the British officers and men killed in the battle at Abu-Klea on the 17th of January, is that of Frederick Gustavus Burnaby, colonel of the Royal Horse Guards, one of the most distinguished and popular officers in the British army. His fascinating books describing his adventures have been widely read on both sides the Atlantic.

He was in the prime of life, having been born on March 3d, 1842, and was thus in his forty-third year. His father was the late Rev. G. Burnaby, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Young Burnaby received at home his early training, of which athletics formed no insignificant part. Of sports requiring strength, courage, and manly vigor he was passionately fond, and in some he excelled. His craving was for

A CAREER OF STIRRING ADVENTURE, and he chafed under the quiet home life of his native town. Thus, after the usual school course at Harrow, and a "top-dressing," as he called it, in Germany, he entered the Royal Horse Guards on September 30th, 1859.

Returning home from a long visit to European capitals, his impetuous nature could not endure a life of indolence, and he resolved, in 1875, to set out on his MEMORABLE RIDE TO KHIVA, a place at that time exciting much public interest, on account of the mysterious operations of the Russians, upon which Colonel Burnaby resolved, if possible, to throw some light. Extraordinary obstacles had to be surmounted before this adventurous undertaking could be accomplished, and Burnaby was of all men the most able to overcome them. Chief among the obstacles was the opposition of the Queen's cousin, the Duke of Cambridge, who objected to his journey. Burnaby heard incidentally that the silly old man, who is the nominal commander-in-chief of the British army, intended to peremptorily forbid him going and dexterously evaded the receipt of the order. But the Duke, who is as obstinate and vindictive as his grandfather, King George III., never forgave him. He swore that Burnaby should never have another command, and he kept his word.

In November, 1876, Captain Burnaby spent his annual holiday in making a journey

ON HORSEBACK THROUGH ASIA MINOR.

In the account he wrote of his journey he said: "I was five months in that country, and traversed a district extending over two thousand miles. My limited leave of absence prevented me from staying more than a few days at the important towns which lay on the route. I met people of many different races: Turks, Armenians, Greeks, Turcomans, Circassians, Kurds, and Persians. They almost invariably received me very hospitably."

The journey was by steamer to Calais, thence by rail to Marseilles, steamer again to Constantinople and Scutari. Horses were bought in Constantinople and a Turkish guide engaged.

THE FIRST HALT

of the journey will serve as an indication of the character of the enterprise in which the young officer had engaged. The colonel, his English servant, and his Turkish attendant had been riding for some time through marshy ground. Night fell, and they looked eagerly for some sign of Moltape, where the travellers had decided to pass the night. The colonel says: "Now a light appeared in the distance, and then another. The swamp through which we had been riding was gradually replaced by harder soil. A few white-washed cottages were met with at intervals along our path. Presently we rounded a corner, and a large village was exposed to view. The Hammall rode up to a house which was detached from the rest, and in the centre of the town. He leaped from his horse, and coming to my side, held the stirrup-leather for me to dismount. We had arrived at a khan, or resting-place for travellers. On lifting up the latch, or rather pulling at a piece of string which was used as a substitute for a handle, the door opened.

"I found myself in a large, low room. So soon as my eyes became accustomed to the dense atmosphere, I discovered that almost all the available space was filled with soldiery. On one side of the room there was a succession of broad wooden shelves, ascending toward the roof; these, too, were tenanted. It was difficult to put a foot down upon the floor without treading upon the face or body of some follower of the Prophet. The smell which arose from so much humanity was everything but agreeable. A mungo, or circular iron pan on a tripod, was filled with burning charcoal, and placed on a stool so as to be removed from the immediate vicinity of the sleepers. It gave out a blue and sulphurous flame. The charcoal had not been properly burned through previous to being placed in the mungo. It added some poisonous fumes to the unhealthy atmosphere.

"The proprietor of the establishment, a Greek, slowly raised himself from a recumbent position. His head was bound up in what appeared to be a red stocking; the toe part of this article of attire hung carelessly over his left shoulder. He was a dirty-looking little fellow, and had a large wen on one side of his forehead. Nature had determined to make him as hideous as possible, and some fellow-mortal had added to her handiwork, for a large scar, barely cicatrized, and apparently inflicted by a knife, extended across his face. This scar and the wen were in the daytime a perpetual resort for blue-bottle flies.

"What do you want?' he asked, in that undefined mixture of Italian, French, Greek, and Spanish, which is spoken throughout the Mediterranean.

"I want a place to sleep in."

"Place to sleep in? Sleep here," he slowly subsided into his original position.

"Osman [the Turkish guide] now began to address him, and in a whining tone said that I was his Effendi, a great person, with gold, not paper, in my pocket, and that I would pay liberally for accommodation. The allusion to the gold acted like a charm upon the Greek.

"Gold!" he said. "Gold! Let me see it!"

"I took out a lira (a Turkish pound), and spinning it carelessly in the air, let it fall on an earthenware dish. The coin gave out a metallic ring. The Greek clutched at the fallen lira; but the nimble Osman was too quick for him, and picking it up returned it to me.

"I have no rooms but this," said the proprietor, eagerly; "but I have a stable. Why not sleep in the stable? You want a stable for your horses, and I will put down some clean straw for the Effendi."

"Our horses were all this time tied up to a post outside. I was on the point of accepting his offer, so as to gain shelter for them as well as for ourselves, when the door opened. A Turkish corporal entered and offered the hospitality of the guard-house, which was gratefully accepted.

After his return, Spain became the scene of travel. Don Carlos was then carrying on his desultory campaign in the Basque provinces, and Colonel Burnaby joined the army of the Spanish Pretender as a capacity in which he served on several subsequent occasions, being determined to have his share of adventure, in spite of the hatred of the carpet-knight who commands the British army from his own palace, without danger or hardship. Spain offered but a limited field of operations, and Colonel Burnaby did not remain long with the Spanish insurgents, whose apathy and unsoldier-like qualities displeased him.

Colonel Burnaby was an ardent politician and a vigorous opponent of Mr. Gladstone, whom he despised as a man of too weak and cautious and vacillating a disposition to rule over England. Burnaby made an attempt to enter Parliament, but was defeated by a small majority at the polls.

IN THE PRESENT SOUDAN EXPEDITION

Colonel Burnaby was attached to the Intelligence Department with Sir Herbert Stewart's force, and the last heard of him was that he had successfully conducted a convoy from Korti to Gakdul.

He was a Colossus, remarkable even among the giant warriors of Berlin and St. Petersburg for his stately stature of six feet four inches and formidable breadth of shoulder. He was also an accomplished linguist, speaking seven Continental tongues with as much ease and fluency as a native.

It was at

that Colonel Burnaby met his death. He was with the force General Stewart was leading across an arm of the desert on the way to Khartoum. At Korti the Nile leaves its southern course and flows in a north-easterly direction for about one hundred and fifty miles. At Abou Hammed it makes a sharp curve, resuming its southern course, bending westerly, until it reaches Metemneh, where it has described in its passage from Korti an irregular semi-circle, the two points being distant about two hundred miles by land, but about six hundred by the river. General Stewart's object was to dash across from the Nile at Korti to the Nile again at Metemneh. At Abu-Klea, on the way across the desert, he was attacked, and the battle was fought in which Colonel Burnaby and eight other famous officers fell.

General Stewart's force consisted of about fifteen hundred effective men. On the approach of the Arabs, who were estimated to number between eight and ten thousand, General Stewart formed his troops into a hollow square, with his field-pieces at the corners and with the invalids and the provisions in the centre. The Arabs made their attack in a tumultuous rush, directed principally upon the side of the square held by the hussars. This side of the square was broken at one time during the fight, and the officers attribute this disaster to the unruly conduct of the camels, which got powder-burned and became uncontrollable. The line was speedily reformed and the enemy driven back. It was at that point that Colonel Burnaby was killed. The following is given by Mr. Burleigh, a correspondent in the Soudan, who witnessed the scene and was himself wounded in the battle: "Still down upon us the dark Arab wave rolled. It had arrived within three hundred yards undiminished in volume, unbroken in strength—a rush of spearmen and swordsmen. Their rifle fire had ceased. Other Arab forces surrounding us—the Mahdi's troops, plundering Bedouins and pillaging villagers from the river side—stood eager on the hillsides watching the charge upon the British square. In wild excitement, their white teeth glistening and the sheen of their brandished weapons flashing like thousands of mirrors, onward they came, charging straight into our ranks.

"I was at that instant inside the square, no far from the Gardner gun, when I saw the left face move somewhat backward. Colonel Burnaby himself, whose every action at the time saw from a distance of about thirty yards, rode out in front of the rear left face, apparently to assist two or three skirmishers running in harp. All but one man of them succeeded in reaching our lines. Colonel Burnaby went forward to his assistance sword in hand. A dauntless colonel rode forward he put himself in the way of a sheik charging down on horseback.

"Ere the Arab closed with him a bullet from some one in our ranks brought the sheik head long to the ground. The enemy's spears were close behind, and one of them sudden-dashed at Colonel Burnaby, pointing the long blade of his spear at his throat. Checking his horse and pulling it backward, Burnaby leaped forward in his saddle and parried the Moslem's rapid and ferocious thrusts. But the length of the man's weapon—eight feet—put it out of his power to return with interest the Arab's murderous intent. Once or twice Colonel Burnaby just touched his man, only to make him more wary and eager. The affray was the work of seconds only, for the savage horde of swarthy negroes from Kordofan and straight-haired tawny complexioned Arabs of the Bayuda steppe were fast closing in upon our square.

"Colonel Burnaby fenced the swarthy Arab as if he were playing in an assault at arms, and there was a smile on his features as he drove off the man's awkward points. The scene was taken in at a glance. With that lightning instinct which I have seen desert warriors before now display in battle while coming to one another's aid, an Arab, who was pursuing a soldier and had passed five paces to Burnaby's right and rear, turned with a sudden spring, and this second Arab ran his spear point into the colonel's right shoulder. It was but a slight wound. Enough, though, to cause Burnaby to twist around in his saddle and defend himself from this unexpected attack.

"Before the savage could repeat his unlooked-for blow, so near the ranks of the square was the scene now being enacted, a soldier ran out and drove his sword bayonet through the second assailant. Brief as was Burnaby's glance backward at this fatal episode it was long enough to enable the first Arab to deliver his spear point full in the brave officer's throat. The blow drove Burnaby out of his saddle, but it required a second one before he let go his grip of the reins and tumbled upon the ground.

"Half a dozen Arabs were now about him. With blood gushing in streams from his gashed throat the dauntless guardsman leaped to his feet, sword in hand, and slashed at the ferocious group. They were the wild strokes of a proud, brave man dying hard, and he was quickly overborne and left helpless and dying."

THE LATE GENERAL GORDON.

AMONG the saddest of the incidents of the war in the Soudan is the death of the brave, chivalrous soldier whose brilliant achievements, dauntless valor, and Christian faith have made his name famous over the whole world. His valiant defence of Khartoum is not the least of his heroic exploits. For nearly a year he and a few gallant soldiers held the city against overwhelming odds. He thought the government which had sent him there had deserted him. Practically they did so until the force of public opinion made itself felt. The Cabinet at last realized that the people were in earnest, believing that the honor of England would be indelibly stained if nothing was done for Gordon. When the administration found that longer delay might cost them their places, they hastily sent out an expedition, which arrived just two days too late to rescue him. It is some slight consolation to know that General Gordon knew before he died that the expedition was sent, and that he did not pass away under the impression that he was deserted. The manner of his death is not yet known. Several accounts have been given. One says that he was treacherously stabbed in the back, another that he fell under a volley of Arab bullets, and another that he died defending himself in a hospital. Unhappily, all accounts agree that he is dead. There is, therefore, no ground on which to base hope regarding him.

Charles George Gordon was born at Blackheath, near London, about the year 1830. His father was an officer of the Royal Engineers, and a man of sterling uprightness and consistent piety. Charles was the youngest of a family of five sons and six daughters. He chose the army as his profession, and after a preparatory training, in June, 1852, he entered the Royal Engineers. In December, 1854, he got orders for the Crimea, to take part in the war England, France, and Turkey were waging against Russia.

From February 28th to April 9th Gordon's task was to make new batteries in the advance trenches. He was exposed to many dangers, and had several hairbreadth escapes of death. He took part in the final storming of Sebastopol, in which he was slightly wounded. After peace was declared, Gordon was engaged for several months in defining the frontiers of the States which the defeat of Russia had changed. In 1860 Gordon was on duty with which England and France were at war. He was actively engaged with his regiment in Peking and the vicinity until the spring of 1862. During this time he surveyed the neighboring country in parts where no European had ever been seen. He also made an expedition on horseback to the Outer Wall, visiting in the course of his journey regions before unknown to Europeans. In May, 1862, the Chinese rebellion was at its height, and the Emperor of China, being unable to suppress it, appealed to the English and French for assistance. As the European colony at Shanghai was menaced by the rebels, and as their success meant only anarchy, some assistance was given to the Emperor, the European Powers believing that only in the ascendancy of the Emperor was there hope of law and order being established in China. The Emperor had in his employ a large foreign force called, in the exaggerated language of China, "The Ever-Victorious Army." This army belied its name by being ignominiously defeated, and the Emperor determined on having a European commander for it. He applied to the British Government. Gordon was recommended, and accepted the position.

"I have taken the command," Gordon said, in a letter to his family, "and am now a mandarin. I have taken the step on consideration. I think that any one who contributes to putting down this rebellion fulfils a humane task, and I also think tends a great deal to open China to civilization. I think I am doing good service." He found the richest and most fertile districts of China in the hands of savage brigands. The silk districts were the scenes of their cruelty and riot, and the great cities of Hungchow and Soochow were rapidly following the fate of Nanking, and were becoming desolate ruins in their possession. Gordon cut the rebellion in half, recovered the great cities, isolated and utterly discouraged the fragments of the brigand power, and left the marauders nothing but a few tracts of devastated country, and their stronghold at Nanking. All this he effected, first, by the power of his arms, and afterward still more rapidly by the terror of his name. On the 11th of May, 1864, he had completely crushed the rebellion.

In almost all engagements Gordon found it necessary to be constantly in front, and often to lead in person. The officers of his force were brave men, but were not always ready to face their desperate antagonists. Gordon, in a quiet way, would take one or other of these by the arm, and lead him into the thick of the fire. He always went unarmed himself, even when foremost in the breach. He carried one weapon to direct his troops—a little cane, and this soon won for itself the name of "Gordon's magic wand of victory." His Chinese followers, seeing him always victorious, always foremost in the fight, concluded it was his wand that insured him protection. Gordon himself never encouraged this superstition. He was a man of strong faith. He never undertook a task without seeking divine guidance, and he firmly believed God would preserve his life as long as He had need of him. He was always ready to surrender it, and believed that he would die when God so willed, and not before.

At the conclusion of the war in China Gordon returned home, and was engaged with his regiment in garrison duty in England. There he had opportunities for Christian work, which he eagerly seized. His house was school, and hospital and almshouse in turn. The troubles of all interested him alike. The poor, the sick, the unfortunate, were ever welcome, and never did suppliant knock vainly at his door. Many a gutter-boy was rescued by him. The workhouse and infirmary were his constant haunts, and many of the dying sent for him in preference to the clergy, and he was ever ready to visit them, to talk to them of Christ the Saviour, the Resurrection, and the Life; but he would not be in any way prominent, though he was always willing to conduct Gospel services for the poor. He taught classes in the ragged schools, and his scholars attested their love and admiration by chalking on the fences,

"GOD BLESS THE KERNEL."

He allowed poor families to add to their scanty means by raising vegetables in his garden. He dined on salt beef, and made his supper of a pot of tea and a stale loaf; and what he could save from his income he gave to the poor. When flowers and fruits were left at his door he sent them to the nearest hospital.

In 1871 Gordon was sent by the government to Turkey on a special mission, which eventually led to his entering the service of the Khédive of Egypt, with the hope of suppressing the slave trade in Africa. The Sultan, before his departure, made him and in February, 1877, the Khédive appointed him Governor of the whole of the Soudan. His government of the Soudan was a vigorous, just, and able one, and the people, long used to corrupt officials, almost worshipped him. Of its details we have no space to speak. One incident, however, is so characteristic that it may be mentioned for the sake of the light it sheds on his character.

During Gordon's residence in the Soudan he went, at the request of the Khédive, on a mission to the King of Abyssinia. The treacherous savage monarch had him arrested, and he was brought a prisoner into the royal presence. Gordon was undismayed. The king looked upon his fearless countenance, and said, angrily: "Do you know, Gordon Pasha, that I COULD KILL YOU ON THE SPOT if I liked?" "I am perfectly well aware of it, your Majesty," said the Pasha. "Do so at once, if it is your royal pleasure. I am ready." This disconcerted the despotic king, and he exclaimed, "What, ready to be killed!" "Certainly," replied the Pasha; "I am always ready to die; and so far from fearing your putting me to death, you would confer a favor on me by so doing, for you would be doing for me that which I am precluded by my religious scruples from doing for myself—you would relieve me from all the troubles and misfortunes which the future may have in store for me." This completely staggered King John, who gasped out in despair, "Then my power has no terrors for you?" "None whatever," was the Pasha's laconic reply. His Majesty instantly collapsed.

At the conclusion of his term of service Gordon returned home. His stay there was brief. He set out the following year on a visit to China, and made an official tour in South Africa and Basutoland. In 1883, he had an opportunity of gratifying a long-cherished desire to go on a new pilgrimage to the East, and lived for some months just outside Jerusalem. Most of his time was devoted to research; and it was with an eagerness, almost a passion, that he pursued, Bible in hand, the survey of the Holy Sepulchre, the site of the Temple, and the walls of Jerusalem. His next enterprise was the one in the Soudan, which has terminated fatally. With its incidents our readers are already familiar.

KIND COMPULSION.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.*

"And compel them to come in."—LUKE 14 : 23.

A Great Entertainment—The Invitations Refused—Frivolous Excuses—Guests to be Had—The Table Set in Palestine—The Spreading Leaves—A Cathedral Organ in Switzerland—The Invitation—Inviting Refusal—By Religious Technicalities—By Metaphysical Teaching—By Church Architecture—How to Lead Sinners to Accept—By a Holy Life—By Kindly Admonition—A Christian Physician's Message—By Prayer—A Child's Prayer Strangely Answered—A Military Violinist in Vienna—The Substitutionary Performer.

The plainest people in our day have luxuries which the kings and queens of olden time never imagined. I walked up and down the stairs of Holyrood Palace—a place that was considered one of the wonders of the world—and I said, "Can it be possible that this is all that there was of this reputed wonderful place?" And this is the case in many other instances. There are fruits in Westchester County and on Long Island farms far better than the pomegranates and apricots of Bible times.

Through all the ages there have been scenes of festivity, and the wealthy man of my text plans and invites his friends. If one builds a beautiful home, he wants his acquaintances to come and enjoy it. If one buys an exquisite picture, he wants his friends to come and appreciate it; and it was a laudable thing when the wealthy man of my text, happy himself, wanted to make other people happy. And so the invitations went out; but something went very much wrong. You can imagine the embarrassment of any one who has provided a grand feast when he finds out that the guests invited do not intend to come. There is nothing that so provokes the master of the feast as that.

Well, these people invited to this great banquet of the text made most frivolous excuses. The fact was, I suppose, that some of them were offended that this man had succeeded so much better in the world than they had. There are people in all occupations and professions who consider it a wrong to them that anybody else is advanced. I suppose these people invited to the feast said among themselves, "We are not going to administer to that man's vanity; he is proud enough now; we won't go; beside that, we could all give parties if we made our money the way that man makes his."

So when the messengers went out with the invitations there was

A UNANIMOUS REFUSAL.

One man said, "Oh, I have bought a farm, and I must go and look at it!" He was a land speculator, and had no business to buy land until he knew about it. A frivolous excuse. Another man said, "I have bought five yoke of oxen." The probability is he was a speculator in live stock. He ought to have known about the oxen before he bought them. Beside that, if he had been very anxious to get to the feast, he could have hooked them up and driven them on the road there. Another frivolous excuse. Another man said, "Oh, I have married a wife, and can't come;" when if he had said to his wife, "I have an invitation to a splendid dinner; it is highly complimentary to me; I should very much like to go; will you go along with me?" she would have said, "To be sure I will go." Another frivolous excuse. The fact was that they did not want to go.

"Now," said the great man of the feast, "I will not be defeated in this matter; I have with an honest purpose provided a banquet, and there are scores of

if they were only invited. Here, my man, here, you go out, and when you find a blind man, give him your arm and fetch him in; and when you find a lame man, give him a crutch and tell him in; and when you find a poor man, tell him that there is a plate for him in my mansion; and when you find some one who is so ragged and wretched that he has never been invited anywhere, then, by the kindest tenderness and the most loving invitation any one ever had, compel him to come in."

Oh, my friends, it requires no acuteness on my part or on your part to see in all this affair that religion is a banquet.

THE TABLE WAS SET

in Palestine a good many years ago, and the disciples gathered around it, and they thought they would have a good time all by themselves; but while they sat by this table the leaves began to grow and spread, and one leaf went to the east and another leaf went to the west, until the whole earth was covered up with them, and the clusters from the heavenly vineyard were piled up on the board, and the trumpets and harps of eternity made up the orchestra, and as this wine of God is pressed to the lips of a sinning, bleeding, suffering, dying, groaning world, a voice breaks from the heavens, saying, "Drink, O friends; yea, drink, O beloved! O blessed Lord Jesus, the best Friend I ever had, the best Friend any man ever had, was there ever such a table? Was there ever such a banquet?"

"From the Cross uplifted high,
Where the Saviour deigns to die,
What melodious sounds I hear
Bursting on the ravished ear!
Heaven's redeeming work is done,
Come, and welcome; sinner, come."

Religion is a joyous thing. I do not want to hear anybody talk about religion as though it were a funeral. I do not want anybody to whine in the prayer-meeting about the kingdom of God. I do not want any man to roll up his eyes, giving in that way evidence of his sanctity. The men and women of God whom I happen to know, for the most part, find religion

A GREAT JOY.

It is exhilaration to the body. It is invigoration to the mind. It is rapture to the soul. It is balm for all wounds. It is light for all darkness. It is harbor from all storms, and though God knows that some of them have trouble enough now, they rejoice because they are on the way to the congratulations eternal.

I stopped one nightfall, years ago, at Freyburg, Switzerland, to hear the organ of world-wide celebrity in that place. I went into

THE CATHEDRAL AT NIGHTFALL.

All the accessories were favorable. There was only one light in all the cathedral, and that a faint taper on the altar. I looked up into the venerable arches, and saw the shadows of centuries, and when the organ awoke, the cathedral awoke, and all the arches seemed to lift and quiver as the music came under them. That instrument did not seem to be made out of wood and metal, but out of human hearts, so wonderfully did it pulsate with every emotion; now laughing like a child, now sobbing like a tempest. At one moment the music would die away until you could hear the cricket chirp outside the wall, and then it would roll up until it seemed as if the surge of the sea and the crash of an avalanche had struck the organ-pipes at the same moment. At one time that night it seemed as if a squadron of spirits weeping up from earth had met a squadron of descending angels whose glory beat back the woe.

Standing there and looking at the dim taper on the altar of the cathedral, I said, "How much like many a Christian's life!

hover, and sometimes his hope is dim, and faint, and flickering, like a taper on the altar. But at what time God wills, the heavens break forth with music upon his soul, and the air becomes resonant as the angels of God beat it with their shining sceptres."

Oh, the Lord God has many fair and beautiful daughters; but the fairest of them all is she whose ways are pleasantness and whose paths are peace! Now, my brothers and sisters—for I have a right to call you all so—I know some people look back on their ancestral line, and they see they are descended from the Puritans or Huguenots, and they rejoice in that; but I look back on my ancestral line, and I see there is such a mingling and mixture of the blood of all nationalities that I feel akin to all the world, and by the blood of the Son of God, who died for all people, I address you in the bonds of universal brotherhood. I come out as only a servant, bringing to a party, and I put it into your hand, saying, "Come, for all things are now ready," and I urge it upon you and continue to urge it, and, before I get through, I hope, by the blessing of God, to compel you to come in.

We must take care how we give the invitation. My Christian friends, I think sometimes we have just gone opposite to Christ's command, and we have compelled people to stay out. Sometimes our elaborated instructions have been the hindrance. We graduate from our theological seminaries on stilts, and it takes five or six years before we can come down and stand right beside the great masses of the people, learning their joys, sorrows, victories, defeats. We get our heads so brimful of theological wisdom that we have to stand very straight lest they spill over. Now, what do the great masses of the people care about?

THE TECHNICALITIES OF RELIGION?

What do they care about the hypostatic union or the difference between sub-lapsarian and supra-lapsarian? What do they care for your profound explanations, clear as a London fog? When a man is drowning he does not want you to stand by the dock and describe the nature of the water into which he has fallen, and tell him there are two parts hydrogen gas and one of oxygen gas, with a common density of thirty-nine Fahrenheit, turning to steam under a common atmospheric pressure of two hundred and twelve. He does not want a chemical lecture on water;

HE WANTS A ROPE.

O my friends, the curse of God on the Church, it seems to me, in this day, is metaphysics. We speak in an unknown tongue in our Sabbath-schools, and in our religious assemblages, and in our pulpits, and how can people be saved unless they can understand us? We put on our official gowns, and we feel the two silk balloons flapping at the elbows of a preacher give him great sanctity. The river of God's truth flows down before us pure and clear as crystal; but we take our theological stick and stir it up, and stir it up, until you cannot see the bottom. Oh, for the simplicity of Christ in all our instructions—among the people! He practised when standing among the people! He took a lily, and said, "There is a lesson of the manner I will clothe you;" and, pointing to a raven, said, "There is a lesson of the way I will feed you; consider the lilies—behold the fowls."

I think often in our religious instructions we compel the people to stay out by our CHURCH ARCHITECTURE.

People come in and they find things angular, and cold, and stiff, and they go away never again to come; when the church ought to be a great home-circle, everybody having a hymn-book, giving half of it to the one next him, every one who has a hand to shake hands, shaking hands—the church architecture and the church surroundings saying to the people, "Come in and be at home." Instead of that, I think all these surroundings often compel the people to stay out. Now, let us all repent of our sins and begin on the other track, and by our heartiness of affection, and warmth of manner, and imploration of the Spirit of God, compel the people to come in.

How shall we

LEAD SINNERS TO ACCEPT

the Lord's invitation? I think we must certainly begin by a holy life. We must be better men, better women, before we can compel the people to come into the kingdom of Jesus Christ. There are fine essays being written in this day about science and religion. I tell you the best argument in behalf of our holy Christianity: it is a good man, a good woman, a life all consecrated to Christ. No infidel can answer it. Oh, let us by a holy example compel the people to come in!

* Dr. Talmage did not preach at the Brooklyn T. heron-le 1st Sunday; we therefore take this opportunity of publishing an impressive sermon he preached a few years ago, which is doubtless new to our readers.

I read of a minister of the Gospel who was very fond of climbing among the Swiss mountains. One day he was climbing among very dangerous places, and thought himself all alone, when he heard a voice beneath him say, "Father, look out for the safe path, I am following," and he looked back and saw that he was climbing not only for himself, but climbing for his boy. Oh, let us be sure and take the safe path! Our children are following, our partners in business are following, our neighbors are following, a great multitude stepping right on in our steps. Oh, be sure and take the right path! Exhibit a Christian example, and so by your godly walk compel the people to come in. I do think there is work also in the way of

KINDLY ADMONITION

I do not believe there is a person in this house to-night who, if approached in a kindly and brotherly manner, would refuse to listen. If you are rebuffed, it is because you lack in tact and common-sense. But oh, how much effective work there is in the way of kindly admonition! There are thousands of men all round about you who have never had one personal invitation to the cross. Give that one invitation, and you would be surprised at the alacrity with which they would accept it.

I have a friend.

A CHRISTIAN PHYSICIAN.

who one day became very anxious about the salvation of a brother physician, and so he left his office, went down to this man's office, and said, "Is the doctor in?" "No," replied the young man waiting; "the doctor is not in." "Well," said this physician, "when he comes in tell him I called, and give him my Christian love." This worldly doctor came home after a while, and the message was given to him, and he said within himself, "What does he mean by leaving his Christian love for me?" And he became very much awakened and stirred in spirit, and he said after a while, "Why, that man must mean my soul," and he went into his back office, knelt down, and began to pray. Then he took his hat and went out to the office of this Christian physician, and said, "What can I do to be saved?" and the two doctors knelt in the office and commended their souls to God. All the means used in that case was only the voice of one good man, saying, "Give my love to the doctor." The voice of kindly admonition. Have you uttered it to-day? Will you utter it to-morrow? Will you utter it now? Compel them to come in.

I think there is a great work also to be done in

THE WAY OF PRAYER.

If we had faith enough to-day, we could go before God and ask for the salvation of all the people here assembled, and they would all be saved, here and now, without a single exception. There may be professional men here, political men here, worldly men here, men who have not heard the Gospel for twenty years, men who are prejudiced against the preacher, men who are prejudiced against the music, men who are prejudiced against the Church, men who are prejudiced against God—I do not care—they might be brought in by fervent prayer—you would compel them to come in.

Oh, for such an earnest prayer! People of God, lay hold of the horns of the altar now, and supplicate the salvation of all those who sit in the same pew with you—yea, the redemption of all who now sit in this house. What a momentous hour! God help!

At the close of a religious service, and when the people had nearly all left the building, a pastor saw with her head bowed on the back of the pew, and, passing down the aisle, he said to himself, "The little child has fallen asleep." So he tapped her on the shoulder and said, "The service is over." She said, "I know it is over; I am praying, sir, I am praying." "Well," said the minister, "whatsoever ye ask of God, believing, ye will receive." She said, "Is that in the Bible?" "Yes," he said, "there is a promise of that kind in the Bible." "Well," she said, "let me see it." So he turned over the Bible until he came to the promise, and she said, "That's so, is it? Now, O Lord, bring my father to this church to-night."

While she was praying her father passed into the door of the church, and came down by his child and said, "What do you want of me?" When that child had begun to pray one hour before for her father, he was three miles away; but by some strange impulse that he could not understand, he hastened to the church, and there the twain knelt, the father's arm around the child's neck, the child's arm around the father's neck, and there he entered on the road to heaven. "Whatsoever ye ask of God, believing, ye will receive." That was an answer to the child's prayer. What did she do? She compelled him to come in.

I stand here and tell you, my hearers, of a great salvation. Do you understand what it is to have a Saviour? He took your place. He bore your sins. He wept your sorrows. He is here now to save your soul.

A SOLDIER.

worn out in his country's service, took to the violin as a mode of earning his living. He was found in the streets of Vienna, playing his violin; but after a while his hand became feeble and tremulous, and he could no more make music. One day, while he sat there weeping, a man passed along and said, "My friend, you are too old and too feeble; give me your violin," and he took the man's violin, and began to discourse most exquisite music, and the people gathered around in larger and larger multitudes, and the aged man held his hat, and the coin poured in and poured in until the hat was full. "Now," said the man who was playing the violin, "put that coin in your pockets." The coin was put in the old man's pockets. Then he held his hat again, and the violinist played more sweetly than ever, and played until some of the people wept and some shouted. And again the hat was filled with coin. Then the violinist dropped the instrument and passed off, and the whisper went, "Who is it? who is it?" and some one just entering the crowd said, "Why, the great violinist, known all through the realm; yes, that is the great violinist." The fact was, he had just taken that man's place, and assumed his poverty, and borne his burden, and played his music, and earned his livelihood, and made sacrifice for the poor old man. So the Lord Jesus Christ comes down, and He finds us in our spiritual penury, and across the broken strings of His own broken heart He strikes

THAT IS BUCHER.

A STRAIN OF INFINITE MUSIC, which wins the attention of earth and heaven. He takes our poverty. He plays our music. He weeps our sorrow. He dies our death. A sacrifice for you. A sacrifice for me.

Oh, will you accept this sacrifice now? I do not go through the audience and single out this man and that man, and this woman and that woman. But I say all may come. The sacrifice is so great, all may be saved. Does it not seem to you as if heaven was very near? I can feel its breath on my cheek. God is near. Christ is near. The Holy Spirit is near. Ministering angels are near. Your glorified kindred in heaven near. Your Christian father near. Your glorified mother near. Your departed children near. Your redemption is near. May God help you to come to Christ, as a lost sinner, and to repose all your faith and trust in Him as your Divine Saviour, who will in no wise cast out those who come to Him.

THE GREAT ARGUMENT.

By W. H. Thompson, M.A., M.D., Professor of Materia Medica and Therapeutics in the University of New York. A significant fact much lost sight of in the present day is in this work pressed upon the attention of Christian preachers and teachers. It is the fact that the apostles in their missionary tours all adopted one line of argument. They did not preach Christian doctrine or Christian ethics, but Christ, the fulfilment of the promises of God in the Old Testament. "This Jesus whom I preach unto you is Christ," Paul said, and that sentence was the burden of his sermons and of those of all the men who "turned the world upside down." They based their arguments on the single fact that Jesus was He of whom Moses and the prophets wrote. That when His life was examined it would be found precisely the life and character and death which were before predicted as the characteristics of Him of whom God first spoke at the gates of Eden, and to whom every inspired man had since pointed as the light of the world. Thus He was the consummation of the Old Testament dispensation, and the Old Testament and the New Testament were organically one. That was the main object of apostolic preaching. It is not so now, and Dr. Thompson dwells upon the fact as a significant and unwise change.

There is, unhappily, a reason for the change, which has a paralyzing effect on the thought and life of the Church. There has come to pass, chiefly through the labors of those who teach "the higher criticism," that men have lost faith in the Old Testament as the Word of God. They think of it as a collection of works marvelously beautiful, full of noble thoughts and inspiring words, but not as a revelation. They have also criticized the books, casting doubt on the authorship and dates of writing, and generally intimating that it is not what it professes to be. Recognizing this fact, Professor Thompson clears the ground at the start by an introduction to his argument, in which he applies to the books of the Old Testament the tests which would be applied to any other collection of books purporting to have been issued under similar circumstances. He contends that the books show precisely the characteristics which reason tells us books would show if written by different men at widely different times.

His line of argument is singularly clear and convincing. It is based on the differences manifested in the literary style of the various writers; the order of succession shown by references to earlier writers in the works of later writers; that changes which lapse of time produced in the nation and reflected in each book, fixing the date and place of composition on internal evidence; and that each book shows the growth and development of the language by the words used, each writer employing words and phrases which contemporary history indicates were in actual use at that time and no other. Dr. Thompson, who is a son of the distinguished author of "The Land and the Book," brings to his task qualities apparently inherited, peculiarly fitting him for its performance, beside learning and the results of wide research.

Having thus cleared the ground, the author proceeds with his main argument that Christ is really the Being toward whom the sacred writers turned their eyes as the Saviour of the world. That they expected Him, looked for Him, and taught their readers to think of Him as the coming Deliverer. The examination of these prophecies in detail under Professor Thompson's guidance will surprise even experienced Bible students. We do not need so much to be convinced that Christ fulfilled the prophecies, as to see that the Old Testament writers really wrote of Him, and this is shown with remarkable skill and acumen. Professor Thompson's work is a most valuable one, and will have a beneficial influence in leading Christians to see new beauties in the Old Testament, finding it as full of their Master as is the New Testament. WITH THE CHINA INLAND MISSION.

MR. GALT, an engineer recently returned from Shanghai, China, thus describes his visits to the rooms occupied by the China Inland Mission in that city:

"It is nearly two years ago since I first arrived in China, a young Christian. A man came aboard distributing tracts. I asked him if there was any place of worship in Shanghai. He said: 'Yes; come along with me;' and he took me to the Masonic Hall, where Mr. Judd was preaching. After the sermon Mr. Judd saw I was a stranger, and shook hands with me. He said: 'Are you a brother in the Lord?' I said: 'Thanks to God I am.' Then he invited me to come at any time to his house. This was the way I was taken by the hand by the friends of the China Inland Mission, and that day was the starting-point for me in China. I went every night to Mr. Judd's house while we were in Shanghai, and there I met several of the friends of the Inland Mission, and Miss Seed, and a few more going up to Chefoo. I was blessed through them, and they drew me closer to God in their meetings. Then our ship came home, but we went back to Shanghai again. This time Miss Lancaster and Miss Black were there, and we had glorious times, precious souls being brought to Jesus.

"After another voyage I went back to Shanghai again, and Miss Minchin was there. This time the premises of the mission were at 33 Foo-chow Road. Some more missionary ladies were on their way through Shanghai—Miss Littlejohn, Miss Todd, and Miss Symon. One man-of-war's man was brought out for the Lord that first night. I do not think that since 33 Foo-chow Road was opened there had been one week without souls being brought to Jesus.

"One Sunday we were coming out of the meeting, and I saw a man who used to be a fireman on board ship along with me. I said to Miss Minchin, 'There is a man who used to be along with me when I was in the world.' She said: 'Go and speak to him.' But he was in a jin-rich-sha, and I couldn't catch him. She said: 'You must pray for him, and I will pray too—whatever two of us agree upon it will be done unto us.' I said I would pray for him.

NINE STOKERS CONVERTED.

"The next night as I was coming up with the ship, I met him and all his mates. I said: 'Hallo, Ferguson, where are you going?' He said: 'I don't know—to play billiards, perhaps.' I said: 'Will you come along with me?' You will be made very welcome by the people of the Inland Mission. He said: 'I don't care if I do,' and we all went off to Miss Minchin's. I told her: 'Here is my friend for whom we have been praying.' She had commenced with her meeting, and they were all very much pleased with it. They were much impressed the first night. She asked them if they would come back the next night—for there was no rest in that 33 Foo-chow Road—every night in the week or every day—it did not matter what time you came—if there was anybody at all, there would be sure to be a meeting. The men promised to come. We all met next night. There were nine of them—all working in the stoke-hole of this one boat, all Scotch, and from the same district as myself. I prayed earnestly for their sakes, and asked God that they might not go away without His blessing. They were every one of them converted before they left Shanghai.

A DRUNKARD SAVED.

"I know one man of the name of Ellis—he was an awful drunkard. He belonged to the American navy. There was only one Christian seaman on board his ship, and he had got rather cold, having no communion with fellow-Christians. The ship carried a chaplain, and he had worked hard and sore, and there were no fruits. This lukewarm Christian was ashore one night, and was asked to come to Miss Minchin's meeting. He came, and was quickened; the few embers in his heart got gathered together, and the flame sprang up. He came back next night and mentioned this Ellis—a man who was always carried aboard drunk, and nobody could reach him. Miss Minchin asked him to bring him along, and somehow or other they got him to come.

"Miss Minchin commenced a meeting, and he was pleased with the hearty singing. He came back another night, and then she attacked him quietly; and next day, as she was out walking, she met him again on the Bund.

"She said: 'Where are you going?' He said: 'I don't know; I have no place particularly to go to.' She said: 'You might come up to my house and get a cup of tea.' He did so, and she said to herself: 'Now is my time for that man; if I let this opportunity slip, I may never get another.' So she seated herself by his side, and labored for his soul, and got him to kneel down, and that dear woman was an hour and a half on her knees with him; but, by the grace of God, he went away rejoicing, and that man is a living monument of God's mercy. Now they have Bible readings on that ship, which they never had before, and there are six or seven Christian men on board.

"I ask your prayers for the work in Shanghai; the laborers are few, but there is a great work going on. I pray God that there may be many places opened up like 33 Foo-chow Road was. It was a want long felt—a place where seamen can go at any time to read or spend an hour, and where they would be asked about their souls."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Wealthy Old Lady.—At a Recent Meeting

Mr. McDonald told a story of a very rich man who, when a friend called on him on one occasion, took him to the door and boastingly said: "See you all yon fields?" pointing the white to the acres of ground that surrounded his house; "these are all mine." His friend looked at him, and said: "See you that little cottage on one of your fields?" "Yes," answered the rich man, "I do." "Well, there is an old woman living in that little cottage who is far richer than you." "How can that be?" was the wondering question. "Because," said his friend, "she has the Lord Jesus Christ as her Saviour, and is a fellow-heir with Him of all things both in heaven and earth."

The Might of a Wife's Prayers.—Captain

Hatfield said: "A woman prayed for her husband for eighteen years. One day she was standing at the window watching him cutting wood in the yard, and she thought, 'I have been praying for that man for eighteen years, and yet he does not seem to be a bit changed.' She went to the door, and looked out at him, and then turned and went up-stairs, and again prayed for him. She came down and went to the door a second time, and said: 'My dear husband, do cease work, and pray God to save you. He will hear you, I am sure.' He looked up at her, and without a word he dropped his axe and walked to some of the outhouses, and there at once cried for mercy, and found Jesus as his Saviour."

The Sob in the Corner.—The Rev. Mr.

Fullerton related: "I remember once, when I was minister in the North, conducting a small meeting. When I was putting on my overcoat to come away, I was praying in my heart that God would send a blessing on the words that I had spoken. I thought I was alone in the church, and was much surprised to hear a great sob. Turning round in the direction from which the sound came, I saw a young man crouching in a corner. I walked over to him, and putting my hand on his shoulder said, 'Robbie,' for I knew the lad. I did not need any words to tell me what was the matter, for I knew God's Spirit was striving within him. I knelt down beside him, and put before him the way of salvation. I then prayed, Robbie always putting in 'Yea, Lord; do, Lord; give, Lord,' I always putting in petitions, until I thought it would be well to tell the lad to pray himself, for he knew better what he required than I did; and, keeping silence myself, Robbie went on, saying, 'O Lord, put thy Holy Spirit within me, and renew my heart, and keep me from the evil influences of the world.' It was indeed a blessed meeting. No one but the Lord, Robbie, and myself were there. He rose up with his face shining and bright. He had found the unspeakable treasure of salvation, and now was resting sweetly in Jesus."

A Convert's Apostasy.—The Rev. Mr. Gault

said: "About fifteen years ago, when I was in India, a native of that place turned from his heathenism to worship the living God. He joined the Church of Christ, but in a private way. It soon came out that he had become a Christian, and his friends did not give him any rest, especially his mother, who came and threatened to kill him if he would not return to his former belief. He did return, and was received again among them, but his conscience did not give him any rest. He eventually came back to Christianity and Christ, and was once more received as a member of the Church. He was so humbled in Spirit before God at his apostasy, that he became a more earnest and more devoted Christian than he was before; but his life was a very sorrowful one. It is said he was never seen to smile."

A Runaway's Arrest.—A Christian Gentleman

narrated the following: "There is a young man in Belfast who takes a great interest in the noon prayer-meeting there. He told me this story: 'About three years ago I ran away from Belfast and went to Glasgow, and one day while I was walking through the street, I had a tract put into my hand, and at the same time was invited to a tent where a meeting was being held. I read the tract, which was entitled, 'Young man, art thou saved?' "No," I said to myself, "I am not saved." I went into the meeting, and before leaving it I was arrested in my life of sin by the grace of God, and accepted Christ as my Saviour.' This young man has since returned to Belfast, and is now taking an active part in the meetings there, and is in many ways successfully seeking to further the cause of Christ."

A Worn Surrounded by Fire.—The Rev.

Mr. Cathcart said: "An Indian military officer had a native servant who was a true worshipper of God. His master was a church-going man, but not a Christian. One day he said to his servant: 'How does it come about that you go so regularly to church and are always singing?' The servant told him in simple language how he had been convicted of sin and led to Christ. They were standing in the garden, and the servant continued, 'If you will come with me I will let you see how I did,' and he led the way to the back of the house, and proceeded to gather a handful of withered leaves, laying them on the ground in a circle. He then got a worm and laid it in the centre of the circle of leaves; then taking a match from his pocket he set fire to the leaves. The worm began to wriggle and twist itself about, trying to escape, but it could not, for it had a ring of fire to pass through. At length, after many attempts, it gave up the struggle, and lay quite still in the middle of the ring. The servant then put out his hand and lifted the worm up and laid it in a more congenial atmosphere. 'Now,' said the servant, 'that is just what the Lord has done for me; after I could do nothing for myself He put forth His hand and saved me.'"

A Frantic Mother's Request.—A Minister in the North narrated the following: "A young sailor burst a blood-vessel and had to go home and live with his widowed mother. They were both very careless about their souls. One beautiful summer evening the lad was ascending a steep hill to catch sight of a little barque sailing on the bay. The exertion was too much for him; he burst another blood-vessel, and was carried home to his poor mother. The doctor and the minister were at once sent for, and as I entered the house I met the doctor coming out, and inquired how the boy was. 'Oh, you are too late; he is gone,' was the reply. 'He has died in his sins then," I said. With some difficulty I entered the house, for it was crowded with people, and all was in fearful confusion. The mother was nearly frantic; she was tearing her hair and crying, "Oh, that I knew my boy was safe!" I said, "Let us pray." The mother said, "Yes, pray for my poor boy. Ask God to forgive him." I prayed for all those who were present, that they might be led to seek God in time, but I did not pray for the dead boy. When we rose from our knees, the mother said, "Why did you not pray for my boy?" It was hard, very hard to tell that mother that it was of no use to pray for him, but it had to be done, and I begged her to seek the Lord for herself while prayer could avail."

Husband and Children Converted.—The Rev. Mr. Ross related that on the occasion of Mr. Moody's first visit to Scotland, in the year 1874, when he was in Dundee, there was a woman who used to attend his meetings. She had been a professing Christian for many years, but unfortunately had married an ungodly man, and now she had an unconverted husband and seven unconverted children. One night she asked her husband to come with her to Mr. Moody's meeting, but he refused to go. The second night she asked him, and again he refused. In many ways he tried to provoke and incite her to anger, but she bore all his unmanly taunts patiently for the sake of her Divine Master, whom she really loved. On the third night, before going to the meeting, she went to her room and prayed very earnestly to the Lord for her husband. Her meekness and great patience toward him had already influenced him far more than any words could have done, and when she came down from prayer he said to her, "Are you going to the meeting to-night?" "Yes," she replied; "but why do you ask?" "Because I am going with you," he answered; and at the meeting that night he gave himself to the Lord. Before the close of Mr. Moody's mission there her husband and her seven children all accepted the Saviour.

A PREDICTION that must be fulfilled before Christ comes is the drying up of the mystical Euphrates, to make way for the kings of the East. This prophecy is found in Rev. 16: 12: "And the sixth angel poured his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the ways of the kings of the east might be prepared."

If we can ascertain what power is symbolized by the river Euphrates, we may know under what trumpet we are now living. The ground of this symbol is the literal river, which opposed an effectual barrier to the entrance of Cyrus into Babylon. A hostile nation, with its armies, is, in the prophets, symbolized by a river and its waters. In Isaiah 8: 7, 8, the king of Assyria and his armies are so symbolized: "Now, therefore, behold, the Lord bringeth up upon them the waters of the river, strong and many, even the king of Assyria, and all his glory, and he shall come up over all his channels and go over all his banks."

The river Euphrates, in this passage (Rev. 16: 12), symbolizes some powerful nation that, with its armies, is an obstacle in the way of the return of the Jews to their own land, understanding, as we do, that "the kings of the East" are ancient Israel. They were for centuries the rulers of the East, and they are the predicted rulers of the East. The Turks are the only obstacle in the way of their re-occupation of Palestine, since they possess it, and the city of Jerusalem, and forbid the Jews to purchase or to settle in it. The Turkish Empire is in other places in prophecy symbolized by the river Euphrates.

The angels—symbols of agencies—which God makes His messengers to accomplish His purposes, were bound in the great river—i.e., agencies not from without, but that were contained within the kingdom or empire symbolized. That this empire was the Turkish, and that these were the four Sultanies within it, that were let loose to devastate and slay, there can be no question. "Of the loosing of four Sultanies," July 27th, A.D. 1301, Gibbon speaks of as freely as of the first investiture of the Turkish Sultan over the Moslem world.

The Turkish Empire, in the height of its power, was as if the great river Euphrates had overflowed its banks and its waters covered all Asia, from the Chinese wall to the gates of Constantinople and the very pillars of Hercules in the far West. But that these waters have, since 1820, been drying up is remarked by all. Turkey has been, for the past fifty years, entered upon the calendar as

THE SICK MAN OF THE EAST.

Lamartine, so early as 1834, in the Chamber of Deputies, Paris, said: "The Ottoman Empire is no empire at all; it is a misshapen agglomeration of different races without cohesion between them, with mingled interests, without a language, without laws, without religion, without unity or stability of power. You see the breath of life which animated it—namely, religious fanaticism—is extinct. You see that its fatal and blinded administration has devoured a race of conquerors, and that Turkey is perishing for want of Turks."

But since 1834 the evaporation of its waters has been vastly more rapid, and in addition to all the wars that have threatened her, her last war with Russia, and the Berlin Conference, left her but a fordable stream at best. Look at her present pitiable condition. Stripped of large portions of her empire, Greece, Algeria, Wallachia, Moldavia, and, in the last few months, practically stripped of Egypt and all she possessed north of the Danube, unable to defend herself against her own vassals; her treasury exhausted, her trade and manufactories destroyed; without her wonted tribute from provinces, and all sources of wealth dried up, she sits an object of pitiable helplessness amid the nations. It is not too much to say that this mystical river is even now well-nigh dried up.

Think of the change effected in the last few years in the affairs of Palestine. Eighty-three years ago the Porte permitted only three hundred Jews within the walls of Jerusalem. Forty years ago the Porte modified the original order, so that a larger number could abide there; but they were shut up in narrow and filthy quarters, next to the dog and leper quarters, the objects of contempt and cruel oppressions. But even this quarter restriction was removed ten years ago.

In addition to this, if the "Euphrates" is a symbol of the Turkish power, as most commentators hold, then now raging has accomplished very much toward drying up its waters. Egypt, with its millions of people and rich revenues, has been practically wrested from the control of the Sultan, and passed under the protectorate of England. In a short time the Ottoman may not have it in his power to oppose an obstacle to the occupation of Palestine by the Jews. Thus rapidly, before our very eyes, are these wonderful prophecies fulfilling that mark the closing years of this dispensation, and yet how few Christians know what is transpiring, and their significance, or seem to care to know!

We are safe, then, in saying that the sixth angel has sounded and the sixth trumpet been blown, and its last echo is dying away, and the last vestige of obstruction to the return of the Jews to Palestine is soon to be removed. The indications are that has already commenced. Thousands have returned in the last few years, and the number is rapidly increasing. Palestine, so long forsaken and desolate, is evidently awakening to a new life. Interesting and significant movements are in progress. Jerusalem is rapidly increasing in population. Of its forty thousand citizens half are Jews, who are increasing in influence as well as numbers. The event, however, most prominent to us which is fulfilling prophecy and hastening the drying up of this Turkish Euphrates River, is the subjugation and possession of Egypt by England. I say possession, for what country did England ever conquer that she has not held, unless driven out by arms, which Egypt can never do, should she desire. But she is forever freed from the power of the Sultan, who is both weakened and impoverished by the loss of this large part of his empire.

Let this fact be borne in mind by every reader, that all expounders of this passage, how much soever they may differ about other predictions, are agreed that has been blown, and its symbolism well-nigh fulfilled.

Frequent mention of "Israel and Judah," of "Judah and Ephraim," and of "two kingdoms," where the Jews are alluded to in the Old Testament, indicates that the ten tribes, as well as Judah and Benjamin, will return.

It was B.C. 740 that the ten tribes were carried away captive to the king of Assyria, from which they have never returned. These are called the "lost tribes," and are alluded to by the prophets as "Ephraim," "Israel," the "house of Israel." Judah and his companions were carried away captive by Nebuchadnezzar into but one country, Babylon, B.C. 466. Their captivity lasted seventy years, when all that desired were permitted to return. A large part did return under Zerubbabel, rebuilt their city, and repossessed their cities and land.

Only the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, with the Levites scattered among them, inhabited Palestine in the days of the First Advent, and therefore only these tribes were implicated in Christ's death. These tribes constituted the Jewish nation that was conquered by the Romans under Titus, about A.D. 70, when their capital city, Jerusalem, was taken by storm, and, with their temple, utterly destroyed. The rest of the Jews, after an incredible number had perished by pestilence and famine and the sword of the Romans during the siege, were carried away captives and sold as slaves "among all nations," so long as purchasers could be found. For ages it was the policy of the Romans, as of the Turks, not to allow a Jew to so much as set foot within the city, or to inhabit the land of Palestine—they were thus driven out of their land, and scattered among all nations.

Let us examine one prophecy, which has been, for generations, spiritualized to mean the preaching of the Gospel to Gentile sinners, and their conversion under it. I must, to save space, ask the reader to turn and read Ezek. 37.

The vision, then, refers to the "Whole House of Israel," Judah and Ephraim, the Jews—not those who are seen, but the ten "lost tribes" who are in their graves—hidden from our sight in the deepest obscurity, so that they are declared to be no more. They will have given up all their ancient and national hopes and become infidel* before this restoration takes place. The Lord, by His Spirit, will bring them out of their obscurity—graves—and bring them into "their own land." This certainly cannot mean bring them back into their own church—unless all the dispersion they have suffered has been simply being excluded for the time being from their own church! Touching the manner of their restoration, the symbolical intimation seems to be, that a day of small things is to mark the commencement of it; that a feeble and gradual beginning of a course of events which is to issue in the most unexpected and stupendous results.

Remittances by mail should be by bank checks, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Checks and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

Will subscribers oblige us by making their Post-Office Orders payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD? Many of them continue to make them payable to individuals, and thus cause us serious delay and inconvenience.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Inauguration of President Cleveland on Wednesday of last week was the occasion of an outburst of enthusiasm rare even on such occasions. An unprecedented number of citizens went to Washington to witness the ceremony, and Republicans of note joined in the proceedings with no signs of discontent. The loyalty with which the decision of the people was accepted affords a pleasant augury for the harmony of President Cleveland's term, and indicates that the Republicans at present have no intention of embarrassing his administration by factious opposition. General Arthur had sent a cordial invitation to Mr. Cleveland to stay at the White House, and proceed with him to the Capitol for the inaugural ceremony. Mr. Cleveland had, however, already made arrangements to stay at the Arlington, but he paid a visit to General Arthur on Tuesday night, which was cordially reciprocated by a visit from General Arthur to Mr. Cleveland at the hotel. The ex-President now retires to private life, and intends, after a brief visit to Europe, to resume his law practice in New York. For the new President it is our duty to pray that in his high office he may be guided of God, and may receive the wisdom and strength he will need in his difficult and arduous labors. Those who most earnestly deplore his election have the greatest cause for prayer, that the disasters they apprehend from the change of government may be averted.

President Cleveland's Inaugural Speech was brief. It contained 1688 words; General Garfield's contained 2940 words, and Mr. Hayes's 2472. President Cleveland commenced with an expression of his sense of the responsibility of his position, and his hope that "the bitterness of partisan defeat and the exultation of partisan triumph might be supplanted by an ungrudging acquiescence in the popular will and concern for the general weal. This is the people's will impressed upon the whole framework of our civil polity—municipal, State, and Federal—and this is the price of our liberty and the inspiration of our faith in the Republic." In outlining the policy of his administration, the President said: "The genius of our institutions, the needs of our people in their home life, and the attention which is demanded for the settlement and development of the resources of our vast territory dictate the scrupulous avoidance of any departure from that foreign policy commended by the history, the traditions, and the prosperity of our Republic. It is the policy of independence, favored by our position and defended by our known love of justice and by our power. It is the policy of peace suitable to our interests. It is the policy of neutrality, rejecting any share in foreign broils and ambitions upon other continents, and repelling their intrusion here. It is the policy of Monroe and of Washington and Jefferson—peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none." This was followed by a protest against unnecessary taxation, and an intimation of the speaker's opinion that a large surplus in the Treasury was a temptation to extravagance and waste. The conscience of the people, the President said, demands that polygamy in the territories, destructive of the family relation and offensive to the moral sense of the civilized world, shall be repressed. On the subject of the Civil Service the President gave a renewed assurance that his policy would be in conformity with the new law. He said: "The people demand reform in the administration of the government and the application of business principles to public affairs. As a means to this end, civil service reform should be in good faith enforced. Our citizens have the right to protection from the incompetency of public employes, who hold their places solely as the reward of partisan service and from the corrupting influence of those who promise and the vicious methods of those who expect such rewards. And those who worthily seek public employment have the right to insist that merit and competency shall be recognized instead of party subserviency or the surrender of honest political belief." The President concluded by invoking the aid and blessing of God upon the government and the nation.

The Nominations of the Chief Advisers of the President were sent to the Senate for confirmation on Thursday last. They were: Secretary of State, Thomas F. Bayard, of Delaware; Secretary of the Treasury, Daniel Manning, of New York; Secretary of War, William C. Endicott, of Massachusetts; Secretary of the Navy, William C. Whitney, of New York; Secretary of the Interior, L. Q. C. Lamar, of Mississippi; Postmaster-General, William F. Vilas, of Wisconsin; Attorney-General, Augustus H. Garland, of Arkansas. Mr. Riddleberger succeeded in having confirmation postponed under the rules for one day, and announced his intention of persisting in his opposition. Influential Republicans, however, succeeded in shaking his resolution, and on the following day all the nominations were confirmed. The nominations have been well received by the press throughout the country. Senators Bayard, Lamar, and Garland have long been well known to the people by their service in the United States Senate. Mr. Endicott has occupied the high and honorable place of judge of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. Mr. Vilas, Mr. Manning, and Mr. Whitney are prominent men in their respective States, where they have an excellent reputation for sound judgment and integrity. The general impression is that the Cabinet is a safe and conservative, if not a brilliant, one.

The House Devoted the last Hour of its Existence to passing the Grant Retirement Bill. At half past eleven o'clock on March 4th it was received in the Senate, and President Arthur had the gratification of making the last act of his official career the nomination of General Grant. The hero of the war now passes to the place in which he won the respect and affection of the people, and which he left just sixteen years ago for the Presidential chair. It is as a general and not as a President that he will live in history, for in many respects his administration was a disappointment. The noble qualities which endeared him to the nation as a soldier rendered him in some important particulars unfit for civil functions. During the past week his health fluctuated considerably, but the bulletins published on Monday pronounced him generally in a slightly improved condition.

General Hazen's Wish is to be Gratiified. He is to be tried by court-martial. Under orders from President Arthur the court is called to try him for conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline. The charge against Hazen is based upon his remarkable conduct in publicly criticising the Secretary of War in relation to the management of the Greely relief expedition. General Hancock will preside, and it may be hoped that General Hazen will be honestly and fairly tried, and that justice will be done without fear or favor.

War between England and Russia is Seriously threatened. Russia, acting on her usual policy, has seized the opportunity of the British Government's embarrassment to draw another step nearer to India. She calculated that the severe strain now put upon the British army would incapacitate England from even contemplating war with her. The Russian outposts are now only one hundred miles from Herat, whereas three years ago they were five hundred miles distant. The British Secretary of State has sent to the Russian Government a formal demand for the withdrawal of the expedition, and the English press dignifies the demand with the title of an ultimatum. The Russian Government courteously but firmly refuses to withdraw, and it now remains for England to say what she will do. The situation is evidently critical, but hopes are still entertained of a pacific solution. They are based on the fact that Russia's finances are in a crippled condition, and also on her knowledge that in Afghanistan England is in a better condition for fighting successfully than is Russia. An impression prevails in England, though it does not appear to be shared in France and Germany, that Russia has no disposition to go to war, but thought that while England was sending every available soldier to the Sudan, a strip of Afghan territory might be annexed with impunity. England's unexpected firmness may, if that view of the case is accurate, insure the peaceable withdrawal of Russia within her own frontiers in Asia. The crisis, however, continues serious.

The British Army in the Sudan Remains in a state of enforced inaction. In an address to the soldiers, General Wolsley informs them that he hopes to lead them to Khartoum "before the end of the year," but until the heat abates, it is apparently his intention to remain at Korti or some other place still more secure. A cable dispatch says: "General Sir Redvers Buller has pointed out the places between Gakdul Wells and Korti suitable for the establishment of depots for water supplies for the retiring troops. The depots near Korti will be supplied thence and the others by camel transports from Gakdul. It is reported that the British troops will remain in the vicinity of Korti during the summer, and be lodged in straw huts. The greatest fears are entertained concerning the effects of the torrid heat, and the most conservative think that the mortality among the troops will be large, although, perhaps, not as great as it would be during a continued retreat under the desert sun. The Arabs undoubtedly are fully aware of the existence of numbers of hidden wells in the desert, and this knowledge, it is thought, will enable them, despite the destruction of the public wells by General Buller, to follow and harass the British with large forces."

Thy Healer: God's Dealings with Soul and Body, edited by Mrs. M. Baxter, a magazine devoted to holiness and healing, published in London on the first and fifteenth of every month. Copies are sent to subscribers in America direct from Bethshan as soon as printed. Annual subscription, including postage, seventy-five cents. Subscriptions for 1885 should be sent to Mrs. M. The Hospital Saturday and Sunday Association, of New York, report an aggregate collection for the year 1884 of $37,030.56, while for the year previous it was $43,062.74. The association attributes the falling off to the inclemency of the weather on Hospital Sunday, one of the worst days of the season. It is also doubtless due in part to the protracted depression in trade, which is affecting all classes. Of the amount contributed during the past year $21,339.62 came from religious and $15,752.19 from secular sources. The report says that among the trades an added interest is reported.

Religious Teaching in College is not to be abandoned in at least one of our colleges without a struggle. The Rev. Dr. McCosh, in his report on the state of Princeton College recently made to the Board of Trustees, said: "Being spared to this time, and, thank God, in good health, I mean not only to defend but to fight for what I believe to be a fundamental principle with this college, that religion is not to be abandoned in college teaching; and that what is great and good in the past is to be retained, along with the new, in the obligatory studies. The fight is only begun, and will last for years, and I think Princeton, with its trustees, professors and alumni, should take its part in the contest."

Roller Skating, which has become the popular amusement among young people, was the subject of a double condemnation recently. The pastor of a church at Jamaica, L. I., found that the amusement was a serious hindrance to his revival work during the winter, declaimed against it, especially on the ground that it encouraged late hours, and led to improper associations. He believed also that it was physically injurious, and asked the opinion of an eminent Brooklyn surgeon. The opinion confirmed the clergyman's view. The surgeon wrote: "I consider that the practice physiologically is a pernicious one. Its effect upon boys is bad enough, but upon girls it is much worse. It destroys muscular balance, strains unduly the parts chiefly exercised, locates weakness at vital points, and prepares the way for a great amount of suffering and wretchedness. If the craze should continue for any considerable length of time the facts which I have named will be verified in the experience of many a young lady."

An Organized Movement to Protect New York from the apprehended cholera visitation next spring is being made. A leader in the movement, Mr. Charles F. Wingate, who is a sanitary engineer and a member of the Tenement House Commission, has published a detailed programme of the work contemplated. From this statement it appears that it is intended to combine all the existing sanitary societies in a league for the protection of the city. Then, to group all the members together, and divide them up into local committees, whose duty it will be to report to a general committee any facts which may come to their knowledge regarding sanitary defects. If any member notices that a street is not properly cleaned, or if he is told that a house is in bad condition, he will report it to the General Committee, who will investigate the facts and report them to the Board of Health. Then, if it is found that the Board has no power to take action in a specific case, the committee will take proper measures itself. The money to do the work has been pledged, so that no pecuniary responsibility will attach to the members of the league. The Sanitary Auxiliary Society of New Orleans has kept yellow fever out of that city for four years by just such a system.

A Watchman in the Shadow of a Tomb may be seen every night in a cemetery in Philadelphia. The correspondent in that city of a Chicago journal, referring to the place where the body of a recently deceased banker is interred, says that from sunset to sunrise, it is carefully guarded by a well-armed man. For months and months he will go his weary round. If he should fall ill a substitute will be put in his place, for it would be perilous to take a moment's risk with the human hyenas who prey upon dead men's bones. Since the desecration of the grave of the late A. T. Stewart, the tombs of men of large wealth have a watch for months, and indeed the time of its ceasing is often purposely left a matter of uncertainty. The widow of a wealthy financier, who was one of the richest and most widely known men in Philadelphia, not only had men guard her husband's grave, but she also had a mass of granite put upon it, so large and heavy that the power of an engine would be required to pull it away. Thus even death does not deliver the rich man from his foes; it only reverses their character and aim. The ghouls who would steal his body are really trying to capture his money, using his body as the means; in his lifetime his great enemy was trying to capture his soul, and using his money as the means (Matt. 19: 24).

Curious Experiments with Colorless Ink have been performed by a writer in a scientific journal. He says: "If one should write upon a sheet of white paper with chloride of platinum no mark would be visible, as the liquid is quite colorless. But hold the same sheet of paper over the vapor of mercury, and the metal it received in the former operation will be brought out in dark tints. Several surprising effects may be produced by utilizing that fact. It is so in our moral conduct. Sins are committed which apparently leave no trace, being undetected, and the sinner's reputation is untarnished in the world; but the tracing remains, and in the light of the judgment will appear clear and legible unless previously washed out by the blood of Calvary (Ps. 90: 8).

A Bridal Ring Two Centuries Old has been presented to a young lady at Melton, N. Y., by her aunt. Among a band of Huguenots who were driven from France two hundred years ago on account of persecution for their adherence to the Protestant Church was a newly married pair, full of courage and religious zeal. The bride wore on her finger a plain gold ring, on which was engraved her name, Elizabeth. This hoop of old gold, a mere shadow of what it was once in weight and size, has been bequeathed from generation to generation, always bringing with it its record, and always going to a direct female descendant named Elizabeth of the Huguenot bride who landed on the hospitable shores of America two centuries or more ago. The present owner is one of the seventh generation from the original owner. She doubtless prizes the ring as a relic of her noble ancestress; it probably also reminds her of that higher union which the Huguenots counted more sacred than even that of the marriage relation. Should the ring ever be worn by one who has no part in that union, its presence on her finger would be a constant reproach to her (Hosea 2: 19, 20).

The Bible Used at the Inauguration of President Cleveland last week has a romantic association connected with it. It was a small morocco-covered, gilt-edged volume, pretty well worn. It is the Bible which Mr. Cleveland's mother gave him when he left home as a young man, and at his special request the committee of arrangements had it in readiness for the ceremony. There is always a curiosity felt to know what particular words are touched by the lips of the new President. On this occasion, the Baltimore Sun says there was no intention of the Chief Justice to open the book at any particular place, and no desire of President Cleveland that there should be anything prearranged about the ceremony in any way. The particular place where he kissed, therefore, was the result of accident entirely. As the type used in the Bible is small, the lips of the President touched six verses of the 112th Psalm, from verse 5 to verse 10, inclusive. The passage commences with the words: "A good man showeth favor and leniency: he will guide his affairs with discretion." It may be hoped that in the responsible position in which Mr. Cleveland is now placed his mother's treasured gift will become more precious to him than ever. Both he and the country over which he presides will benefit if he makes it the guide of his policy, and esteems it, as he has reason to do, the unerring compass and chart of his Presidential course (Deut. 17: 19).

The Ownership of a Floor is in Dispute in New York, and a lawsuit is threatened. On March 1st a tenant left the premises he had occupied for six years, and took up one of the old floors, and replaced it with a new one. The owner of the premises, instead of being pleased at getting a new floor in the place of his old one, protested violently, and as the tenant persisted, he has invoked the law to decide the question of the ownership of the old floor. The cause of the contention is understood when it is explained that the tenant is a jeweller, who has been working at his trade on that floor for six years, and the boards are so impregnated with gold dust that when burned they will yield gold worth several hundred dollars. Though the legal question is technically about the ownership of the floor, the real question is about the gold in the floor; the wood will be burned in any case to get at the gold. It is so in the believer's character; the fires of affliction consume what is worthless and yield the precious virtues, which God esteems better than gold (1 Pet. 1: 7).

A Realistic Stage Performance has been near having a tragic sequel at Virginia City, Nev. A troupe of actors, excellent in their profession, played Othello there. Most of the miners, who composed the bulk of the house, had not seen a play for many years, and the theatre presented a packed mass of red shirts. The actor who had the rôle of Iago was noted for his realistic power; and so faithfully did he portray the traitorous friend that the audience lost control of itself, and in the second act began shooting at the fell conspirator. One shot struck Othello's sword hilt, and all hands had to lie down on the stage and roll into the wings. The indignant miners were finally quieted, and the play proceeded, but the final denouement was so taken to heart by the spectators that the pseudo Iago remained in the theatre all night for fear of the vigilantes, who talked seriously of lynching the "cold-blooded villain off hand." The audience reversed the mistake made too frequently in our churches. They thought that a man was serious who was only pretending, while congregations listen to solemn sermons as if they were idle tales (Gen. 19: 14).

An Indian's Voluntary Sacrifice of his Life is an incident among the reminiscences of General Averill, who commanded United States troops in Arizona. During the general's residence there a white man was found murdered and scalped. The crime was evidently the work of an Indian, who had made his escape to the woods. Orders came from Washington to demand the murderer from his tribe, and to inform them that unless he was delivered on a certain day vengeance would be taken on the whole tribe. The Indian chiefs, with their followers, hunted for the murderer for several days, but failed to find him. They held a council, and sent a deputation to the United States commander, saying they had not been able to discover the fugitive, but if time were given them they would continue the search, and would deliver him as soon as he could be found. But the commander said his orders were imperative, and that unless the man were brought in, dead or alive, he should commence war. Another fruitless search was made, and another council was held, when one of the warriors said: "We cannot find this man, and they will make war upon our tribe; our women and children will be killed; take me and shoot me, and lay my body down before the officers." And after a while this was done. The warrior was shot and his body was carried in and laid at the feet of the officers. It was a sad but a noble act, and the Indian was doubtless sustained by the knowledge that his friends were saved by his self-immolation. It was for his enemies that Christ died (Rom. 5: 8).

PETER'S BLUNDER.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"But Peter said, Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten anything that is common or unclean."—Acts 10:14.

A Contradiction of Terms—Saying "Not So" to the Lord—Lessons from Peter's Blunder—I. The Old Man Remains in the New—A Continual Struggle—The Same Kind of Sin—The Same Man who Rebuked his Master—Who Refused Him—Wisdom in the Back of the Head—His Good Points—II. The Old Man Generally fights—Against Abolition of Forms—Against Low Association—Warning against Mr. Moody—III. How the Old Nature Shows Itself—A Mother's Quarrel with the Lord—IV. Willfulness in the Way of Usefulness—Rowland Hill's Horses.

"Not so, Lord." This is a very curious expression. I do not mind how you turn it into English from the original, but it is a very strange compound. If Peter had said, "Not so," there would have been a clear consistency in his language and tone. But "Not so, Lord," is an odd jumble of self-will and reverence, of pride and humility, of contradiction and devotion. Surely, when you say, "Not so," it ought not to be said to the Lord; and if you say, "Lord," you ought not to put side by side with such an ascription the expression, "Not so." Peter always was a blunderer in his early days, and he had not grown out of his old habits of honest impetuosity. He meant well, and his expression was not intended to convey all that he might easily make of it. At any rate, it is not for us to condemn him. Who are we that we should sit in judgment on a saint of God? Besides, we are not without fault ourselves in the matter of incorrect speech. You and I have said some very curious compound things in our time. In our utterances there has been faith mixed with unbelief, love defaced with a want of submission, gratitude combined with distrust, humility flavored with self-conceit, courage undermined with cowardice, fervor mingled with indifference. We are as strange beings as the image which Nebuchadnezzar saw in his dream; and our speech betrays the fact.

Now, we will have a look at Peter, and see what we can learn from this singular expression of his—this strangely compounded exclamation, "Not so, Lord."

I. The first truth which we may easily learn is that in the Christian man. Albeit we are made new creatures in Christ Jesus, and the life that is within us, the dominant life, is new, and holy, and heavenly, yet the old nature still survives. Though crucified, it is long in dying, and struggles hard. Sin dwelleth in us, so that we painfully discover that, though we are new men, we are yet men; and though the grace of God reigns within us, yet there is a struggle for the kingdom, and the sin that dwells in us strives after the mastery. We are renewed sinners, but we are sinners still. Our hearts and hands are cleansed by divine grace, but they have a sad tendency to become defiled.

Peter was Peter still. Why, dear friends, I think that if I had never before seen this passage in the Acts, but had read Peter's life as I find it in the writings of the four evangelists, and somebody had newly shown me the present text, and said, "I have left out the name of the apostle, but one of them, when he had seen a vision from God, and knew that God spoke to him, nevertheless said, 'Not so, Lord'—what apostle was that?" I should not have had to guess twice, I am sure. I should have been sure that it was Peter; so you see Peter is Peter after the grace of God has renewed him. I think we must say the same of ourselves.

The man is still the same man; he is greatly altered, but he has not lost his identity. Whatever change has taken place in him, Peter is Peter, and I should like you young converts to recollect that; for perhaps you think that in the day when you were converted you lost your old selves altogether. I can assure you that you did not; the hasty temper, the sluggish constitution, the gloomy tendency, or the fickle humor will be there still, to be struggled with so long as you are here below. You received a new self, and a better self, but the old self is there still. Your mother will be able to recognize you, I dare say, if you live at home as a young person; she will know that it is the same John, or the same Mary, for your foibles and weaknesses will crop up, if not your faults; and, therefore, you must keep a watch upon yourself.

Note that Peter here shows how readily he fell, not precisely into the same sin, but into

THE SAME KIND OF SIN.

His tendency was still to err in a certain direction. This Peter who said, "Not so, Lord," is he not the same man who in his impudence rebuked his Master, and said, "That be far from thee, Lord"? Impudence, I call it. It was a piece of impertinence for which he was well rebuked when the Master said, "Get thee behind me, Satan." Our Lord detected Satan endeavoring to work through the zealous enthusiasm of Peter, to tempt Him to turn aside from the great work that he came to do. Is not this the same man who at supper-time refused his Master? When the Lord Jesus took a towel, and girded Himself, and was about to wash the disciples' feet, Peter said to Him, "Dost thou wash my feet?" for he was astounded at such an example of humility. When the Master came with the basin he said, "Thou shalt never wash my feet;" and then you recollect what a turn he made when his Lord said, "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me." Then he cried, "Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head." He was always impulsive; and from this cause he rebukes his Master, and he refuses his Master. He acts as if he fancied that he knew better than his Lord, though in his heart of hearts he had no such notion. Yes, this is the same Peter who cried, "Not so, Lord."

I therefore put it again. What were your faults before conversion? Guard against them now. What have been your failures, and your weaknesses, and your errors since you have been converted? Watch against them still; for if you have now become an experienced Christian, and your graces have been greatly developed, and you have become exceedingly useful in the Church of God, yet, beloved brother, the points in which there is a weakness in your natural constitution, and in which you have made failures, are the points at which you must set a double guard; watching and praying lest you be led into temptation by those special features of your character. Kindly notice this earnest advice, which my loving anxiety leads me to press upon you. I have seen so much of the

that I entreat you not to give way to it. If anybody tells you that the old man is quite dead, you may say, "Nobody but the old devil could have set you on to whisper such a lie in my ear. The truth is not in you." You dream of perfection, but you are a mass of wants, and infirmities, and conceits; and if it were not for the infinite mercy of God, who deals tenderly with you, you would soon have most painfully to know it to your own dishonor, and to the grief of your brethren round about you. Peter is Peter still, notwithstanding what grace has done.

This was a man whose wisdom always lay at the back of his head, instead of at the front of it. It came in to tell him that he had made a mistake, but it never came to hand soon enough to prevent the error; and Peter after Pentecost had not lost this trait of his character. I may be addressing young folk here who are very impulsive, and speak all in a hurry things which they afterward are sorry for. I should not wonder if you continue to be impulsive when you grow older. Perhaps it will be one of your snares through life. Be on your guard against it. It is a strength if it be rightly managed. Give me the man who in a good cause does not think twice, but acts upon the warm impulses of a ready mind. Give me the man who understands that second thoughts are not always the best, for they are apt to chill, and the best thought is that which comes from a heart fired with the love of Christ; but that same characteristic, if not kept in proper order by the Spirit of God, may lead you into a world of mischief.

You say your say so quickly, but you cannot unsay it, even in years and ages. You cannot call back the words which now cause you to bite your tongue with regret. You did grow very angry. It is true that ten minutes calmed you, and you were as sorry as possible for all your bitter speeches; but that could not undo the injury, nor heal the cruel wound that you had given to your faithful friend. You must cry to God that, if you are impulsive, the impulses may always come from Him; and you must ask Him daily to lead and guide you in the way of understanding. I pray that you may not often pull out your sword, and cut off a man's ear, for Jesus is not here to work miracles, as He was at hand fortunately with Peter; and you may cut somebody's ear off, and not be able to put it on again. Ask Him to keep you in check, that you may not be working mischief in your haste which you will have to repent of in your leisure.

II. But now, secondly,

THE OLD MAN GENERALLY FIGHTS

against Gospel principles; for this was the point upon which Peter differed from his Lord. This "Not so, Lord," applied to grand Gospel principles which had been put before him, as, for instance, the abolition of the ceremonial law. Peter was to know that those ceremonial laws, which forbade the eating of this and that, were now to be abrogated. Many to this day quarrel with God's glorious Gospel on ceremonial grounds. The Scripture saith that men are to be saved by faith; but these formalists say, "Surely, they must be regenerated in baptism; they must be further fed by the blessed Eucharist." All of us are apt to err in this manner, for we incline to attach undue importance to matters which are proper and useful in their places, but which are by no means essential to salvation.

The same battle is carried on by certain people who have never eaten anything common or unclean, in the sense that they have never associated with any but very respectable people. Here the fight is concerning before the law, and under the Gospel. An evangelist brings into the congregation all the poor people of the district, and the very worst of characters gather to hear him. This ought to be a great joy, but in certain cases it is not. Many are offended, and in effect say, "Not so, Lord." Well, really, I—I—I do not like sitting next to one who is dressed so badly, and smells so vilely. I saw a woman of loose character come in, and I felt as if I must leave my pew." Oh, you very respectable people, you know that you get into that state of mind!

Truly, it is an instinct of cleanliness to shrink from the unwashed; but then it is an instinct of the new life to rejoice in the salvation of souls, and for the sake of it to put up with greater discomforts than can arise from contact with the fallen. I suppose that in the days of James, when he rebuked those who beckoned the rich to sit near them, the Roman or the Jewish pauper was quite as ill-savored as any that are among us at this day, yet he makes no allowance for this. Let us prize the common and unclean so much that we never think of them in that light.

Never let us set up

THE TYRANNY OF CASTE,

and rebuild the middle wall of partition which our Saviour died to throw down. To hear some people speak of their fellow-men is sickening to me; they talk of them as if they were mere offal and rubbish, not worthy of their genteel notice. I bless God that I seldom hear it, for it rouses my wrath. A minister in a certain neighborhood used solemnly to warn his people against all such wicked persons as Moody and Sankey, and the like, because they were the means of saving the lower orders. He said, "I see people in this district professing to be saved, and yet they never before went to a place of worship at all." Therefore," he said, "I do not believe in their salvation, for surely if God were about to save a great number, He would first of all save those who have for years regularly attended our places of worship." That was a bit of Peter-like propriety coming up, and saying, "Not so, Lord." Oh, the cruelty of respectability! If you have anything of that left in your nature, ask God to turn it out.

The same kind of battle takes place when our old man fights against the Gospel in its great principle of free and sovereign grace. Somebody said the other day that to say "free grace" was to use a redundancy. That is so; but there is such a real redundancy in grace that we do not mind using a redundancy of expression when we are talking about it. "Free grace" we mean still to say, for, as some people will not believe that grace is free, it is still necessary to make it very clear that it is so, and to say not only "grace," but "free grace." Christ did not die for saints, but for sinners.

III. Thirdly, and as briefly as I can, I would remind you that

THE OLD NATURE SHOWS ITSELF in many ways, always fighting against God. "Not so, Lord," is often the cry of our unregenerate part. It is so against the doctrine of the Gospel. Some persons do not believe the Gospel because they do not want to believe it. They studiously omit to read all such parts of Scripture as would enlighten their minds. They are not convinced because they have already persuaded themselves as to what truth ought to be. "Not so, Lord," is their cry. Beloved, never get into that state of mind. Follow God's Word anywhere, believing what the Spirit says, let Him teach you what He may.

This old nature of ours sometimes cries out against God in matters of duty. We can do anything except the special duty of the hour, and as to that one thing, we say, "Not so, Lord." Yonder young woman knows that according to God's Word that young man, for she would be unequally yoked together with an unbeliever. Now, she was quite willing to be baptized, and she is heartily willing to give her money to the Lord, and in fact to do anything except that one act of self-denial, which would require her to cease from a fond friendship. Yet, my friend, I do not know what sorrow you will make for yourself if you really break that salutary tie. I have seen many instances of mixed marriages, but I have had to mourn over nearly all of them as the cause of untold wretchedness. Take you the precept, and knowing that it is God's mind concerning you, never dare even for a moment to hesitate. "Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it." Never let your lips say, "Not so, Lord;" for it is disobedience to demur against the command of the Lord your God.

Our natural corruption is apt to quarrel with the Lord concerning our sufferings. Against this also be ever watchful. Whenever you are called to endure trial, do not complain of the particular form it takes. Perhaps it is great bodily pain, and you say, "I could bear anything better than this." That is a mistake. God knows what is the best for His child. Do not cry, "Not so." "Oh, I could bear sickness," says another, "but I have been slandered! My character is taken away, and I cannot bear that." Thus our will asserts its place, and we pine to be our own god and ruler. This must not be. You must, my dear friend, bear that which the Lord appoints, or else you will make the matter a deal worse. If you want anything done well do it yourself, with this exception—that, if you want your character defended, you should always let that alone. Somebody else will take care of that for you, and if slander be the rod under which you are to smart, many of us have felt it before you, and you need not complain so bitterly, as if a strange thing had happened to you. Do not cry, "Not so, Lord;" but let the Lord appoint you care or calamity, sickness or slander, for He knows best.

"But I am afraid that I shall lose my wife, or a favorite child. I think that I could have suffered anything but that." Yes, you see, a rebellious spirit contends with God one way or another; it cannot be quiet. I was greatly struck with a story a dear sister told me yesterday. She was very nearly being removed from the church; she had for taking away her husband, and she would not go to any place of worship, she felt so angry about her loss. But her little child came to her one morning, and said, "Mother, do you think Jonah was right when he said, 'I do well to be angry, even unto death?'" She replied, "Oh, child, do not talk to me," and put the little one away; but she felt the rebuke, and it brought her back to her God, and back to her church again, humbly rejoicing in Him who had used this instrumentality to set her right with her Lord. O friends, let us be silent before the Lord, and judge His ways no longer, for in this judgment there is no benefit to ourselves or others!

Sometimes our corrupt nature quarrels with God about our service. The Lord says, "Go into the Sunday-school." "I should have liked to preach," says the young man. "Go into the Sunday-school." "Not so, Lord," says he, and he will not go, and thus he misses his life-work. It will not do for us to choose what work we will do. Do what the Lord bids you, when He bids you, where He bids you, as He bids you, as long as He bids you, and do it at once. Never say, "Not so, Lord."

IV. Let us leave that point, and close with a fourth observation—it is a great pity when this kind of of usefulness. It would have been so with Peter if the Lord had not used the process by which He overcame him. "Not so, Lord," said Peter; "Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten anything that is common or unclean." In some things Peter was a great deal too conservative. He says, "Not so, Lord," and some read it, "Never, Lord, never Lord, for I have never" that is, "I must never do a thing I have never done." Many are of this mind; they cannot advance an inch. This is the hymn they sing of a morning before breakfast, "As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen." And any time until they go to bed at night it is the tune they keep on singing. "As it was in the beginning; as it was in the beginning." They will never do what has not been done, nor learn what they have not learned. Many will only act as others act; they must keep in the fashion. Now this is a rule which I never accepted; for it always seemed to me that I was probably to do what nobody had done before me; for was I not in some points different from every one else? Let us struggle against the spirit which would bind us hand and foot; where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty.

Propriety hinders very many; decorum is their death. I do not know the precise meaning of it; but there are genteel people about who consider that the finest thing on earth is "propriety." Mr. Rowland Hill was said to have hidden on the back of all order and decorum. "No," he said, "I cannot ride on the back of two horses, but I have two horses to my carriage, and I have called one of them 'Order,' and the other 'Decorum,' to make the report come as nearly right as possible." Order and decorum were never put to a better use than when they drew Mr. Rowland Hill from town to town preaching the Gospel; and I, for one, am glad that he never took those horses into the pulpit. He was just as disorderly and indecorous as a Christian man ought to be—that is to say, he was perfectly natural, and spoke the truth from his heart, and men that heard it felt the power of it; and so he became a blessing to this part of London, and, indeed, to the whole world.

SHAKE YOURSELF UP

a little, my brother. If you are too precise may the Lord set you on fire, and consume your bonds of red tape! If you have become so improperly proper that you cannot commit a proper impropriety, then pray God to help you to be less proper, for there are many who will never be saved by your instrumentality while you study propriety.

Again, I doubt not that some are hindered in their usefulness by their great dignity. It is wonderful what noble creatures men can grow into, if they are let alone. "This great Babylon that I have built," cries Nebuchadnezzar. That is the same gentleman who afterward ate grass like the oxen, and whose nails grew like birds' claws. We have seen very, very, very great little people, and very, very little great people who have given themselves mighty airs; but we have never seen any good come of their greatness. Few people are blessed by these gorgeous individuals. God seldom sends His Elijahs bread and meat by peacocks. If you go as visiting ladies into the houses of the poor very finely dressed, and you "condescend" to them, they will not want to see you any more; but if you go in and sit at their side, and show them that you are their true friends, you get at their hearts.

Love thyself less and less, and love thy God more. Love the soul of every man with all the intensity of thy being. Struggle and agonize to bring sinners to the Saviour's feet, and God will help thee. But if thou standest on thy dignity, and sayest, "Lord, not so; for I have never eaten anything common or unclean," it will be a serious injury to thee.

Are there any here who have not yet believed in Jesus? I hope they will trust their souls with Him at once, and, when they have done so, let them come forward without delay, and confess His name, and be baptized into the sacred Three. Then let them try to grow downward lower and lower, till they sink into nothing, that Christ may be all in all.

NEW BOOKS.

ROYAL GRACE AND LOYAL GIFTS

is the title of a small volume of five hundred and sixty-four pages, in which are collected some of the choicest works of the late Frances Ridley Havergal. In a compact and convenient form six of her volumes are here in one cover. They are: My King; Royal Commandments for the King's Servants; Royal Bounty for the King's Guests; The Royal Invitation; Loyal Responses; and Kept for the Master's Use. With some of these our readers are doubtless already familiar, but with others, especially the last named, they have not yet made acquaintance. It was published after the author's death, and the revision of the proofs of it was the last labor she performed. We have already spoken fully of Miss Havergal and her works in the biography published in this Journal shortly after her death. It is therefore unnecessary to describe here the character of her books. Thousands of Christians in every English-speaking land have feasted upon them with delight, and have learned through them to see more of the beauty of Jesus and the power of the hidden life. One of the chief merits of these writings is, that each of them, except the last, is divided into thirty-one portions, each complete in itself and forming an excellent reading for morning and evening devotion. The deep spirituality they breathe, the earnest desire for a closer walk with God, the constant striving after complete consecration to Him, render these readings stimulating and eminently useful, especially to young Christians. This collection, in a cheap and portable form, of the six books in one, is sure to have a large sale. It is published by Messrs. Anson D. Randolph & Co., New York. Price $1.

PERSONAL TRAITS OF BRITISH AUTHORS.

The student of English literature will find this one of the most fascinating works that has been issued in many years. It is the first of four volumes of anecdotes of the brilliant group of men of letters who, in the early years of the present century, rekindled the dormant power of the press. Mr. Edward T. Mason, who edits the series, proposes to give in these volumes such anecdotes and incidents as serve to render the personal characteristics of the eminent authors familiar to his readers—in fact, to make them personally acquainted with the men whose works have been the delight of this generation. His plan is to collect the evidence of eye-witnesses as far as that can be done, and to add second-hand evidence only when it is absolutely necessary, and with due caution. Twenty-seven authors in all will thus be introduced to the public. The first volume comprises seven: Byron, Shelley, Moore, Rogers, Keats, Southey, and Landor. "Careful search" [says Mr. Mason] "has been made for everything which might throw light upon these authors; upon their appearance, habits, manners; upon their talk, their work, and their play, their strength and weakness—physical, mental, moral. Records of acts directly exemplifying traits of character have been given whenever it was possible, in preference to mere expressions of individual opinion. . . . The materials have been found abundant, bewilderingly so, as may be inferred from the fact that the contents of these volumes have been drawn from over two hundred different sources." We may say, what Mr. Mason's modesty prevents him saying for himself, that every reader will be astonished at the prodigious labor he must have expended in collecting these anecdotes, and that they are arranged with remarkable skill. The public thinks no fact, however minute, uninteresting if it reveals to it the personal traits of a man whose pen has contributed to its education or enjoyment. Mr. Mason recognizes this fact, and has been at infinite pains to find and verify any facts which serve to make our conception of these great men accurate and clear. The coming volumes will be looked for with eager interest. The price of each volume is $1.50, published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

MINING CAMPS:

A Study in American Frontier Government, by Charles Howard Shinn, conveys to its readers a new idea of frontier life. It deals with ancient, mediæval, and modern mining laws, and with the life of mining camps. As the local institutions of New England and Virginia, Georgia, and other States, the original settlers of which were English, had their origin in the institutions of the mother country, the impression is prevalent that the whole of our vast domain was peopled by men who derived their ideas of local government indirectly from the same source, the only medium of transition being that of the Atlantic States. Mr. Shinn shows that this idea is erroneous. He holds that "in the New West, beyond the rocky borders of Nebraska and the remote sources of the Missouri, American pioneers showed their hereditary fitness for self-government under trying conditions. . . .

In nine States and Territories, peopled by three million persons, mining property is still held by customs of tenure originated by the early placer and quartz miners of California." Mr. Shinn goes farther back still in his investigation, showing the identity in principle of these laws and customs with those of miners in other lands, in ancient Siberia, Midian, and, above all, in Cornwall and Thuringia. Many amusing incidents are related of frontier life as illustrations of the prevailing spirit in the camps and of the social customs of the early settlements. Pp. 316. Price, 2s. ECCLIOLOGY:

A Treatise on the Church and Kingdom of God on Earth, by Edward D. Morris, D.D., Professor of Systematic Theology in Lane Theological Seminary. This is a summary of the lectures delivered during seventeen years to the students of the seminary in which Professor Morris labors. In adapting his teaching to a wider circle, Dr. Morris aims to correct the prevalent belief among young Christians, that only in one of two alternatives can the true idea of the Church be found: either in the powerful organization of the Romish Church, or in the rationalistic conceptions of the Church as a purely human institution. Dr. Morris has evidently given considerable labor to the production of his book, and is sincere in his belief, as every good man is, though he may differ with others equally honest and intelligent. We can understand that many will read his book and agree with him up to a certain point, at which there will be a wide divergence, due to a difference in early education or in mental constitution. But even those who will not accept his conclusions may learn much from the researches he has made. Pp. 187. Price, $1.75. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons.

THE CITY OF KHARTOUM.

THE city of Khartoum, which has been the centre of interest for many months, is the capital city of the Soudan. Its population is only twenty-five thousand, but, being situated at the junction of the Blue and the White Nile, it has an immense floating population of merchants and travellers, who find it a convenient centre for commerce and an excellent place both to buy and to sell the commodities most in demand in that region. Its leading staples are ivory, gum arabic, ostrich feathers, senna, and castor-oil.

The present condition of the city was graphically described in a letter from General Gordon's companion in Khartoum, Colonel Stewart, who was treacherously murdered in a hut on the banks of the Nile, where he sought refuge after his steamer was wrecked while on an expedition undertaken at General Gordon's request. Colonel Stewart writes: "The town, as approached from the White River, presents a mass of dirty gray houses, overtopped by a single minaret, and in front a sterile, sandy plain, without trees or bushes. It is entered by a long, narrow street, stretching from west to east, and terminating in the market. This street is dirty in the extreme, and bordered by mud houses, whose doors are their only openings to the street. In other parts of the town there is no semblance of regularity; the houses are of all sizes and shapes, and the streets mere labyrinths. Here and there are open spaces, large enough for gardens, and even for cornfields. There are also numerous hollow flats, in which during the rainy season water collects and stagnates, rendering the place very unhealthy. The street above mentioned is the best in Khartoum; it contains the governor's residence and many spacious mansions, belonging to Turks, Copts, and Arabs. All the other houses are of a miserable description, consisting of sun-dried clay, cemented with cow-dung and slime. In the market-place is the mosque built of brick, and there, also, are the bazaar, coffee-houses, brandy-shops, etc. In addition to the buildings already mentioned there is a Coptic and a Roman Catholic chapel, a Roman Catholic school, an infirmary, a jail, and barracks.

The Governor's Palace, where Gordon resided during the siege, faces the river side opposite a point at which a quay gives easy access to the river steamers. It was from the roof of this building that Gordon was wont to reconnoitre the enemy's position, for, being situated on an elevation, a good view could be obtained thence of the surrounding country.

During the years which preceded Sir Samuel Baker's campaign, the trade of the city was seriously injured, owing to the disorganized condition of the country, and the population had been very seriously reduced in numbers. Upon the pacification of the country Khartoum regain'd some little of its former prosperity, and the Egyptian authorities were at no small pains to improve the town itself by completing the government buildings, organizing steam irrigation works, and initiating other useful measures. The population of Khartoum in its flourishing days was estimated at forty thousand, consisting of Turks, Jews, Greeks, Egyptians proper, Nubians, Abyssinians, Gallas, Negroes, and a few Italians, who principally carried on liquor and provision traffic.

BILL'S NEW BACKBONE.

THE sun was near its setting as an elderly man, bill-hook in hand, was clearing away the straggling branches of the hedge that surrounded his dwelling. He worked lazily and shiftlessly, as though he was tired out, and in the intervals of his labor his hand shook and quivered, partly through age and partly from dissipation, which had aged him before his time.

"Good-night, Bill," said a strong, manly voice near him, and looking up he saw a laborer who, with his pickaxe over his shoulder and his basket of tools at his back, was plodding homeward from his work at the adjacent railroad cutting near by. "You look wilted, Bill," continued the new-comer. "What's wrong? Drunk last night?"

"Well, Tom, the fact is, I did get a drop too much, and I ha'n't been good for anything all day. A night's sleep 'll put me all right, though."

"I hope it will, Bill. But say, ain't it about time you began to behave? You're gettin' on in years now. You'd ha' had a nice bit o' money to live on now if you'd got all the money you've spent in rum. How much a week do you spend that way?"

Bill removed his cap and scratched his grizzled head. "I can't rightly say, Tom," he answered, "but more'n I ought ter. I wish I'd never tasted it."

"I guess you do. But it's too late for wishing; the best thing is to stop it now. And you swear and carry on as if you expected to live forever. Why, you're running up an awful account yonder. You'll be pretty well cornered when you come to die."

"It's no use preaching to me, Tom. I'm a lost case, I am. Too old to change now. The devil's got me, and he'll hold on, I do expect, till he has me altogether."

"It'll be your own fault, then. You might get out of his clutches if you'd only the backbone of a mouse. Now, you go in and tidy yourself up a bit, and I'll come along in about half an hour and take you along with me to meeting; it'll do you good."

"No, Tom, I don't feel like it to-night. I'll come some other night, when I feel better."

"To-night's the night, Bill, and I want you to come. You've put off and put off till you've got no time to spare. Now, I'll be along, and mind you're ready. If you get religion it'll make a new man of you." So saying, Tom quickened his steps, and was soon out of sight. Bill stood hesitating a minute or two, half inclined to go off to the saloon and spend the evening there. He hated to come in contact with his neighbor. He was so weak that he felt like a child in his hands. In fact, his weakness was the cause of his trouble.

Punctual to his time Tom turned up at the poor cottage, and Bill was there waiting, but still reluctant, and trying to beg off. But Tom knew his man, and a few decisive words brought Bill out at his side, and the two trudged off together. It was just the kind of meeting to suit the old man. He was told that it was not too late to hope. That he could get moral strength, and how and where he could get it, and what was strangest to him, that he might be a Christian just as he was. Bill had always had the idea that he must reform and live a regular life for some time before he would be received. But now he learned that he must begin at the other end of the course. Conversion must come first, and the good life afterward. He was a little bewildered with the notion, but his friends got it into his head, and then Bill had hope. It struck him as extraordinary that Christ would accept a drunken loafer like him and receive him at once without reformation.

The meeting over, Bill went home thoughtful,

He had not been lectured, or abused, or threatened, but he had been encouraged. And it was encouragement Bill had needed. He did not require to be told he was a wreck and was going to perdition. The welcome news was that he could be saved. That was what Bill doubted. Even now he knew that with his own strength there was no hope, but he was promised almighty strength; that was what braced his heart. He slept heavily, but the next morning the thought of the meeting was present with him, and it seemed reasonable if it was true. He wished he could see Tom and talk with him. For the first time in many years the day passed without Bill visiting a saloon, and at night he was watching for Tom passing.

At last Tom came along, whistling cheerily, and spoke to his friend. He did not wait for an invitation; but said, "I'm coming in to see you presently, Bill. Can you stay home for me?"

"Yes," said Bill; "I thought mayhap you'd come. I want to hear more about what they were saying last night. I'm not clear I rightly understood. If it is as I think, there's a chance for me."

"A chance, to be sure there is. I'll be back in a few minutes." Tom went back and spent the evening with the poor, weak slave of Satan, pointing him the way to emancipation. And he succeeded. Before he left Bill joined in a prayer for strength, and promised for himself, in quaint words, that as the Lord was so good as to take him as he was, without character, and knowing all his bad ways, he would "never go back on Him" in heart. It was a long struggle that ensued, but eventually Bill's heart told him that he was a saved man through the mercy and love of his Saviour.

THE JEW'S WARD.

A SERIAL STORY.

Separated.

"You are a Jew, I believe," said the rector courteously, standing just within the door of the little shop, in which there was but bare standing-room.

"Yes," replied Matthias from his cobbler's bench, "I'm a Jew."

"And a young Christian girl is dwelling her under your roof," he went on, "and I presume under your guardianship. Is she any relation of yours?"

"No," he answered. "I'd give all I had in the world to make her one of our people, but she isn't. She's the grand-daughter of a man who once did me a great service, and his wife and Carol have lived in my attic for many a long year. Carol was born there, and she's never lived anywhere else. I suppose, as she isn't a Jew, she'd be called a Christian. All the folks about here are Christians."

He glanced out into the street with a look of contemptuous pity, and the rector sighed deeply as he also looked at the open vice and misery.

"Yes, the girl ought to get away from here," he said, "and I have thought of a school in the country that would exactly suit her case. It will be far away from her old haunts and companions. I understand she has some money that would meet the expense, or partly meet it?"

"Who says she has any money?" asked Matthias. "We're poor folks; just look round you, sir. Do we look like rich folks?"

"It was the girl herself who told me so," he answered. "She says her grandmother told her on her death-bed that there was nearly a pound a week for her, and that you took care of it and would pay it to her."

"Has she anything to prove it?" inquired Matthias, casting down his eyes, for he felt as if the cunning of this question bordered on dishonesty and falsehood.

"Not that I know of," answered the rector, who, in fact, had been very doubtful of the truth of Carol's statement.

"She has only the word of an old woman who drank all day long, and wasn't in her right senses," pursued Matthias. "She can't go to that school if she has no money, I suppose?"

"No," said the rector; "but I might get her a place as a servant."

"How much money would it take?" he asked.

"At least £40 a year," was the answer, "for it would not do for the girl to have any holidays and come back here. She would be quite unfitted for living here again."

"She would never come back," said Matthias, almost with a groan. "She'd never live here again, and I should see her no more, no more forever."

There was a profound sadness in the old man's tone and manner; but the rector was thinking too exclusively of Carol to notice him. Though if he had noticed him he was so much accustomed to think of all Jews as cunning and avaricious, that the sadness would only have aroused his suspicion that there was some money in the question.

"I must think it over," said Matthias finally, "and I'll send Carol to you when I've decided what I'll do."

It was a troubled day and sleepless night that the old Jew passed through after the rector's visit. Carol's fate seemed left in his hands. It was true that he had charge of a fund worth $7500, which Carol's grandfather had entrusted to him, and which was invested in Government bonds under his name. The circumstances under which it had been entrusted to him were suspicious ones. There had been a clever robbery effected in one of the Midland counties, and old John Fielding had been so far mixed up with it that it made it full of danger to invest such a sum in his own name, or in that of any of his family. Matthias Levi was well known to him, and was under some obligation to him, and so firm was his trust in the Jew's fidelity that he had placed the whole sum in his hands, and made him trustee of it as long as his wife lived. The trust had been faithfully discharged throughout the lifetime of Carol's grandmother, who was the only person acquainted with the circumstances. There was no bond or paper of any kind in existence; and the secret was now entirely in his own keeping.

All day long and through the night Matthias turned the question over and over in his bewildered and sorrowful mind. If the old grandmother had but lived a few years longer, till he had found a Jew to marry Carol! But now, should he let her go, she would certainly become one of the despised and doomed Christians, losing thereby any chance she may have had of becoming a Jewess. Might she not have gone whither Sarah, and Rebecca, and Rachel had gone? For Carol had never been baptized; but if she went among Christians they would baptize her, and she would be lost to him forever! That was the sting of it. To be lost forever! In this world and the next! All the bonds of morality taught in the ten commandments would be loosened in her, for were not the besetting sins of all the Christians Matthias had ever known drunkenness, blasphemy, and theft, and vice, such as made him shudder as he fancied Carol being plunged into it? No, he could not let her go among the Christians.

But then there came the conviction that he could not keep Carol if she chose to go. She had already outgrown her childhood; nay, many of her street companions had lost their girlhood, and had entered upon a hard and wretched womanhood. The strong, free spirit of the girl would not submit to his control. She would leave him if her mind was bent upon it, and go away into this terrible world of Christians, peniless and friendless, if he did not remain her friend. That would be too dreadful.

And if he took advantage of his secret, and withheld from her the money that was rightly her own, how could he himself lift up his head before the Judge, by whom actions are weighed? There was a passage in the Hebrew Bible, heard many long years ago, but as keenly in his memory as if he had listened to it only a few hours ago—"What doth God require of thee, O man, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" He had loved mercy, and walked humbly with his God; and now the temptation had come to do unjustly, was he to yield to it? Would it be doing justly to keep this money from Carol, even for a time? His one desire was for her good; he was not tempted to keep the money himself. It was hers; but the question that troubled him was how best to use it for her. It seemed that, in using it to send her to this school, it would be doing her harm.

When he had put up the heavy bar on his shop-door at night, as carefully as if he dwelt in some country where Jewish homes are assaulted and sacked by the mob, he went to his old desk, and from a secret drawer took out a worn and yellow paper, that was all he possessed to represent the sum of money invested in the Consols. There was no name on it but his own. He was a poor man; his love of mercy had stood in the way of his enriching himself. But these hundreds were indisputably his; no person in the whole world could question his claim to them. He did not really covet them. If Carol had remained with him he would have rejoiced that they were hers. But they would separate her from him altogether. To go to that school would unfit her for this place, so the Christian priest confessed. But if she went away penniless, as a servant, why, then his old house would be the home to which she would turn in any hour of difficulty or distress. Moreover, she would discover how cruel Christians were to friendless and penniless folks; and she would perhaps come back altogether, glad to find a refuge in the dwelling of one of God's own people. This last thought was one that sorely tempted him, and would not be driven away from his troubled mind.

He could not bring himself to speak to Carol till late the next day. It was the beginning of the Sabbath, which, now the summer was come, began at a late hour; and Carol came down out of her garret to light his lamp and prepare his evening meal. She was too careful to wear her heavy black dress in the house, and she was dressed in the shabby patched gown which had been her best before her grandmother died. Her face was pale and wistful, but there was a tranquillity and sweetness, a look of happiness in it such as he had never seen there before. He watched her in silence as she went softly about his room, his whole heart yearning in unspoken tenderness toward her. He felt almost as if she was dead, and he was mourning that he had not done all he could to make her life with him happier.

"Carol," he said, in a tremulous voice, "do you want to go away and leave me?"

"Oh, it's not that!" she answered, gently, with tears in her eyes, "but I want to learn all I can about my Lord. You know all about your Lord God, and you say your prayers to Him, and keep His Sabbath and His laws; and I want to do the same, and learn what my Lord would have me do."

"Who is your Lord?" he asked, in a voice more tremulous than before.

"The Lord Jesus Christ," she answered, in a low yet joyous tone.

The blow fell heavily. Already, then, she had been drawn away and enticed into the fatal worship of the Being whom Matthias had been taught to regard as an impostor! All his hopes withered, as if a hot east wind from the desert had suddenly beaten upon them, and scorched them. He closed his eyes, and saw his beloved one whirled away from him in a raging torrent of sin and misery. He had done his utmost to save her, and all had been in vain. An unutterable anguish took possession of the old man's soul, and he hid his face in his hands and groaned aloud; then he felt Carol's laid tenderly on his shoulder, and heard Carol's voice speaking softly in his ear.

"Oh, and He was a Jew like you!" she said, "only He was the Son of God—your God! and He came to save us all, not the Jews only. And the priests had Him crucified; and He was buried, and came to life again, and went up to heaven. I have read it all in a book. You never knew it, or you'd have told me, I know. For you thought your God didn't care for folks that were only English, and not Jews. But my book says, God loved the world, and sent His Son to save all the world. I'll run and fetch the book, and read it to you; for it's all in English, only I can't understand it all."

If any one had been pronouncing his sentence of death, Matthias could not have shuddered more to hear it than he shuddered at hearing these words from Carol's lips. They sounded to him like blasphemy, and they pierced through to his inmost soul. He lifted himself up from the seat into which he had fallen, and there was the terrible calm of despair in his face and voice as he looked steadily at her.

"My people say He is the accursed one!" he cried, loudly and sternly.

For a minute Carol gazed at the old Jew with an expression of amazement, which gradually changed into terror. It flashed across her mind that this was how many of the Jews had spoken of the Lord while He was among them. And Matthias was on their side. Matthias would have been among those who cried out, "Crucify Him! crucify Him!" There was an extreme bitterness at the thought. A torrent of tears came to her eyes, and she turned swiftly away to hide herself from this enemy of her Lord's, lest he should curse Him.

"Oh, I love Him who died for us!" she cried, as she left Matthias standing motionless, as if he had been turned into stone. "I love Him so as I could die for Him!"

There was no longer any question about the money with Matthias. Carol was already a Christian, and nothing he could do could save her from her doom. He told her the next day, without remonstrance or reproach, that she might go to the rector of St. Chad's and tell him he would allow her a sum worth four dollars a week till she was twenty-one, and then the money which stood in his name in the Government bonds should be transferred to her. Before the next Sabbath came Carol was gone, and he was alone.

Carol's new life was exactly the reverse of the old. At a boarding-school in the outskirts of a small country town, among girls who were the daughters of tradesmen and of small farmers, all the circumstances of daily life were utterly different. A fine network of rules and customs such as she had never dreamed of, encompassed her. The rector of St. Chad's, who had sent her there, had deemed it best not to say much of her former position, and had warned her not to talk of it herself. The school was well chosen; a good, homely place, where a plain and solid education was given, with no ludicrous attempts at gentility. Carol was not to waste time in acquiring a smattering of any accomplishment; but her voice was to be trained for singing, and she sang well.

She had never seen the interior of a church in London, and when she entered the long aisle of the parish church, with its arched roof resting upon polished columns, and saw the tinted light that shone through the painted windows, and heard the deep and solemn tone of the organ, her heart beat fast with delight.

"Why is it so beautiful?" she asked; "is it because they love Him so? That makes me very glad."

But it was the same when she saw a little chapel standing alone amid the fields. It was not so grand and beautiful a place as the church, but if they who built it built it for the sake of the Lord Jesus Christ, that too made her happy, and it was a pleasant place to enter.

By and by she began to understand many things about the life of Christ that she could not have learned for herself, and she could place the incidents of that life into more harmonious order; but there remained a freshness and power in it which those around her, too long accustomed to read it with wandering minds, did not share with her. Shades of doctrine, which her teachers saw only too keenly, were altogether imperceptible to her. She wished to obey the precepts of Christianity with a literalness and simplicity which perplexed and embarrassed them; and there was a strange directness and fervor about her love to Christ, which set her, as it seemed, almost at variance with those about her.

It is true that something of this freshness and vigor of feeling wore away as years passed by, and the story of Christ's life grew more familiar to her. But still she had made the discovery of Him for herself; and there was too deep a fund of joyousness in that discovery to allow her to fall into the listlessness of so many Christians. The sun had so shone in upon her darkness that she could never more love darkness rather than light.

As time went on, Carola scarcely cast a glance backward. She was of a nature that lived intently in the present, and this was so full of new interests and occupations that she seemed to have no time to recall the past. Moreover, there was nothing to link her with it. Matthias reckoned her as dead to him, and held no communication with her. He punctually paid the interest of her money to the rector of St. Chad's, exacting a receipt from the ladies who kept the school where Carola was; for he had no faith in a Christian, and especially in a Christian clergyman. But no message from him reached the girl; and though now and then, as she read in the Testament how the Jews denied their Lord, and persecuted Him, and at last crucified Him, a sad memory of Matthias, who would have done the same, crossed her mind, she willingly banished it, lest any feeling of personal hatred should mingle with her indignant sorrow at their crimes.

As for Matthias, his heart seemed to be dead within him; though he still sat at his cobbler's stall, and many a barefoot Christian child went away shod from his shop-door, with no more money dropped into his till. It was almost mechanically that he continued to do justly, and love mercy, and walk humbly with his God; there was no more a happy consciousness in him that he was doing so. Day after day he saw the never-ending flood of wretchedness and crime from which he had done his best to save Carola, as though he had stood upon the brink of a darksome pit, and knew that she was lost there though out of sight. Her garret was empty, for he would never let it to a stranger; and the Christian woman whom he was compelled to have to wait on him on the Sabbath, kept it clean and habitable, but he could not bring his mind to enter it. Sometimes during the long and dreary Sabbath hours he fancied he could hear the old grandmother and Carola talking overhead. But it was only a dream; and when he roused himself, how silent and empty was all his life!

A stealthy feeling of triumph moved his cold heart when he heard of the death of the rector who had stolen Carola away from him. Not that he expected to find her again; he did not even hope for it. She had become a Christian in spite of his precautions, and was lost to him. But his foe was dead, and could exult over him no longer. When Carola was twenty-one, he transferred the money in the Consols to her name, and felt as if the last interest that tied him to earth was gone.

PAUL VINDICATED.

S. S. Lesson for March 22. Acts 26: 19-32. Golden Text, ver. 31. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Verdict of Felix and Agrippa—Other Testimonies—Accused but Unconvicted—The Opportunities of Preaching to Distinguished Men—Looking above Instruments—The Meaning of God in Trial—The Appeal to Cæsar not a Mistake—A Safe Journey Secured.

"THIS man doeth nothing worthy of death or of bonds." Such was the joint testimony of Felix and Agrippa. The Pharisees at Jerusalem had said: "We find no evil in this man" (Acts 23: 9). Claudius Lysias, in writing of him to Felix, said: "Whom I perceived to be accused of questions of their [the Jews] law, but to have nothing laid to his charge worthy of death or of bonds" (Acts 23: 29). When standing before Festus, Paul said: "To the Jews have I done no wrong, as thou very well knowest. For if I be an offender, or have committed anything worthy of death, I refuse not to die; but if there be none of these things whereof these accuse me, no man may deliver me unto them; Festus could not gainsay him. Power both civil and ecclesiastical, the eloquence of Tertullian, the raging of a Jewish mob—all were brought against Paul in the attempts of the Jews to substantiate a charge against him. The machinations of men, repeated during more than two years, had left him as they found him,

ACCUSED BUT UNCONDEMNED.

Not one charge had been proved against him, and tribunals, civil and ecclesiastical, found him innocent. His conscience-stricken judges retired from the tribunal, abashed before their prisoner. Paul and Christianity seemed to have triumphed. But in the eyes of Paul it was Christ Himself who triumphed.

To him these things were no strange thing. "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you; but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that when His glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy" (1 Pet. 4: 12, 13). Paul had learned this lesson as well as Peter, and could say: "I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in distresses for Christ's sake; for when I am weak, then I am strong" (11 Cor. 12: 10). None but such as have a will entirely given up to God can be pleased with that which is unpleasant; but Paul saw that all his trials were in order that the power of Christ might rest upon him. Paul was more occupied with the glorious opportunities which God had given him of bearing His name before "Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel," than he was with his own sufferings and the injustice shown him.

The power of the Holy Ghost in Paul had been felt by every tribunal before which he had been brought, and none with unbiassed minds who had been present at any of his trials could fail to see his innocence, and at the same time the truth of the cause he served. The name of Christ was becoming known among men of note, and Paul knew well enough that God would make men talk about it. Two years later at Rome he wrote to the Philippians: "I would ye should understand, brethren, that the things which happened unto me have fallen out rather to the furtherance of the Gospel, so that my bonds in Christ are manifest in all the palace, and in all other places" (Phil. 1: 12, 13). Paul was

and all the talk ended in Christ; had he never been made a prisoner and taken to Cæsarea, he would probably never have been such a well-known character. Had the Jews never so maligned him, he would not have needed trial after trial. Had he never been taken to Rome, the Gospel might have spread among the poor, but the name of Christ would not have been so well known in high quarters. And at Rome his imprisonment resulted in a multiplication of witnesses to the truth of Christ. He writes: "And many of the brethren in the Lord, waxing confident by my bonds, are much more bold to speak the Word without fear." Such of his spiritual children as would have been sitting at his feet to learn had he been free to preach to them were now answering to the call of the Holy Ghost, and were themselves preaching the Gospel; and this rejoiced the heart of this veteran of the truth.

Paul, too, saw God's hand in much which seemed unfortunate. "Some preach Christ even of envy and strife; and some also of good will; the one preach Christ of contention; not sincerely, supposing to add affliction to my bonds." They knew not how the man they wished to afflict looked over their heads and took everything from the hand of God, who permitted it, and recognizing Him, ignored them in the transaction, and said: "What then? Notwithstanding every way, whether in pretence or in truth, Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice—yea, and will rejoice." A man who takes all things from the hand of God can find food for joy in that which is food for another man's sorrow. A fiery furnace in company with the Son of God was no unenviable experience. A den of lions with the presence of God within, shutting the lions' mouths, was not to be despised. Stoning itself, with heaven open and the Son of Man visibly standing on the right hand of God, how glorious!

We have yet

MUCH TO LEARN

of the real meaning of our God in trial. "Nothing shall by any means hurt you" (Luke 10: 19) was not meant to be a word of God's which the experience of every man should belie, but an actual experience of evil turned into good by the transforming power of our God. Paul saw that he was beaten at Philippi and put into prison and the stocks, in order that God might show His power in healing and delivering him. He did not know how he should be delivered, but only that deliverance was sure. He was stoned at Lystra that God might have the glory of raising him from the dead. He was allowed by God to be now condemned of the Jews that God might glorify Himself in putting the full acquittal of His child into the lips of all his judges. When we learn to run the race set before us, looking unto Jesus, our first word when distress, persecution, sickness, or temptation presents itself to us, will be one of praise for the certain victory which Jesus is about to gain. We cannot believe that Paul rested in his own innocence of the charges brought against him, for many an innocent man has been condemned. No; Paul rested in the fact that his cause was God's, and that God undertook for him. This left him so free to be His instrument in dealing with the hearts and consciences of his judges.

Agrippa said unto Festus, This man might have been set at liberty if he had not appealed unto Cæsar." But and so lost a glorious chance of resuming his missionary labors? By no means. God had already indicated His will that Paul should go to Rome, and his appeal to Cæsar was of God's ordering. Had he attempted the journey independently, it is more than probable that the Jews would have watched for and slain him. Thus God provided him with a safe escort. Again, had he entered Rome unknown he would not have been known as he was in Cæsar's palace. Festus was completely foiled in his attempt to constitute some charge against Paul, and he was remanded to appear before Cæsar, as much uncondemned as before. Thus God vindicates His children; thus He maintains their cause.

PRAY WITHOUT CEASING.

F. G. BROWNING.

Unanswered yet? The prayer your lips have pleaded in agony of heart these many years? Does faith begin to fail? Is hope waning? And think you all can run these falling rears? Say not the Father has not heard your prayer, You shall have your desire, sometime, somewhere!

Unanswered yet? Tho' when you first presented This one petition at the Father's throne, It seemed you could not wait the time of asking, So anxious was your heart to have it done: If years have passed since then, do not despair, For God will answer you sometime, somewhere.

Unanswered yet? But you are not unheeded; The promises of God forever stand; To Him our days and years alike are equal. Have faith in God! 'Tis in your Lord's command. Hold on to Jacob's angel, and your prayer Shall bring a blessing down sometime, somewhere.

Unanswered yet? Nay, do not say unanswered; Perhaps your part is not yet wholly done. The work began when first your prayer was uttered; And God will finish what He has begun. Keep income burning at the shrine of prayer, And glory shall descend, sometime, somewhere.

Unanswered yet? Faith cannot be unanswered; Her feet are firmly planted on the Rock. Amid the wildest storms she stands undaunted, Nor quails before the loudest howling of the wind. She knows Omnipotence has heard her prayer. And cries, "It shall be done," sometime, somewhere.

Fifty Years and Beyond; or OLD AGE AND HOW TO ENJOY IT.

A Book of Invaluable Value as well as Interest to all who have passed the Meridian of Life.

Compiled by Rev. S. G. LATHROP. INTRODUCTION BY REV. ARTHUR EDWARDS, D.D., Editor N. W. Christian Advocate.

The object of this volume is to give to that great army who are fast hastening toward the "great beyond" some practical hints and helps as to the best way to make the most of the remainder of the life that now is, and to give comfort and help as to the life that is to come.

"They are the writings of the most eminent men, living and dead. It is by no means a gloomy book, and can be read with excellent on every page."—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

"It is a tribute to the Christianity that honors the gray head and refuses to consider the oldish man a burden or an obstacle. The book will aid and comfort every reader."—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

"The selections are very precious. Springing from such numerous and pure fountains, they can but afford a refreshing and healing draught for every aged traveler to the great beyond."—Witness.

ONE of the most thrilling episodes of seafaring life is recalled to memory by the intelligence now cabled to America of the death of the Rev. George H. Nobbs, whose portrait appears this week on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Mr. Nobbs was eighty-five years of age when he died, and the last fifty-six years of his life had been devoted to arduous Christian work as teacher and preacher in the Pitcairn and Norfolk Islands. A glance at that work and at the circumstances which led to its commencement may be useful at a time when the enemies of the Bible are travelling through the country, decrying the Word of God as a false and powerless superstition. The history of Pitcairn alone proves that the Gospel is "the power of God unto salvation," and that the most reckless and desperate men are changed by its influence into men of gentle, peaceable, and loving disposition.

In the year 1767 Captain Philip Carteret, sailing in his sloop Swallow, on a voyage of discovery in the South Pacific Ocean, then a comparatively unexplored waste of waters between Asia and America, sighted land not marked on his chart. He realized that he had made the

which is now known as Pitcairn's Island. On the morning of the 2d of July a young sailor was at the masthead on the look-out, when he thought he descried a spot in the horizon, which, on approaching it next day, appeared like a great rock rising out of the sea. Its highest point was ten hundred and eight feet, so that it had been seen at a distance of fifteen leagues, or forty-five miles. It proved to be an island, four and a half miles in circumference, and covered with trees, and a small stream of fresh water was seen trickling down on one side of it.

"I would have landed there," says Captain Carteret, "but the surf, which at this season broke upon it with great violence, rendered it impossible. It is probable that in fine weather landing here may not only be practicable, but easy. The island appeared uninhabited. We saw a great number of sea-birds hovering round, at less than a mile from the shore, and the sea seemed full of fish. It lies in latitude 25° 4' south, and longitude 130° 8' west; as it had been discovered by a son of Major Pitcairn, of the marines, we called it, 'Pitcairn's Island.' In the neighborhood of this island the long rolling billows from the southward were larger and higher than any I had seen before."

The book which contained this description of Pitcairn happened to be on board a ship which left Spithead twenty years after this period, under the command of Captain Bligh, who had previously sailed with Captain Cook. The Bounty was ordered to the South Seas to transplant specimens of the breadfruit tree from Tahiti to the West Indian Islands. The ship, after an eventful voyage, reached Tahiti, and remained there twenty-three weeks, leaving it, at last, to the regret of many of the ship's crew.

Three weeks afterward, when off Tofoa, one of the Friendly Islands, the second officer, Lieutenant Fletcher Christian, a young man of talent and education, but of undisciplined temper, began to stir up his shipmates to rebellion. Captain Bligh's conduct had prepared the way for Christian's operations. He was tyrannical and unnecessarily harsh to his men. Not a few of them had suffered unjustly at his hands, and they were at length in the state of mind in which they were ready to brave the gallows, which was the penalty of their crime, rather than endure the oppression of the captain any longer. Christian found them ripe for action, and the plans were carefully arranged.

THE MUTINY.

took place at daybreak. Twenty-four of the ablest and bravest of the crew, acting under Christian, secured arms and seized the captain. Nineteen men were faithful to him, but were soon overpowered. Like Joseph's brethren, the mutineers could not make up their minds to kill their captain, but they placed him in a situation in which death was almost inevitable. He and his men were put on board a launch, supplied with one hundred and fifty pounds of bread, some pieces of pork, a little rum, and a hoghead of water, and sent adrift. At the last moment some merciful mutineer gave them a compass and quadrant. The situation of Captain Bligh and the boat's crew was indeed desperate. They were aware that there was no hope of relief for them till they could reach Timor, an island to the north of Australia, a distance of nearly four thousand miles; and after making an attempt to secure help from the treacherous and murderous natives of Tofoa—in which one of their number perished—through storm and starvation, yet putting their trust in God, with earnest prayer, they weathered the perils of the deep, and reached the coast of Timor alive, but in appearance like so many spectres, their bodies being nothing but skin and bone, their limbs full of sores, and clothed in rags.

At Coupang, the capital of Timor, the governor afforded them assistance; four of them died, however, soon afterward. Twelve reached England, where the news of the fearful deed of the mutineers was received with horror; and the government immediately sent the Pandora, a ship of war, into the South Seas to discover the Bounty, of which, however, no tidings could be obtained. The Pandora arrived at Tahiti, where they found fourteen of the mutineers, who peaceably surrendered. They were put on board, and the Pandora sailed for Australia. Off that coast she was wrecked. The crew suffered dreadful privations, and were, strange to say, also preserved and welcomed at Timor.

A CURIOUS COINCIDENCE.

was the fact that Lieutenant Thomas Hayward, who had been in the Bounty, and was cast into the launch with Bligh, and went out afterward in the Pandora, was once more adrift in an open boat, and found the same place of refuge, within the space of two years. Three of the mutineers on their return to England were executed, and the rest pardoned or acquitted.

Eleven persons, who at first sailed in the Bounty, are yet unaccounted for. It was, however, learned that the whole of went to Tahiti, though only fourteen were captured by the Pandora. Of the others who succeeded in eluding the search, two came to a violent death. Churchill, the ship's corporal, ingratiated himself with the natives, and became so popular that they made him a chief. His success aroused the jealousy of the others, one of whom, a seaman named Thompson, shot him, for which crime Thompson suffered death by stoning at the hands of the natives. The nine mutineers then held a council, the result of which was that they, with nineteen natives—men and women—sailed away from Tahiti. They were convinced by the visit of the Pandora that the island was not a safe place for them, and they went away to seek a more secure hiding-place. It was not until after twenty-five years had elapsed that any tidings of them were obtained.

It appears that Christian had read, while on board the Bounty, Captain Carteret's narrative of his discoveries, and recollecting it, determined to form

A SETTLEMENT ON PITCAIRN'S ISLAND.

He and a midshipman named Young were men of education; the other mutineers were sailors of the ordinary class. They found the island difficult of access, and as it was surrounded with coral reefs they thought it would afford them a safe asylum. After removing all their possessions, they set fire to the Bounty and burned her to ashes, in order to destroy the last link between them and their pursuers. They were thus cut off from escape, and were on the island for good or evil, without any other refuge.

A PANDEMONIUM.

The mutineers had fled from human vengeance, but they made for themselves a place of torment. The island where so long the forest boughs had waved in peaceful silence became the scene of wild strife and the unconstrained play of every evil passion; for its new tenants were "hateful and hating one another." The dusky children of Tahiti soon found that they had been enticed from their country only to serve as slaves, and revenge rankled in their breast against their tyrants. Christian fortified a dwelling for himself in the interior of the islet; but he could not be continually on the watch against treachery. In an unguarded moment he was attacked by the Tahitians and killed, with four of his white companions. The consequence was in which all the Tahitian men were killed. There were only four of the white sailors left, with the native women. One of these four discovered the means of making intoxicating liquor from the "ti" root, a plant growing on the island. It was an unhappy discovery, for intoxication was now added to their other dangers. One man soon after the discovery became wildly drunk on the "ti," fell into a state of frenzy, and, wandering to the edge of a precipice, fell over and broke his neck. A second was killed in dispute with the remaining two, and a year afterward—that is, in 1800, the third, Edward Young, died of asthma, Adams remaining the sole survivor of the fifteen men who landed at Pitcairn from the Bounty, all of whom, save Young, had died a violent death.

To Adams, the one survivor of the guilty band, God in His mercy showed and effected it through His Word! When Adams was a boy he had earned a scanty livelihood in London by going on errands. It does not appear that he had ever been to school; but while walking through the streets he had learned to read from the sign-boards, and the stray seed thus sown was to spring up thirty years afterward on the lonely rocks of Pitcairn. When the mutineers unloaded their stores from the Bounty, a few books were among their various possessions, which were soon thrown aside as useless, and forgotten. Adams, however, being deprived by death of all companionship except that of the Tahitian women, felt his loneliness, and became utterly dejected. One day, nearly ten years after the settlement at Pitcairn, he thought of the books, and sought for them. He found them, and was among them. This book was a Bible, and he opened it to read. His heart was heavy and wretched from all the misery he had survived; and he welcomed the book which he had heard was the Book of God, and began to read it diligently. He found there the consoling passage, "As I live, saith the Lord, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live." Over this passage he began to weep, and then again read: "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool. If ye be willing and obedient ye shall eat the good of the land." He went on reading, and at the foot of the cross of a dying Redeemer John Adams found pardon, and with no other teaching but that of the Book, applied by the Holy Spirit, the wicked old sailor became in Jesus Christ "a new creature."

After this a sense of new duties arose in his mind; a number of children were growing up in the island, without care or instruction. They had had nothing before them but an example of sin and crime, and were a wild race, uniting European vices with heathenish degradation; but now a new era dawned on Pitcairn. Adams looked around upon the young people in their ignorance, and realized that he was in a measure responsible for it; he would do all that in him lay to teach them the value of the book he had so long neglected. He began to pray for them and for himself, and this three times a day.

One morning, as he was sitting under a tree with his Bible on his knees, and considering how best to begin the work of instruction, came to receive his orders; he directed them to dig up a piece of ground, and plant it with yams, promising them a reward for their work. They remained standing before him as if they had something to request; one of them said, "You promise a reward; may we choose what it shall be?" To this Adams agreed. "We see you," said one of them, "constantly reading in that book, and you talk much of the good that is in it; will you teach us to read it too?"

TWO YOUTHS

This seemed an answer to his prayer, and in a few days not only the two young men, but all the community were learning to read.

THE BIBLE WAS THE LESSON BOOK, and so great was the awakening thirst for knowledge, that Adams was sorely put to it in his ignorance to answer questions. The island, which had been the scene of nothing but wickedness and sanguinary quarrels, was now to experience the influence of the Bible. Great was the change in every respect. All the blessings of civilization followed in the train of the holy book. Public worship was established, in which was used the Bible and a prayer-book likewise saved from the Bounty. The Sabbath was rigidly observed. The whole tone of morals was raised, order and cleanliness became the characteristics of the people, dwellings were improved, and the land was brought into better cultivation.

A quarter of a century had elapsed since the mutiny, and the affair had been nearly forgotten in England, when in 1814 two British men-of-war, cruising in the Pacific, reached Pitcairn's Island, and on nearing the shore saw plantations laid out in an orderly manner, and described neat dwellings. While they wondered at the sight a small boat pushed off, darted through the heavy surf, and approached the ship. She was rowed by two intelligent-looking young men, who called out in English, "Won't you heave us a rope now?" This being done, they sprang on deck. In answer to the question, "Who are you?" one of them announced himself as the son of Fletcher Christian. His mother was a Tahitian, and he was thus named because born on a Thursday in October. He was twenty-four years of age, fully six feet high, with a handsome open countenance. His companion was a fine youth of eighteen, the son of Midshipman Young. The demeanor of both excited universal admiration, when invited to breakfast at the officers' table. With folded hands and great simplicity they asked a blessing on the repast. They expressed great surprise at the sight of a cow on board, an animal they had never seen before, and were in doubt whether she was a great goat or a horned sow.

"THURSDAY OCTOBER CHRISTIAN,"

The captains of the Briton and the Blossom accompanied the young men on shore, and were met by John Adams, who had provided for them an excellent repast of eggs, fowl, yams, plantains, and breadfruit; from himself they learned all his wonderful story.

ADAMS DIED IN MARCH, 1829

at the age of sixty-five, having continued steadfast unto the end, and he has left a name that is cherished with filial reverence even beyond the borders of his tiny isle.

When he was on his death-bed his friends said to him, "How goes it now, John?" "Land ahead," he answered. Two or three days after they asked again, "How goes it now, John?" "Round the point of the harbor," was his reply. And on the day of his death the same question was put, "How goes it now, John?" He said, "Let go the anchor," and he fell asleep in Jesus. He had no teacher, no human helpers, nothing but the Word of God; and the Word of God proved to him the power of God in originating in him a godly life.

The first patriarch was succeeded by the teacher whose portrait is on the first page,

GEORGE HUNN NOBBS,

whom the whole community accepted, on his appointment by Adams himself, as their chief. He was at once their pastor, surgeon, schoolmaster, and poet. In early life he had a romantic and adventurous career. As a sailor he took part in the South American wars during the early part of the century, and while serving under the famous Lord Cochrane, gained the commendation of that distinguished naval commander for many of the exploits he performed. Often shipwrecked and taken captive, he had sometimes many narrow escapes from death. At length he abandoned the sea and went to Pitcairn, where, settling among the islanders and becoming their teacher in 1828, he married a granddaughter of Lieutenant Christian, of the Bounty, and accompanied the community in its migration to Tahiti and subsequently to Norfolk Island, whence they afterward returned to Pitcairn. Some years after he went to Pitcairn Admiral Fairfax Moresby visited the island, and procured him a passage to England, where he was

ORDAINED BY DR. BLOMFIELD,

Bishop of London, and the Bishop of Sierra Leone, in 1852. Having afterward been admitted to an interview with Queen Victoria and Prince Albert, who gave him their portraits (and, it may be hoped, something more useful to him), the Rev. G. H. Nobbs returned home in December, sailing for Valparaiso, whence he was conveyed to Pitcairn in the spring of 1853. From that time Mr. Nobbs faithfully labored in his chosen sphere, and gained the love and esteem of all the islanders, numbering about one hundred persons, by whom his death is deeply regretted.

H.M.S. Opal, Captain F. C. B. Robinson, visited Pitcairn Island on the 2d of July, 1879, on her way to Valparaiso to convey from San Francisco an organ presented to the inhabitants by Her Majesty the Queen. The Opal remained at anchor off Bounty Bay till 8 P.M. the following day. During this time the ship was visited by nearly the whole of the little community. Many of them, to their great delight and astonishment, were photographed by an officer on board.

THE SIX SMALL PORTRAITS

on our front page were among those taken. They are those of Mrs. Young, Mary Warren, Mr. J. Russell McCoy, magistrate and chief ruler of the island, in the group on the left of Mr. Nobbs's portrait and Miss Young, organist of the island, Moses Young, who is now the oldest man in the island, and Queen Te-haa-Papa, of Huahine, Society Islands, on the right. Captain Robinson bore testimony to the "simple piety and moral excellence of these charming islanders, whose guilelessness and affectionate hospitality won all hearts." He supplied them with some cotton seeds, as the cotton they then raised was of poor quality. They also manufacture excellent arrowroot, but find it difficult to exchange it, as passing ships generally want fruit and vegetables.

COLONEL BURNABY IN ASIA MINOR.

DURING Col. Burnaby's journey in Asia Minor he held many conversations with the natives. The following are among the most interesting:

A TURK'S QUESTIONS

about Christian sincerity, in the course of a conversation which occurred at Bagazid, will show how a traveller from a Christian country is sometimes embarrassed by the observations of Mohammedan critics.

"Efendi," said the Turk, addressing Colonel Burnaby, "Europeans, from what I could learn, do not pray much."

"Not pray!" I observed; "what do you mean?"

"No, Efendi; the men, I have been told, go to the churches to look at the women; the women, some to pray, but others to look at the men and show off their fine clothes the one to the other. Is not that the case in your country?" he added.

"No. Of course there are exceptions; but the English people as a rule are religiously inclined."

"Efendi," continued the officer, "I have often heard Frenchmen say that a Christian ought to be a poor man—that is, if he carried out the doctrines of his Prophet. But my friends used to laugh and declare that their bishops and priests were rich men, and that some of the Protestant Mollahs were so wealthy that they could afford to keep carriages, eat mutton every day, and have servants to wait upon them."

"The fact of our bishops and priests eating mutton or keeping carriages does not make the Protestant religion the less true," I now observed.

"I do not know that," replied the Turk. "If I were to be taught a religion by a man who did not believe in it himself, or who did not carry out its doctrines, I should think that I was wasting my time."

THE CHRISTIAN SECTS

are a great puzzle to the Mohammedans. At one of the colonel's stopping-places the following conversation occurred:

"We must educate the people," said the Turk, "and teach both Christians and the Mohammedans that a difference of opinion on religious matters is not a subject about which men should quarrel. I tell you what it is," he continued, "I believe that in another hundred years there will be either no religion at all, or else that every religion will be merged into one creed."

"The Christian," I observed.

"Who knows?" continued my host. "We live in strange times; even we Turks, the more particularly those who live in Constantinople, begin to argue about such matters. However, there is one thing I cannot understand about you Christians—you appear to me to have so many roads to heaven. For instance, in Anatolia there are American Protestant missionaries, Italian Catholic missionaries, and then there are the Armenians, who profess the Armenian faith."

"Well," I remarked, "what of it?"

"Wait a moment," said my host. "An Armenian, who is of the Armenian faith, is half way up his staircase to heaven. An American missionary calls after him, 'Where are you going?' 'I am going to heaven.' 'No, you are not; that is not the road to heaven. You are going in the wrong direction. Come down immediately, and I will show you the way.' The Armenian descends the steps, and begins ascending the road the missionary points out to him. Presently another voice is heard. It comes from the mouth of an Italian missionary. 'Where are you going?' 'I am going to heaven.' 'No, you are not; come down immediately. You are on the road to hell.' The result is," continued Suleiman, "that the poor Armenian does not know which way to turn. He is perpetually going up or coming down the steps, and he never reaches his destination."

WOMAN'S RIGHTS.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.*

"There are three score queens."—SOLOMON'S SONG 6: 8.

Graces that Give Coronation—Her Inalienable Rights—I. The Right of Blessing the Sick—Horror of Illness away from Home—A Wife's Fruitless Journey to the West—Women in the War—II. The Right to Care for the Poor—Helen Chalmers in the Scotch Slums—Soliciting Charities—III. Right to Comfort in Disaster—IV. Right to Bring to Man the Kingdom of Heaven—The Greatest Sermons—A Drunken Husband's Bet—A Haunted Sailor—An Immortal Marriage—V. To Reach Heaven—The Crown in Preparation.

So Solomon, by one stroke, sets forth the imperial character of a true Christian woman. She is not a slave, not a hireling, not a subordinate, not a queen; and in my text Solomon sees sixty of these helping to make up the royal pageant of Jesus. Crown and courtly attendants and imperial wardrobe are not necessary to make a queen, but graces of the heart and life will give coronation to any woman. Woman's position is higher in the world than man's, and although she has often been denied the right of suffrage, she always does vote, and always will vote, by her influence, and her chief desire ought to be that she should have grace rightly to rule in the dominion which she has already won. My chief anxiety is not that that women have other rights accorded her, but that she by the grace of God rise up to the appreciation of the glorious rights she already possesses. I shall enumerate some of those rights this morning.

I. In the first place, woman has the special and superlative right of blessing and COMFORTING THE SICK.

What land, what street, what house has not felt the smittings of disease? Tens of thousands of sick-beds! What shall we do with them? Shall man, with his rough hand and heavy foot and impatient bearing, minister? No. He cannot soothe the pain. He cannot quiet the nerves. He knows not where to set the light. His hand is not steady enough to pour out the drops. He is not wakeful enough to be watcher. The Lord God, who sent Miss Dix into the Virginia hospitals, and Florence Nightingale into the Crimea, and the Maid of Saragossa to appease the wounds of the battle-field, has equipped wife, mother, and daughter for this delicate but tremendous mission.

You have known men who despised woman, but the moment disease fell upon them, they did not send for their friends at the bank, or their partner in business, or their worldly associates. Their first cry was, "Take me to my wife." The dissipated young man at the college scoffs at the idea of being under home influences, but at the first blast of the typhoid fever on his cheek he says,

"WHERE IS MOTHER?"

I think one of the most pathetic passages in all the Bible is the description of the lad who went out to the harvest-field of Shunem and got sun-struck, throwing his hands on his temples and crying out, "Oh my head! my head!" and they said, "Carry him to his mother." And then the record is, "He sat on her knees till noon, and then died." It is an awful thing to be ill away from home in a strange hotel, once in a while men coming into look at you, holding their hand over their mouth for fear they will catch the contagion. How roughly they turn you in the bed! How loudly they talk! How you long for the ministrations of home!

I knew one such who went away from one of the brightest of homes for several weeks' business absence at the West. A telegram came at midnight that he was on his death-bed, far away from home. By express train the wife and daughters went westward; but they went too late. He feared not to die; but he was in an agony to live until his family got there. He tried to bribe the doctor to make him live a little while longer. He said, "I am willing to die, but not alone." But the pulses fluttered, the eyes closed, and the heart stopped. The express trains met in the midnight—wife and daughters going westward, lifeless remains of husband and father coming eastward. Oh, it was a sad, pitiful, overwhelming spectacle. When we are sick we want to be sick at home. When the time comes for us to die.

WE WANT TO DIE AT HOME.

The room may be very humble, and the faces that look into ours may be very plain; but who cares for that? Loving hands to bathe the temples; loving voices to speak good cheer; loving lips to read the comforting promises of Jesus. In the war men cast the canon; men fashioned the musketry; men cried to the hosts, "Forward, march!" men hurled their battalions on the sharp edges of the enemy, crying, "Charge! charge!" but woman scraped the lint; woman administered the cordials; woman watched by the dying couch; woman wrote the last message to the home circle; woman wept at the solitary burial, attended by herself and four men with a spade. We greeted the generals home with brass bands and triumphal arches and wild huzzas; but the story is too good to be written anywhere, save in of Mrs. Brady, who came down among the sick in the swamps of the Chickahominy; of Annie Ross in the cooper-shop hospital; of Margaret Breckinridge, who came to men who had bled for weeks with their wounds undressed, some of them frozen to the ground, and when she turned them over, those who had an arm left waved it, and filled the air with their "hurrah!"—of Mrs. Hodge, who came from Chicago with blankets and with pillows, until the men shouted, "Three cheers for the Christian Commission! God bless the women at home!" then sitting down to take the last message, "Tell my wife not to fret about me, but to meet me in heaven; tell her to train up the boys whom we have loved so well; tell her we shall meet again in the good land; tell her to bear my loss like the Christian wife of a Christian soldier;" and of Mrs. Shelton, into whose face the convalescent soldier looked and said, "Your grapes and cologne cured me."

Men did their work with shot, and shell, and carbine, and howitzer; with socks, and slippers, and bandages, and warm drinks, and Scripture texts, and gentle strokings of the hot temples, and stories of that land where they never have any pain. Men knelt down over the wounded and said, "On which side did you fight?" Women knelt down over the wounded and said, "Where are you hurt? What nice thing can I make for you to eat? What makes you cry?" To-night, while we men are sound asleep in our beds, there will be a light in yonder loft; there will be groaning down that dark alley; there will be cries of distress in that cellar. Men will sleep, and women will watch.

WOMEN DID THEIR WORK

II. Again, woman has a superlative right to take CARE OF THE POOR.

There are hundreds and thousands of them in all our cities. There is a kind of work that men cannot do for the poor. Here comes a group of little barefoot children to the door of the Dorcas Society. They need to be clothed and provided for. Which of these directors of banks would know how many yards it would take to make that little girl a dress? Which of these masculine hands could fit a hat to that little girl's head? Which of the wise men would know how to tie on that new pair of shoes? Man sometimes gives his charity in a rough way, and it falls like the fruit of a tree in the East, which fruit comes down so heavily that it breaks the skull of the man who is trying to gather it. But woman glides so soft into the house of destitution, and finds out all the sorrows of the place, and puts so quietly her donation on the table, that all the family come out on the front steps as she departs, expecting that from under her shawl she will thrust out two wings and go right up toward heaven, from whence she seems to have come down.

O Christian young woman, if you would make yourself happy and win the blessing of Christ, go out

AMONG THE DESTITUTE!

A loaf of bread or a bundle of socks may make a homely load to carry; but the angels of God will come out to watch, and the Lord Almighty will give His messenger hosts a charge, saying "Look after that woman; canopy her with your wings and shelter her from all harm;" and while you are seated in the house of destitution and suffering, the little ones around the room will whisper, "Who is she? Ain't she beautiful?" and if you will listen right sharply, you will hear dripping down through the leaky roof and rolling over the rotten stairs, the angelic chant that shook Bethlehem, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will to men."

Can you tell me why a Christian woman, going down among on a Christian errand, never meets with any indignity? I stood in the chapel of Helen Chalmers, the daughter of the celebrated Dr. Chalmers, in the most abandoned part of the city of Edinburgh; and I said to her, as I looked around upon the fearful surroundings of that place, "Do you come here nights to hold a service?" "Oh yes," she said, "I take my lantern and I go through all these haunts of sin, the darkest and the worst; and I ask all the men and women to come to the chapel, and then I sing for them, and I pray for them, and I talk to them," she said, "Can it be possible that you never meet with an insult while performing this Christian errand?" "Never," she said, never.

That young woman who has her father by her side walking down the street, and an armed police at each corner, is not so well defended as that Christian woman who goes forth on gospel work into the haunts of iniquity, carrying Bibles and bread. Some one said, "I dislike very much to see that Christian woman teaching those bad boys

IN THE MISSION SCHOOL.

I am afraid to have her instruct them." "So," said another man, "I am afraid too." Said the first: "I am afraid they will use vile language before they leave the place." "Ah!" said the other man, "I am not afraid of that. What I am afraid of is that if any of those boys should use a bad word in that presence, the other boys would tear him to pieces and kill him on the spot."

SOLICITATION OF CHARITIES.

Backed up by barrels in which there is no flour, and by stoves in which there is no fire, and by wardrobes in which there are no clothes, a woman is irresistible; passing on her errand, God says to her, "You go into that bank, or store, or shop, and get the money." She goes in and gets it. The man is hard-fisted, but she gets it. She could not help but get it. It is decreed from eternity she should get it. No need of your turning your back and pretending you don't hear; you do hear. There is no need of your saying you are begged to death. There is no need of your wasting your time, and you might as well submit first as last. You had better fight away take down your cheque-book mark the number of the cheque, fill up the blank, sign your name, and hand it to her.

There is no need of wasting time. Those poor children on the back street have been hungry long enough. That sick man must have some farina. That consumptive must have something to ease his cough. I meet this delegate of a relief society coming out of the store of such a hard-fisted man, and I say, "Did you get the oney?" "Of course," she says, "I got the money; that's what I went for. The Lord told me to go in and get it, and He never sends me in a fool's errand."

III. Again, I have to tell you that it is woman's specific nder the stress of dire disaster. She is called the weaker vessel; but all profane, as well as sacred history attests that, when the crisis comes, she is better prepared than man to meet the emergency. How often you have seen a woman who seemed to be a disciple of frivolity and indolence, who, under one stroke of calamity, changed to a heroine. Oh, what a great mistake those business men make who never tell their business troubles to their wives! There comes some great loss to their store, or some of their companions in business play them a sad trick, and they carry the burden all alone. He is asked in the household, again and again, "What is the matter?" but he believes it a sort of Christian duty to keep all that trouble within his own soul. Oh sir, your first duty was to ll about it. She perhaps might have disentangled your finances or extended your credit, or she would have helped you to bear misfortune. You have no right to carry on one'soulder that which is intended for two.

There are business men here who know what mean. There came a crisis in your affairs, you struggled bravely and long; but after a while there came a day when you said, "Here I will have to stop," and you called in your attorneys, and you called in the most prominent men in your employ, and you said, "We have got to stop." You left the store suddenly. You could hardly make up your mind to pass through the street and over on the ferry-boat. You felt everybody would be looking at you, and blaming you, and denouncing you.

You hastened home. You told your wife all about the affair. What did she say? Did she say the butterfly? Did she talk about the silks and the ribbons and the fashions? No. She came up to the emergency. She quailed under the stroke. She helped you begin to get an right away. She offered to go out of the comfortable house into a smaller one, and wear the old cloak another winter. She was one who understood your affairs without blaming you, she looked upon what you thought was a thin, weak woman's arm holding you up; but while she looked at that arm, there came into the eble muscles of it the strength of the eternal od. No chiding. No fretting. No telling you about the beautiful house of her father, from which you brought her ten, twenty, or thirty ars ago. You said, "Well, this is the happiest day of my life. I am glad I have got under my burden. My wife don't care—I don't care."

At the moment you were utterly exhausted, od sent a Deborah to meet the host of the maleficks, and scatter them like chaff over the plain. There are sometimes women who sit adding sentimental novels, and who wish that they had some grand field in which to display their Christian powers. Oh, what grand and glorious things they could do if they only had opportunity! My sister, you need not wait any such time. A crisis will come in your affairs. There will be a Thermopylae in your own household, where God will tell you to and there. There are scores and hundreds of households in this city to-day where as much bravery and courage are demanded of women as was exhibited by Grace Darling, or Marie Antoinette, or Joan of Arc.

IV. Again, I remark, it is woman's right to heaven. It is easier for a woman to be a Christian than for a man. Why? You say she is weaker. No. Her heart is more responsive to the pleadings of divine love. She is inist majority. The fact that she can more easily become a Christian I prove by the statement that three fourths of the members of the churches in all Christendom are women. So God appoints them to be the chief agencies for bringing this world back to God.

THE GREATEST SERMONS

are not preached on celebrated platforms; they are preached with an audience of two or three, and in private home life. A consistent, consecrated Christian service is an unanswerable demonstration of God's truth.

A group of rough men were assembled at a tavern one night. It came on toward morning—one or two o'clock. One man boasted that it did not make any difference what time he went home, his wife cheerfully opened the door, and provided an entertainment if he was hungry when he got home. So they laid a wager. They said, "Now, we'll go along with you. So much shall be wagered. We'll bet so much that when you go home and make such a demand she will resist it." So they went along at two or three o'clock in the morning and knocked at the door. The door opened, and the man said to his wife, "Get us a supper." She said, "What shall I get?" He selected the articles of food. Very cheerfully were they provided, and about three or four o'clock in the morning they sat down at the table—the most cheerful one in all that presence the Christian wife—when the man, the ruffian, the villain who had demanded all this, broke into tears, and said, "I can't stand this. Oh, what a wretch I am!" He disbanded that group. He knelt down with his Christian wife and asked her to pray for the salvation of his immortal soul, and before the morning dawned they were united in the faith and hope of the Gospel.

A patient, loving, Christian demeanor in the presence of transgression, in the presence of hardness, in the presence of obduracy and crime, is an argument from the throne of the Lord Almighty, and blessed is that woman who can wield such an argument. A sailor came slipping down the ratline one night, as though something had happened, and the sailors cried, "What's the matter?" He said, haunt me like a ghost." Home influences, consecrated Christian home influences, are the mightiest of all influences upon the soul. There are men here to-day who have maintained their integrity, not because they were any better naturally than some other people, but because there were home influences praying for them all the time. They got a good start. They were launched on the world with the benedictions of a Christian mother. They may track Siberian snows, they may plunge into African jungles, they may fly to the earth's end, they cannot go so far and so fast but the prayers will keep up with them.

"MY MOTHER'S PRAYERS

I stand before women this morning who have the eternal salvation of their husbands in their right hand. On the marriage-day you took an oath before men and angels that you would be faithful and kind until death did you part, and I believe you are going to keep that oath; but after that parting at the door of the grave, will it be an eternal separation? Is there any such thing as making the flowers that grow on the top of the sepulchre brighter than the garlands which at the marriage banquet flooded the air with aroma? Yes; I stand here as a priest of the most high God to proclaim the banns of an immortal union for all those who join hands in the grace of Christ. O woman, is your husband, your father, your son away from God? The Lord demands their redemption at your hands. There are prayers for you to offer, there are exhortations for you to give, there are examples for you to imitate; and I say now, this morning, as Paul said to the Corinthian woman, "What knowest thou, O woman, but thou canst save thy husband?"

A man was dying, and he said to his wife, "Rebecca, you wouldn't let me have family prayers, and you laughed about all that, and you got me away into worldliness; and now I am, going to die, and my fate is sealed, and you are

THE CAUSE OF MY RUIN!"

O woman, what knowest thou but thou canst destroy thy husband? Are there not some here who have kindly influences at home—are there not some here who have wandered far away from God, who can remember the Christian influences in their early home? Do not despise those influences, my brother. If you die without Christ, what will you do with your mother's prayers, with your wife's importunities, with your sister's entreaties? What will you do with the letters they used to write to you, with the memory of those days when they attended you so kindly in times of sickness? Oh, if there be just one strand holding you from floating off on that dark sea, I would just like, this morning, to take hold of that strand and pull you to the beach. For the sake of your wife's God, for the sake of your mother's God, for the sake of your daughter's God, for the sake of your sister's God, come this day and be saved.

V. Lastly, I wish to say that one of the specific rights of women is, through the grace of Christ, finally

TO REACH HEAVEN.

Oh, what a multitude of women in heaven! Mary, Christ's mother, in heaven; Elizabeth Fry in heaven; Charlotte Elizabeth in heaven; the mother of Augustine in heaven; the Countess of Huntingdon—who sold her splendid jewels to build chapels—in heaven; while a great many others, who have never been heard of on earth, or known but little, have gone into the rest and peace of heaven. What a rest! What a change it was from the small room, with no fire and one window, the glass broken out, and the aching side and worn-out eyes, to the "house of many mansions"! No more stitching until twelve o'clock at night, no more thrusting of the thumb by the employer through the work to show it was not done quite right. Plenty of bread at last. Heaven for aching heads. Heaven for broken hearts. Heaven for anguish-bitten frames. No more sitting up until midnight for the coming of staggering steps. No more sharp blows across the temples. No more sharp, keen, bitter curse.

Some of you will have no rest in this world. It will be toil and struggle and suffering all the way up. You will have to stand at your door fighting back the wolf with your own hand red with carnage. But God has

A CROWN FOR YOU.

I want to realize, this morning, that He is now making it, and whenever you weep a tear He sets another gem in that crown, whenever you have a pang of body or soul He puts another gem in that crown, until, after a while, in all the tiera there will be no room for another splendor, and God will say to His angel, "The crown is done; let her up that she may wear it." And as the Lord of Righteousness puts the crown upon your brow, angel will cry to angel, "Who is she?" and Christ will say, "I will tell you who she is. She is the one that came up out of great tribulation, and had her robe washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb."

A BANQUET.

And then God will spread a banquet, and He will invite all the principalities of heaven to sit at the feast; and the tables will blush with the best clusters from the vineyards of God, and crimson with the twelve manner of fruits from the Tree of Life; and water from the fountains of the rock will flash from the golden tankards; and the old harpers of heaven will sit there making music with their harps; and Christ will point you out amid the celebrities of heaven, saying, "She suffered with me on earth, now we are going to be glorified together." And the banqueters, no longer able to hold their peace, will break forth with congratulation, "Hail! hail!" And there will be hand-writings on the wall—not such as struck the Persian noblemen with horror, but fire-tipped fingers writing in blazing capitals of light and love and victory: "God hath wiped away all tears from all faces!"

A RECLAIMED INEBRIATES' MEETING.

THE Mizpah Bands established by Mr. Moody across the Atlantic are still thriving and doing a great work. At one of the recent meetings of the first band he organized, the following testimonies were given:

The first witness was William Begg—a fine, open-faced, manly-looking fellow, wearing the "bit of blue." He had been more than once round the world, he said. Although a Scotchman from the land of Bibles, he had spent many a Sabbath stripped to the waist in the prize-fighters' ring. "I have been," he said, "a hard drinker, but God had other work for me, and, in answer to the prayers of my dear mother and sisters, I was led to the feet of the Saviour under Mr. Moody's preaching. My conversion was a hard fight. It seemed as if all the legions of hell opposed me, when my mother's last words, 'WILLIE, MEET ME IN HEAVEN,' decided me to cast in my lot with God's people. I have been rescued from the power of drink and attendant evils, and, thank God, sufficient health and strength have been left me to work for Him while journeying to a home over there."

Daniel Taylor modestly told how the forgiving look on the loving face of the Crucified One had flashed into his darkened soul the light of life after six weeks of agonizing doubt. To him the personality of the evil was real. The fear took possession of him that

HIS LAST HOUR HAD COME; and his life of drinking and gambling and open sin was used by the arch-foe to prevent him seeking the Saviour. He had become convinced of sin and judgment to come, and could neither work nor sleep. He found salvation at the close of the meeting, when one seemed to say to him, "Your last chance has come." Regardless of those around him, he cried in his bitter agony, "O God, save my soul! and I beheld, as it seemed to me," he stated, "the Lord Jesus Himself rescuing me from the grasp of the wicked one." He again gave way to drink, and again besought God, and more earnestly, to rescue him from its power, and it now ceases to trouble him.

That the way of transgressors is hard was the experience of Mr. Graham. He had been a backslider. Drink was the cause of his fall. Nearly seven years had elapsed since his "restoration"; but the remembrance of those days of backsliding was still sharp in the memory. He had been employed by a firm of rectifiers in Glasgow, and contracted a liking for alcoholic liquors. On one occasion he was carried

"DEAD DRUNK" TO THE POLICE OFFICE at Cranstonhill. Affliction in his family brought him to serious thought. He sought a quiet spot, fell on his knees, and pleaded with God for strength to conquer his enemy. He received it. "And from that moment to now," his testimony was, "I have never had any desire for strong drink."

"I began to take an occasional glass when I was twenty," was the quiet, conversational way in which Mr. Stewart responded to the call of the president, "and had any one told me I would become a slave to strong drink I would have said, 'I can take it or I can want it.' Don't believe it, dear friends. It will come to be that you will take it when you can get it, and want it when you can't. This was my experience. I became its willing slave. My Saturday's pay had barely reached the bottom of my pocket when I was seized with an overpowering longing to visit my friend the publican. Once my carousal lasted from Saturday till Thursday. My wife and children had fled and

BLOOD STAINED THE FLOOR.

"O my God!" I cried, 'have I laid my hands on my wife or little ones? save me from this crime, and I shall never drink again.' He did save me. The blood was from my own head. At last the light came through Deut. 33:27. My mates said, 'He'll soon be in the mud again,' but God has kept me. I have travelled thousands of miles in India and elsewhere, and have been enabled to declare what God has done for my soul."

Tom Bamford said he had read a number of infidel books, and had been driven from safe moorings. His heart had become dead to pure and higher thoughts. His mother was dying. His sister telegraphed: "My brother, come home; mother is dying." He stood by her bedside. "Tom," she said, "I shall meet you in heaven." "With God's help I will," he replied. The kind look and word of a true Mizpah man brought him to the feet of the Master; and by the grace of God he would meet his sainted mother in glory.

The testimony of Mr. Clyde, Superintendent of the band, was very touching. Under the guidance of the late Rev. James Scott he was led, while reading on his knees 1 Pet. 4:19, to see in Jesus one who now for sixteen years had been to him a living, loving, personal Saviour.

MR. JOSEPH COOK ON PROHIBITION.

IN the course of his prelude to a recent lecture, Mr. Cook said: Several States have now provided by law for scientific temperance education in their schools, as the result of a movement led by Mrs. Hunt, of Massachusetts. The question is soon to be submitted to our Legislature. (A resolution in favor of the measure was here put to vote, and nearly the whole audience rose to express their approval.) Mr. Cook, continuing, said, the liquor traffic is now ascending the throne of American politics. Cotton was king, or soon will be, if things continue as they are. Municipal misrule is the most critical question in our country, and intemperance is its longest root. The rum oligarchy is strong, and its insolence will lead to its overthrow. Is a new political party needed to oppose this evil? (Voices, yes and no.) These opposing voices remind me that I am walking among hot ploughshares; but, while I am responsible to no one, there are some stepping-stones upon which I am willing to trust my feet, though I shall not blame you if you do not do so. I am not one of those who are sore over the results of the last election. I was unable to take part in it, as I was in the "woods where rolls the Oregon" at the time.

WHISKEY IS KING,

There are now three leading methods of temperance work: (1) The Law and Order League; (2) non-partisan efforts to secure constitutional prohibition; (3) efforts to secure constitutional prohibition through a new party. Before the last election I was in favor of the second plan, but since both of the leading parties have bowed down to kiss the robes of the Moloch of the rum power, I am forced to accept the third. I have in favor of a new party, among which are these: each party has refused to submit the question of constitutional prohibition to the people in most of the States; after the measure has been passed by the people, neither party can be trusted to carry it out, as is seen in Ohio and some other States; cities are growing faster than the country, and municipal misrule is making reform increasingly difficult; a new organization, known as the National Reform Party, should include all other reform issues, and might thus come to have a balance of power, or supersede one of the old parties; when several States have passed the measure, they can call upon the national Government to do to suppress intemperance, such as forbidding the sale of liquor in the District of Columbia and the Territories; Canada, England, and the Catholic Church are active in the matter; at the meeting of the W. C. T. U., in St. Louis, the leader of the opposition did not give a satisfactory answer—it was like that of one who claimed she had never needed male assistance, but, when reminded of it after being saved from drowning by a man, answered, "You hush!" A third party has been formed, and is not likely to be given up; many reasons for the defeat of the Republican ticket have been given, but it may have been the prohibitory vote in New York; the formation of the party may have been premature, but would it be premature now? Nothing is more feared by the rum power than such a party. The insolence of the Moloch is increasing, and, if municipal misrule shall continue, it will result in anarchy. The more I study the situation, the more I fear a barricade war in our streets. Let us have

THE THINGS IN ITS POWER

Mental suasion for the man who thinks,
Moral suasion for the man who drinks,
Legal suasion for the drunkard maker,
Prison suasion for the statute breaker.

THE DESTINY OF THE JEWS.

A Lecture by Rev. Dr. H. Pereira Mendes, Rabbi of the Nineteenth Street Synagogue, New York.

The Design of Trial and Deliverance—Is the Destiny of the Jews Accomplished?—America not the Promised Land—Failure of Reform Judaism—The National Destiny—What Restoration Means—For the Jews—For the Gentiles—The Future Arbiters of the World—Editorial Notes.

DR. PEREIRA MENDES, speaking on Exodus 13:21, dwelt upon the escape from Pharaoh, the passage of the Red Sea, and the battle with Amalek. Many a time since then, he continued, have the Jews exulted at our escape from a Pharaoh of tyranny only to find a new peril threaten us; oft have we passed through a sea of trouble, and Amalek after Amalek have we fought.

WHAT IS TO BE THE END of it all? Never has nation withstood like ours tempests of time, decay incident to age, the withering lightnings of a world's contempt. But the night of oppression is overpassed, and we enjoy a day of prosperity; the sunshine of liberty bathes us; the light of toleration irradiates us, and in the warm glow of equality we bask. Yet, as our fathers in their day saw but a cloud to indicate the presence of a Providence working for them, so it seems that the workings of Providence for us to-day are clouded in mystery. Has a Providence ceased to work for us, or

IS OUR DESTINY ACCOMPLISHED?

There can be but one answer. For I would ask, were we brought forth from Egypt amid such wonders, shielded in the desert, brought to Canaan, exiled, rescued from Pagan and Christian persecution; have we been kept alive under a thousand unparalleled atrocities, each enough to make humanity ashamed to the very end of time—simply and only that we might become good American citizens?

Friends, Judaism must have something to live for, or it will succumb under present conditions. It is not a question of reform or orthodoxy, it is a question of the existence of Judaism. To say we have no distinctive national future and here is our Palestine, that we were brought out of Egypt and preserved through centuries to come to an end here, to let loose a tide of pretty words flashing with generalities, to now and then ridicule or openly insult orthodox Judaism, will not preserve our faith or our nation.

It is true that orthodoxy as is generally seen in this city is too often combined with uncouth manners or dress of some of its followers. That is the result of their environment in the lands they have left. It does not represent the countless cultured, courtly men whom kings honored and princes respected in days gone by. But shall reformed Judaism be taken as the standard of Judaism, with its abandonment of

A DISTINCTIVE NATIONAL FUTURE?

How can it, when a leading preacher publicly declared a fortnight ago that "reform had as yet failed to achieve what it promised. It has not succeeded in consolidating Judaism, in rallying Israel around its elevated standard. Instead of rendering the Jews more faithful and more ardent upholders of the time-honored flag, it, even more than old-fashioned orthodoxy, allowed the watchfires of religion, the flames of the domestic altar, to cool down, if not to die out altogether.

A HIGHER DESTINY.

I trust the failure will not end in disaster. Far differently does orthodoxy speak. It declares we have been preserved for some higher destiny—a destiny indicated in the word restoration. With such a hope hearts erst cold pulsate with mighty energy.

Let us then see

WHAT RESTORATION MEANS

or us and for the Gentiles. It means for us a national home for our people, though they push their individual fortunes in other lands. It means a fatherland which from its position holds the gate for three great continents to trade through, a land which when the iron horse wakes the Oriental quiet will contain cities of wilder growth than even a Chicago, which in 1837 had four thousand one hundred and seventy people, or a San Francisco, which in 1840 had only six hundred. It means a prosperity greater even than in the days of Solomon, when the five trade lines of the then known world converged in his land, and "silver was like tones in the street;" greater than when a Tyre, chief port of the ancient world, teemed with the wealth of a far-reaching commerce, as described in Ezekiel 27, which I would ask you to read. And it means a a priesthood supported by the people and utilized as the public ministers, educators and judges, and not lobbyists—an end to the present system of every congregation shaping its own course and every individual his own life, and calling the result Judaism.

RESTORATION OF OUR RELIGION,

FOR THE GENTILE WORLD

Our restoration has yet greater significance, it is a cause of sad thought for the student of history and the believer in mankind's progress to note so many unpleasant features attending the close of this century. The increased resources of civilization have created new social ills. The vast fortunes of individuals, the accumulation of capital, the growth of wealthy and powerful corporations built up by the enterprise or foresight of a few, throw out of balance many important social relations, and give rise to nurms which may presage a storm of greater violence than has yet shaken society. Furthermore, the jealousies of the modern powers, their great colonization mania promising many future tangles, the shadows that haunt despots, the unrest of disturbing elements, violent means such as assassination in one land, and in another the destruction of historic relics and peril to innocent life—all these things are by no means to the honor of the century.

Add to these the divergencies in what is holiest and dearest to humanity, religion. Countless sects, each professing to be right, and not a few consigning all others to perdition, add also the dishonor and fraud continually suspected in ordinary relations of life and the consequent distrust, and it must be granted there are many things to be remedied.

Those that will be cured by the education of the masses—and the sooner a moral education is given the masses the better—will be met by the restoration of our people, for that means a court of ARBITRATION FOR THE WORLD.

The preacher read in evidence Isaiah 2:2-4, repeated in Micah 4:1-3; Zech. 8:22, continuing: "This, friends, is something to live for, a destiny noble indeed, an end to which every episode in our wondrous history seems calculated to further. For this was our nation rescued from Egypt, brought to Canaan and preserved amid the wrath tempests launched at it, as 'despised and rejected,' 'sorrowing and grieving,' 'wounded and bruised,' it trod the thorn paths of its terrible pilgrimage.

Is it not

since, by its fulfilment, the whole world will be benefited? A court of arbitration above all suspicion—and there can be such, or we must abandon hope in mankind—would restore to trade thaws and sinews now trained to war, and utilize the vast sums spent for warlike purposes to win those victories in the field of humanity's progress, infinitely more glorious; to combat ignorance, grapple with human misery, and lead the masses to a higher mental and moral plane. Nation then "shall not lift up sword against nation;" then shall love and truth meet; righteousness and peace embrace. Friends, the workings of Providence may be and are clouded with mystery, but for this we wait, for this we hope, for this we live.

[It is a remarkable sign of the times that the eloquent rabbi has given utterance in the city of New York to such a belief in these days. The world not unnaturally derides the idea of the Jews ever becoming so powerful that the great issues—peace or war—shall be settled by a court of arbitration, composed of Jews in Palestine. Nothing seems more improbable than that, even if their restoration should be effected, a race so insignificant in number and so unimportant outside of financial circles should ever become the arbiters of the world. Yet that, it appears, is what the section of the Jews represented by Dr. Mendes believes, and he has had the courage to declare his convictions and his faith in God's promises in the ears of a scoffing world.]

We believe he is right. The Jews will be restored to their own land as God has promised. They will return, as Dr. Mendes expects, still rejecting Jesus as their King, but not in that attitude will they attain the power and glory he vividly describes. Not until after much trial and severe suffering will they attain that eminence in the world. It will be after passing through the furnace, and recognizing in Him whom their fathers pierced their Deliverer and King, and bowing their knees to Him that their destiny will be fulfilled. The chapter from which Dr. Mendes quoted (Micah 4) has long been a source of hope and encouragement to his people. Many Christians are praying that the succeeding chapter might be also read and studied, and that the Holy Spirit would enable them to see the meaning which Christians see in it. "The Judge of Israel," who was smitten, "with a rod upon the cheek," who was born in Bethlehem, who is to be "ruler in Israel," whose "goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting," is He in whom alone lies the hope of the Jews, and who alone will establish them in power and glory in their own land, making Jerusalem the joy of the whole earth.—ED.]

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Inside the Merchant's Desk Lid.—At a recent meeting Mr. Ferrie said: "The other day I was very much struck with what a friend told me. Lately he had occasion to be in one of the seaport towns in England, and called in at a merchant's office there. While he and others were sitting near a desk talking on private business, the merchant opened the desk, and my friend was much surprised to see written inside the lid, 'What would Jesus do?' Such a man could not be otherwise than successful with his business. Let each of us, who profess to follow Christ, in all our transactions in life, whether great or small, ask ourselves this question, 'What would Jesus do?' and we shall not go wrong."

The Earl's Butler.—Mr. Oates Related: "To-day I had a letter from an earl, telling me that he was sending to me a butler who had been in his service, but had now fallen into disgrace. He had been a faithful servant for some time, but he took to betting and drinking, and very soon his money was all gone, and he ran deeply into debt. He said to himself, 'Now I must be honorable and pay my debts;' and then to pay these gambling debts he took the silver that should have been on his master's table and sold it, and with the money he paid what was due. When the master discovered the theft he sent for a detective, and the butler was arrested and convicted. His sentence expired only a fortnight ago, and when he was released he wrote to the master whom he had robbed, saying he knew he had disgraced himself, but if he would just give him £25 he would go to America. His master sent me a check for that amount to be given to him. When he came to me to get his money I spoke to him seriously of the life he was leading, and pointed him to Christ. The only thing that moved him was the remembrance of a prayer learned at his mother's knee. He went away, and I pray he may meet with Christ as his Saviour before he reaches America."

More Successful than Whipping.—"I Am acquainted" (says an American gentleman) "with a young man whose father died when he was but an infant, but whose mother always controlled and governed him. One day in conversation upon this subject, he remarked to me: 'Whenever I was guilty of disobeying my mother, and she called me to account, she would talk to me seriously, and then kneel in prayer, and tell God all my conduct, and the consequences of my course. I used to feel at those times as if my heart would burst, I felt so wicked, and I often said, 'Ma, whip me, but don't talk to me and pray for me.' Ah!' he said, 'it was the talking and praying that affected me more than the whipping, though all were necessary.'"

A Sad Day for the Young Squires.—A Christian minister said: "Two young men live a few miles from where I reside. They were two young squires, and had so much money that they did not know what to do with it. One day they set out for a few days' spree, as they called it; and one night, in the midst of their spree, an old nian came in with a piece of meat to present to the young men, for it is a custom in such parts to give such offerings as a token of good will. But in their drunken frolic they abused and fearfully mutilated that poor old man, until he died in their hands. They were sent to London to be tried. The one is now hopelessly insane, and the other is undergoing a long term of imprisonment. This is what came of their few days' spree. Surely, as the Bible says, 'Fools make a mock of sin.'"

A Father's Fatal Folly.—An Amiable young woman became deeply affected by a sense of her spiritual danger. Her father fondly loved her, but he was an ungodly man, and tried in many ways to turn his child from serious thoughts. The Bible and other religious books were taken from her, and works of fiction were put in their place. For a time she resisted all these efforts to prevent her seeking salvation. But at length she yielded, and joined in gay worldly amusements. The end was accomplished, and her concern for salvation vanished. In less than a year after this she was stretched upon her dying bed. Just before she expired she said, 'My father, last year I would have sought the Redeemer, but now it is too late. Father, your child is—' She could say no more, and died. What was the word she could not utter? Doubtless, it was 'lost!'

Why the Gun was Fired.—A Christian worker related: "One night in November a man entered the house of one of his neighbors, and said, 'Joseph is lost; he went out about four o'clock, and we fear he has gone into the woods.' The neighbors at once started, and set out in search of the missing child. Hour after hour they searched, but without success. Meanwhile the mother was seated in deep grief at home, and with clasped hands she sought comfort and help from God. By and by a gun was heard from a distance. Blessed signal! the child was found. The mother ran to meet the child, and her first words were: 'Is he alive?' 'Yes,' they replied, 'he is alive.' And the mother fondly clasped her boy to her breast. O dear friends, we each of us have wandered away from God, and yet He does not weary in seeking for us, but sends through all countries on the earth 'to seek and to save the lost.' 'There is joy in the presence of the angels of God,' over every lost one found."

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Attitude of the Cabinet on the Burning question of civil service reform is defined in a series of interviews published last week by the Washington Republican. "Secretary Bayard said: 'I am on record on the subject of civil service reform, and I don't propose to abandon the views I expressed during the campaign now. I heartily favor civil service reform, and so do all the members of the Administration so far as I know.' Secretary Whitney said: 'All of the Administration is committed through the President to the civil service law, and will doubtless consistently adhere to it. It is one of the easiest laws to evade, however, and much will depend upon the construction placed upon some of its provisions after a Cabinet consultation which, as you know, we have not had. I have no doubt, however, that it will be a natural and unstrained interpretation of it that will be adopted, and that its spirit as well as letter will be faithfully carried out.' Secretary Endicott said: 'In accepting the nomination for Governor of Massachusetts last fall, I placed myself on record as a civil service reformer, as also in favor of the honest silver dollar. I asserted that when the Democrats came into power their policy should be to insist on a faithful discharge of public duties and the retention of all faithful employes in office, no matter what their politics might be, so long as the latter has not been made pre-eminent over their duties. My record is made, and of course I shall stand by it.' Secretary Garland's reply was: 'I am committed to civil service reform as a member of President Cleveland's Cabinet.' He said the President's letter of acceptance and inaugural address defined the position of himself and Cabinet. 'I am on record upon the subject by my vote for the bill.' Secretary Manning, who does not, as a newspaper man, like to be interviewed, also expressed himself in favor of the reform policy."

Several Prominent Members of the Republican party have called on the President. Messrs. Hiscock, Millard, Bayne, and the defeated Presidential candidate of the party are among the number. It is stated on good authority that promises were given that no attempts should be made by them to embarrass the new Administration, nor any factional opposition organized. The fact is welcomed as a hopeful augury of a peaceful Presidential term. Indications are, however, noticed that the President may find himself opposed by a section of his own party, some of whom are already expressing their impatience with the delay in making vacancies. The Postmastership of New York is an office about which interest centres. Several prominent Democrats have joined with the Republicans in advocating the reappointment of Mr. Pearson, but a strong effort is being made to procure his dismissal. Mr. Cleveland can find no official more generally acceptable to the business firms and the citizens generally. The Collectors of the Port will, it is expected, be given to a Democrat, Colonel Robertson having taken a conspicuous part in politics.

The New Mistress of the White House will not be an unworthy successor of Harriet Lane, and the long line of noble women who have honored that position. The Evangelist says of the address which, in 1882, Miss Elizabeth Cleveland delivered before the alumnae of Elmira Female College: "The topic was 'Altruistic Faith.' Of all the addresses given during the quarter of a century of the college by many of our ablest men, such as Professor Upson, Dr. Walcott Calkins, Dr. Lyman Abbott, and the editor of the Evangelist, this was pronounced second to none of them, and for practical adaptation to the young ladies the best. She said: 'Woman has need of faith in God, faith in self, and faith in humanity. She would be hopeful, and not pessimistic. Marriage was not necessary for a woman; she need not be simply a buttonhole bouquet to some man. If good is in one, it will come out. Go on and you will succeed.' In looks Miss Cleveland reminds one of Anna Dickinson, perhaps because she wears her hair in the same style. Yet there is nothing mannish about her, and in private she is rather too modest than otherwise. Her voice is clear, and her articulation distinct, making her a fine speaker."

An Attempt to Reform the Bankruptcy Law is being made in New York State. Congress having failed to pass a national law, the merchants and manufacturers have organized to induce the State Legislature to adopt such amendments to the assignment laws as will remedy some of the evils now existing, especially in the matter of preferences. A petition signed by about three hundred individuals and firms, merchants and manufacturers, was forwarded to Albany last week seeking the early passage of a bill. It is assumed that the bill will prohibit preferences in any form, including judgments or decree confessed to give an undue preference to any creditor, for the purpose of defrauding any creditor, so that all creditors, under assignment, will share alike.

A Strike of Twelve Thousand Miners Employed on the rivers and railroads was announced from Pittsburg, Pa., on March 9th. The price demanded by the men is three cents a bushel. One of the men said: "We were starved into signing an ironclad article, for one year, to work at three cents, which was half a cent below the district price. Consequently the other miners were soon compelled to work at the same rate. Although we had been promised steady employment, we worked only half-time. The contract expired on February 15th, when we were presented with another, fixing the rate at two and a quarter cents. This was refused, and they afterward offered to give us fifty cents a ton for coal run over a three-fourth inch screen. Afterward the offer was withdrawn, and two and a half cents per bushel substituted." The strike will entail much suffering to the men and financial loss to the employers unless it is quickly settled.

The War Panic in England was slightly abated last week by an announcement made by Mr. Gladstone in the House of Commons. He stated that an agreement had been arrived at between Russia and England, by the terms of which neither the Russian nor Afghan forces would advance any further on either side of the frontier. This is a decisive rebuff for England. The demand of the British Government was that the Russians should withdraw from Afghan territory, which Russia refused to do. England has now accepted the Russian promise not to advance farther at present. Ever that promise is vague, and is evidently regarded as unreliable. The English Secretary of War, speaking after the promise had been received, said that it was impossible to deny that there was still cause for great anxiety regarding the relations between Great Britain and Russia. Some prominent Conservatives also pointed out that the agreement would not prevent Russia from massing troops on the border of debatable territory, and they object to the Russians being allowed to remain, even temporarily, on territory claimed as belonging to Afghanistan. England is preparing for war by heavy enlistments in India and by issuing large orders for arms and ammunition.

The Mahdi's Programme is Given in a Despatch to the New York Sun, which derives it from a proclamation issued by the Mahdi's chief officer, Osman Digma. Osmian is before Suakim harrassing the British troops under General Graham. He tells his followers that he is about to smash the British, to occupy Suakim, and to capture all the ships that have transported infidel dogs. After occupying Suakim he will await the arrival of El Mahdi and his triumphant troops. Then the combined forces will cross the Red Sea in the captured British transports to Jeddah in Arabia. Thence they will march upon Mecca, where El Mahdi is to be anointed and acclaimed as the successor of Mohammed. He will next proceed to Stamboul, having behind him the authorization of the Moslem world, and will smash the false Caliph who occupies the Turkish throne.

The Arrest of Zohbeh Pacha is Announced.—He is the Pasha whom General Gordon trusted and wished to make Governor of Khartoum. He is charged with being a traitor. His residence was searched immediately after his arrest, and in it were found many documents proving that he was in secret league with the Mahdi. He has been under a surveillance, which practically made him a prisoner, for the past two years. His wealth, which was mainly acquired in the slave trade, was confiscated, and he was allowed a quarterly stipend on condition that he should not leave Alexandria without the consent of the Khédive. General Gordon pleaded that Zohbeh should be restored to power in the Soudan, and said that the ex-slave king was the only man who had enough nerve and prestige to keep the Arabs in subjection. When General Gordon was sent to Khartoum last year it was one of Zohbeh's sons who escorted him across the desert from Korosco to Abou Hamed. Without this escort it is certain that General Gordon would never have got to Khartoum. Now it has been discovered by the British Government that Zohbeh Pacha has been in continual correspondence with El Mahdi both before and since the capture of Khartoum and the killing of General Gordon.

The Fenians and Nationalists who have made Paris their headquarters for some time past are no longer to enjoy French hospitality. On March 12th James Stephens, Eugene Davis, and John Morrissey were arrested by the French police, were taken to the frontier of Belgium, and warned not to return. Stephens begged permission to be allowed to proceed to Havre, so that he might take a steamer there for America, but the authorities refused to grant his request. The police have also arrested a journalist named Leroy and another Fenian whose name has not been learned. Mrs. Stephens was also arrested, but was subsequently released. All the persons now under arrest will be expelled from the country. The arrests already made are apparently only a beginning of what is contemplated on the part of the authorities. Warrants for the expulsion of other Fenian leaders have been issued, and further arrests are expected.

Services in Memory of General Gordon were held last week in the London churches. At the very time that the services were taking place the last letter received from General Gordon was given to the press. It is full of indignation against Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues. In the course of the letter he says: "I will accept nothing whatever from Gladstone's government. I will not even let them pay my expenses. I will get the King [Leopold of Belgium] to pay them. I will never put foot in England again, but if I get out I will go to Brussels and so on to the Congo."

The Possibility of a Mormon Exodus was hinted at by President Taylor in the course of an address delivered in the Temple at Salt Lake City recently. He referred to the anti-Mormon legislation by Congress, the Edmunds bill, the North Carolina statute, and the Tennessee murders, and then said "these persecutions were making some of the Saints think of going to a foreign country to preserve their religious liberty there," and that "there might be another pilgrims' day." It was understood that Mexico was the place under consideration as the new Mormon Jerusalem. It is too soon yet to rejoice over the exodus, but the mere suggestion is a welcome piece of news, which seems too good to be true.

An Experiment in the Treatment of Lunatics is being made by the New York State Board of Charities and Corrections, which it may be hoped, for humanity's sake, will prove successful. A Long Island farm of about one thousand acres has been bought for the purpose of affording pleasant and useful employment to the harmless lunatics now in the public institutions of the city. The advantages of this plan will be twofold: it will give suitable occupation to the able-bodied insane, and will tend to relieve in part their mental troubles, or possibly effect an entire cure, while the produce of the farm can profitably be used in the support of the public institutions of the city.

"Campmeeting" John Allen, the Venerable Methodist minister, who is celebrating his ninety-third birthday, recently gave some curious reminiscences to a Tribune reporter. He said: "When I was chaplain of the Maine Legislature I was called on to pray for a governor. He wasn't the same politics as I, so I just prayed that he might be the best governor in the State—if possible. Then there was another governor, and he differed from me too. I prayed that he might be as wise as a serpent and as harmless as a dove." "How did you pray for the legislators, Mr. Allen?" "The legislators? I just prayed, O Lord, enable them to condense and to be able to stop when they get through. One day I went to the Senate to officiate, and I prayed there that the Lord might enable them to bring order out of chaos and confusion. The president reproved me for that, but I asked him if that wasn't what he wanted."

An Heroic Color-Sergeant Died at his Home at Worcester, Mass., on March 10th. Among the deeds of daring on both sides, of which the history of the war is full, that of Sergeant Plunkett is remarkable. He served in the Twenty-first Massachusetts Regiment, which was ordered, on December 13th, 1862, to charge the impregnable position of the Confederate forces on Marye's Hill. Plunkett was ordered to the rear to prevent straggling from the ranks. The regiment went forward under a deadly fire at double quick. Color-Sergeant Joseph H. Collins was struck, and fell mortally wounded. The flag went down with him. Plunkett, on seeing the standard drop, threw away his gun, picked up the flag, and rushed to the front. The enemy poured in a hot fire upon the flag. The silken banner was riddled, the staff was splintered, and one bullet whizzed through Plunkett's cap. But the line moved on with the colors in front. When, however, the line had approached as near the enemy's works as it was destined to go that day a Confederate shell exploded immediately in front of the flag. One piece of the shell struck Plunkett's right arm near the shoulder, tearing it almost off, and leaving it hanging by a mere ribbon of flesh. Another piece struck Plunkett's left arm near the wrist, making a terrible wound. Plunkett fell forward upon the flag, and his blood dyed it with stains that are still visible. Both his arms were amputated, and the heroic soldier went home a maimed and helpless man. But the people would not allow him to suffer poverty. A subscription was raised for him, and he received in addition a full pension. It was rightly felt that his wounds gave him a claim on those in whose cause they had been incurred. It is remarkable that, while such claims are readily admitted, men are not moved by the same principle to realize that Christ laid down His life for them and to render to Him the tribute He claims (Rom. 12: 1).

How to Become Deaf may be Learned from a letter published in a scientific journal by an eminent physician. He says: "Some years ago, owing to illness and long residence in the tropics, I became morbid, sensitive to noises of every kind, and procured complete relief in the following way: I placed some spermaceti ointment in the centre of a little square of thin, limp cotton, brought the corners together, tied them with thread, and inserted one of the little plugs well into each ear, and after a little kneading and gentle pressure found that I was absolutely deaf to all ordinary noises, such as the loud barking of dogs and the rumbling of heavy carriages in the streets. This little experiment is easily tried, and a daily experience of over twelve months warrants me in saying that it will be found invaluable in the sick room." Undisturbed repose is a boon in some circumstances, but in others, as, for example, when an alarm of fire is given, the experiment might prove fatal. As one sees impenitent sinners sitting unmoved under the warnings of Gospel preachers, it would seem as if some such device had been applied to the ears of the soul (Isa. 6: 10).

A Gold-Seeker's Propitious Fall over a Precipice is described by a California journal. It states that a man had been out all day prospecting, and was returning to his home unsuccessful, when, on crossing a narrow trail, the horse he was riding slipped and fell, carrying its rider with it over a precipitous ledge. The man lost all hope of life as he rolled down a fearful descent, but eventually his fall was stopped by a large rock projecting above the snow. The horse, too, had struck the rock with its feet, breaking off a few fragments. The rider was stunned by the force with which he had struck the rock, but he recovered and looked around. He noticed that something glittered where the iron shoes of the horse had alighted. Breaking off a few pieces, he discovered that it was the long-looked-for gold-bearing quartz. Examining further, he found a vein of considerable thickness, and realized that he was rich beyond his most sanguine expectations. The treasure so eagerly sought was at length found through an apparent calamity, which he would have avoided if he could. This is not the first time that a catastrophe has proved a blessing. Many of our most precious spiritual blessings have come through an apparent misfortune (Rom. 8: 28).

The Ownership of a Man's Head is being contested in the courts. The Medical and Surgical Reporter states that a surgeon is suing the executors of a deceased patient for the dead man's head. The patient during his lifetime agreed that the surgeon should have it in consideration of his paying the funeral expenses. When the time came for the delivery to be made the surgeon called for it, but the heirs, who said they were perfectly willing to pay the funeral expenses themselves, demurred, and refused to carry out the agreement. The aid of the courts was then invoked. The courts have at various times held that there could be no property, in the ordinary sense in which the term is used, in a dead body, and the interesting question now comes up whether the ownership, such as it is, is vested in the person himself or in his representatives. The dispute is not altogether without a precedent (Jude 9). It is one, however, that will not help the judges to decide, though the lawyers engaged may profit by it in the conduct of the case. It is quite possible that the arrangement between the surgeon and his patient may fail, as the former must bow to the decision of the courts. If that is against him, people will learn that they cannot during life arrange for the disposal of their bodies after death. They may, however, rely upon it that the destiny of their souls will be irrevocably settled by their own decision. If they commit them to Christ none can snatch them out of His hand (John 10: 28).

Bewitched by Eating a Cake was the extraordinary excuse presented in a court in Ulster County, N. Y., by a man who was on trial for an elopement. He admitted his offence, but pleaded in extenuation that the woman who was his partner in crime had given him a cake, which he had eaten, and immediately became irresponsible. Incantations, he said, had been spoken over the cake, and it had bewitched him, rendering him infatuated with her and unable to exist away from her. The plea was very properly rejected as a superstition, and the man was held accountable for his misconduct. There may, however, have been some truth in his plea, and, in a sense, he may have been controlled by demoniacal power, though he was wrong in attributing the witchcraft to the cake. Those who voluntarily submit themselves to Satan's leading, falling willingly into all his temptations, eventually become his slaves, unable to resist his influence by their own strength, even when desiring to do so (Eph. 2: 2, 3).

The Bride of a Convict Discovered the Real character of her husband in a remarkable way a few days ago. A despatch from Atlanta, Ga., to the New York Times states that on Friday, March 6th, a man died who had for more than a year resided in Gradytown, near that city. He had led a sober, industrious life while there, and was regarded as an honorable citizen. He was married to a young lady of good family, to whom he was a loving and faithful husband. After his death several male friends of the family prepared the body for burial. About one of the dead man's ankles they found a shackle such as is used in a penitentiary. The chain had been broken off at the first link, but the ring proved too stubborn for him to remove unaided, and of course he dare not apply to a blacksmith for assistance. Calling the wife to the side of the corpse, they asked her for an explanation, but she could give none. She had never seen the shackle before, and was even more mystified than the men who made the discovery. A policeman was called in, and recognized the dead man as Jacob Harper, a notorious desperado, who had escaped from the penitentiary, and for whose capture a large reward was offered. The wife's family wished her to have nothing to do with the funeral, but she would not listen to them. She said that he had been a good husband to her, and she would see him buried with all the honor she could give him. The lady's conduct is creditable to her. If the discovery had been made in his lifetime she might have acted otherwise, for the best of us are little disposed to follow Christ's example in receiving the offscourings of society (Matt. 9: 11, 12).

SUNDRY FOOLS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Fools because of their transgression, and because of their iniquities, are afflicted. Their soul abhorreth all manner of meat; and they draw near unto the gates of death. Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and He saveth them out of their distresses. He sent His word, and healed them, and delivered them from their destructions."—PSALM 107 : 17-20.

Four Pictures—I. The Miserable People—A Fool an Ignorant Person—Acts Contrary to Knowledge—Hurts Himself Causelessly—Sin Multiplies Itself—The Sinners Afflicted—Fallen into Soul-Sickness—No Interest in Anything—Almost Dead—Surrounded with Many Destructions—II. The Merciful Lord—Worried by the Black Dog—Prayer the First Step—Healed Radically—Light in the Lantern.

THE psalm contains one picture in four panels. It illustrates a single experience in its main outlines, for in every case it is written, "Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and He saveth them out of their distresses;" and yet each case is very different from any one of the others. We have variety and similarity. In human families we meet with great diversity of features among those who are, nevertheless, the offspring of the same parents. In the great family of God the diversity of the features is very wonderful indeed. Look at the four pictures which are so much alike, and which indeed do but represent one, and yet you shall discover in them marked diversity. Learn you this double lesson—that unless your spot is the spot of God's children you are none of His; but also, do not expect to find that spot exactly the same in you as it is in others of His undoubted offspring. Therefore do not judge yourself by any man's biography. Do not condemn yourself if, after reading John Bunyan's "Grace Abounding," you say, "I never went into these dark places." Be glad that you never did. After reading Madame Guyon, do not condemn yourself if you never heard her "Torments," nor felt her ecstasies of divine life. Be sorry that you never have, and aspire after such things, but do not condemn yourself.

and you may find your likeness in one of the four; but be not so unwise as to condemn yourself if you are not seen in the other three. I am only going to bring out two out of the many thousands of things that lie packed away in the wonderful box of my text. There are two things—the miserable people, and the merciful Lord.

I. The

first. I am going to describe them, and my object in the description will be to show what some have been who, nevertheless, have been saved. These people are called fools. They abhorred all manner of meat. They drew near to the gates of death. But they were saved for all that, for they cried unto God in their trouble, and He delivered them out of their distresses. The inference will be that if I—if you—should happen to be just in the same condition as these people, yet we may have hope that God will save us.

To begin with, the first description of them is that they were fools. Now, I must not call you fools, but you have all of you liberty to call yourselves so. I find it forbidden in Scripture for any man to call his brother "fool," but I do not find him forbidden to call himself so. Look well to yourself, and see whether you are not a fool now—at least, if God's grace has saved you, you are bound to own that you were once a fool in capital letters; for every unrenewed and unregenerate man is a fool.

We call those fools who have a great want of knowledge of things which it is necessary to know. Many must confess that, though now they understand what faith in Jesus is, yet they were very slow in catching the idea. It is an idea which a babe in grace can explain, but which wise men, classically instructed, do not receive. I may stand here, and beat my very heart out in trying to make plain how men are to believe and live, and yet out of my congregation not one will receive God's meaning into his heart unless God the Holy Ghost shall enlighten him; for we are such fools that the simplest matters of heavenly truth are utterly unknown to us.

He, too, is a fool who, when he does know, does not make right use of his knowledge. He is

than the former one. He knows all about it, but yet he does not do it. He understands that the only way to be saved is to believe in Christ; but he does not believe. He knows that men must repent of sin if they would find mercy; but he does not repent of sin. He knows that life is uncertain, and yet he is risking his soul upon the chances of his continuing to live. He lives as if he had a lease of his life, and was absolutely certain that he could not die till he chose to be converted. Now this is to be a fool—to act contrary to your own knowledge and better judgment. How many fools there are of this kind!

We call him a fool who hurts himself without any profit—without any justifying cause. The man who flings his life away to save a nation, or even to rescue one solitary person from death, is a hero; but what is he who, for no motive whatever, will maim himself—will take away his own health—will take away his own life? Are there none such here? Look at the drunkard! Look at the man who is guilty of unclean living! Look at such as prefer this world to the world to come, and throw themselves away on trifles! O sirs, there be many men that have injured themselves so that their sin lies in their bones.

Verily,

SINNERS ARE FOOLS!

We are great fools when we think that we can find pleasure in sin or profit in rebellion. Such fools have you and I been. Peradventure, some here are such fools now.

I call that man a fool who throws away jewels that he may gather pebbles, who casts away gold and silver that he may gather up mire and dirt. And what do they do who fling away heaven and eternal life for the sake of a transient joy, a momentary gain? Are there not some men living in this world only to get what will one day turn into smoke? They know that this great world, and all the works of men that are therein, must be dissolved with fervent heat; and yet they labor to build a mansion for their immortal souls in this place, which is to be utterly burned up. And, meanwhile, thou, O Son of God, Immortal Love, art treated as though thou wert a mere fiction!

The next thing about these people is rather worse; they were not only fools, but *sinn*ers. The text says that "fools, because of their transgression, and because of their iniquities, are afflicted." You see they had several sorts of sin—transgression and iniquities. They began with one transgression; they went on to multiplied iniquities. There was first in their heart a transgression against God; afterward there were found in their lives many in-equities, both toward God and toward man.

SIN MULTIPLIES ITSELF

very rapidly. It grows from one to a countless multitude. We will not go into the details of the transgressions and iniquities that you may have committed; but here is the point—these people, who were fools, and full of transgression and iniquity, nevertheless cried to God in their trouble, and He delivered them out of their distresses. What form has your sin taken? Think of it in your own heart. But whatever form it has taken, God is able to forgive you. "All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men." "The blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth us from all sin." There is no sin which is unpardonable if men repent of it. The sin that is unpardonable is one of which no man ever thought of repenting, for it is a sin which is unto death, and when committed the man is spiritually dead, and never repents.

If there be a sin upon you, however black and foul—if it be a horrible sin which I could not mention because it might crimson the cheek of modesty if I did but even hint at it—if you are covered with it, polluted with it beyond all imagination—yet, of the saints in heaven it can be said, "Such were some of you, but ye are washed." It is written of our Lord that He is able to "have compassion on the ignorant, and on them that are out of the way." Oh, you out-of-the-way sinners, what a comfortable word that is for you!

But we must go on with the picture. These people were not only fools and sinners, which are two bad things; but they had a third mischief about them:

THEY WERE AFFLICTED.

"Fools, because of their transgression, and because of their iniquities, are afflicted." Their affliction was evidently the result of their folly and their transgression. Do I address any who are in that case? I hardly like to say what may have happened to some here. They may be distressed in spirit, and unable to pursue their business with anything like cheerfulness. They may be subject to doleful forebodings and heavy glooms, and all the result of sin in years gone by. They have now got to the core of the apple of sin. It is wonderfully sweet till you get to the core, and then it is bitter, ay, more bitter than death itself. How I long to say a word of comfort to those who are in that condition! If you repent, if you will arise and come to your Father, why should you not be delivered out of your distresses? Do you not see that God does deliver such as you are?

The picture is getting black, but we must put on another coat of color. In addition to this, these people had fallen into

A SOUL-SICKNESS.

Through their trouble and their consciousness of sin, they had fallen into such a state of illness that nothing could help them. The best food was brought to them, but they waved it away; their soul abhorred all manner of meat. Some are in such a state that the amusements which once were joys to them are now wearisome. You have been lately to the theatre, and you used to be charmed there. You cannot make out what has come over it; it seems so dull to you. You used to enjoy cheerful evenings with your merry-making friends, but now you would sooner get upstairs alone, for you feel so wretched. When you are alone, there is one person who plagues you; if you could only get away from him, you would be content; but that person happens to be yourself, and there appears to be no rest for you either in company or in solitude. Your soul abhors all manner of meat.

I have known souls to get into such a state that books, interesting and instructive, they could not read any longer. They felt of the sort; and poetry, and all the charms of art, which once they very properly enjoyed, could afford them no pleasure. The best mental recreation cannot give such persons any stay from their fierce, self-destroying thoughts. Ay, and they even refuse good spiritual meat. If the preacher tries to give them milk for babes, that is too weak for them; if he brings out strong meat, that is too tough for their teeth. If he brings them "wine on the lees, well-refined," that is too heating; if he offers the water of life, that is too cold. Nothing will suit them. They grumble at all kinds of teaching. Religious books do not cheer them; even the Bible itself seems stale and unprofitable. You are in a frightful condition, my friends, are you not? You are so sick that the meat which best would suit you is that which you least care for. Yet God has saved some who have fallen into this wretched way; and He invites you to come to Him, and trust in Him, with the promise that He will save even you, though you are as bad as you well can be.

But the case was worse than that, for we read,

"They draw near unto the gates of death."
This poor creature was ALMOST DEAD.

He could see death-gate and hell-gate right before him. He was lying at death's door, expecting every moment to be thrown through the portal into eternal destruction and endless wrath. I remember when I lay in the bosom of despair in my own apprehension. I knew that I was condemned on account of sin, and my conscience said "Amen" to the condemnation. I could not plead any reason why I should not at once be taken out to endless execution on account of my sin; and I certainly felt the dread shadow of coming wrath falling upon my soul. And yet I am saved, blessed be God! And so shall you, dear hearer, though you be ready to die, and ready to be damned, be saved by faith in Jesus. What a glorious gospel we have to preach to you miserable people!

But yet we have not quite touched up the picture with the last shade of black. This man not only lay at death's door, full of trouble, full of distress, but he was surrounded by many destructions. In the twentieth verse we read, "and he delivered them from

THEIR DESTRUCTION."

What! Are there many destructions to a man? Oh yes, a great many! I have known one man destroyed by his shop, another by his wife, another by his children. Many a woman is destroyed by her clothes; many a man is destroyed by his eating; millions are destroyed by their drinking. Everything about us will destroy us unless God saves us. There are a thousand gates to hell, though there is only one road to heaven. One man may perish by debauchery; another may perish by respectability. One man may be lost in the ale-house; another man may be lost through his teetotalism, if he makes a god of it. One man may go down to hell by his want of common decency, and another by his pride, and prudery, and self-righteousness. Do not deceive yourself—the way to ruin is easy, and many crowd it. If you want to go to heaven, well, we shall have to tell you a great deal about what is to be believed; but if you want to go to hell, I have no need to tell you anything.

II. I have but a minute or two left, where I should have wished for an hour, to speak upon

THE MERCIFUL LORD.

Very briefly indeed. This merciful Lord appears in this picture where you do not at first see Him. I think I see Him in that first verse: He sent the affliction. "Fools, because of their transgression, and because of their iniquities, are afflicted." Ah me! "Are afflicted." Who afflicted them, then? Why, their own Father—their own Shepherd, who saw that they would never come back to Him if it were not for affliction. I see you, friend. You are a stray sheep, and I could not get you back. Now you cry, "Alas, I am in trouble!" I am sorry that you should be troubled, but I am not altogether sorry. I can see the black dog is worrying you. It is that He may get you back to the Shepherd. Many will not come back till the black dog has his teeth in their flesh; but if it surely drives you to the Good Shepherd, it will be your true friend. I question whether many of us did come to the Lord Jesus Christ until we were afflicted in some way or other. Our bright days led us more and more into sin. Then came a dark day; and then we began to turn. "When He had spent all, there arose a mighty famine in that land."

BLESSSED BE GOD FOR THE FAMINE!

"He began to be in want;" now He will have to test his gay friends and flatterers. There was a gentleman who had drunk his champagne, and put his feet under his mahogany; and the prodigal said, "Now I have fed that man, I dare say He will entertain me now I am in poverty." "I cannot help you," he replied. "Can you give me some employment?" "No. What are you worth? Well, you can feed my pigs." And he "sent him into his fields to feed swine." That is the black dog again. If the gentleman had said, "Oh, yes, my dear young fellow, you were very generous when you had plenty of money, I am very sorry for you; come and live with me; while I have a crust you shall have part of it;" that would have been the worst thing that could have happened, for the prodigal son would never have thought of going home. I say that your troubles are mercies in disguise. Your sicknesses, your poverty, and your misery—oh, I bless God for them! The Heavenly Father has sent this rumbling wagon to bring you home to Himself. Oh, that you would but come to yourself! Oh, that you would but come to Him! See, the grace of God appears in the very affliction of these rebellious fools.

But note this, further;

THEY BEGAN TO PRAY;

and here we see the Lord again, for no one seeks after God till God has put the prayer into his heart, and breathed a new life into his spirit.

Then as soon as ever he did pray, the Lord heard the prayer. We read, "He sent His word, and healed them, and delivered them from their destructions." So, beloved, all that God has to do, in order to save us, is to send us His word. He has done that by sending His dear Son, who is the incarnate Word. He sends us the word in the shape of the Holy Scriptures; He sends us the word in the preaching of His servants; but what we want most of all is to have that word sent home by the power of the Holy Spirit. "He sent His word, and healed them."

I want you to notice how the Lord rescued these people. You see, they could not eat. They had reached such a state of sickness that they could not take anything; they abhorred all manner of meat, and we do not find that the Lord sent them any meat. No, He sent His word. Did He send His word like a tonic, to give them an appetite? No; He made surer work. Many doctors try to deal with the disease, but God does not. He deals with the patient himself, and his constitution. He

HEALED THEM RADICALLY.

Then, when He had healed them their appetite came back. They did not abhor all manner of meat when once God had healed them. The Lord does not operate upon the symptoms, but upon the person; He does not deliver us from this sin and that sin and the other sin; but He takes away the old heart, out of which the sin comes, and gives a new heart, out of which there come repentance, and faith, and a change of life.

If you have a lantern, and it is dark, you may polish the outside of it as long as ever you like, and no light will come out of it; the first thing to be done is to put a candle inside the lantern. This is what the Lord does; and then, when He puts the candle inside the lantern, we say to ourselves, "This lantern looks very dirty, it must be cleaned." Is it any fouler than it was before the light was put into it? It is the same lantern exactly; but when you put the candle into it, you perceive how dirty it is by the light shining within. It is of no use to try to clean and polish it up till you have placed the lighted candle in it. You know

HOW MR. MOODY PUTS IT.

A lady, we will say, takes a looking-glass, and she looks into it; and she sees a spot on her face. That is the use of the looking-glass—to reveal spots; but you never heard of a lady trying to wash her face with a looking-glass, for that is not its use. No, the looking-glass shows the spots, but it cannot take the spots away. First of all, by means of the law, we find out our spots, but we have to go to Jesus Christ, in the gospel, to get those spots taken away. Blessed are those who have gone to Him!

"He sent His word, and healed them." With one word the Lord Jesus at this hour can heal every sin-sick soul before me, for where the word of a king is, there is power. Here is a word of the Lord. Obey it, I entreat you. "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and there is none else." Here is another; hearken to it, and live: "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy, and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price." Let all that labor and are heavy-laden come unto Christ, and He will give them rest. The Lord grant that you may come at once, without delay, and to His name shall be the praise. Amen and Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

THE names of six eminent men of letters stand on the title-page of the second volume of the

of British Authors, of which series Mr. Edward T. Mason is the editor. They are: Wordsworth, Coleridge, Lamb, Hazlitt, Leigh Hunt, and Procter. This group of authors is a group not only of contemporaries, but of intimate friends. As in the first volume of the series, each author is depicted by extracts from the books of men and women who knew him. They describe him as he appeared to them; and in some cases the writers were ardent admirers, and in others hostile critics, we obtain a picture in which there are some curious contrasts. Of Wordsworth especially this is noticeable. His splendid genius and his intense love of nature are dwelt upon by several of those who visited him and recorded their impressions, while others who made his acquaintance carried away as the prominent characteristics of the man his extraordinary egotism and vanity, and his meanness in money matters. Harriet Martineau says that the poet advised her to do as he and his sister did, and when she had visitors to say to them, "If you like to have a cup of tea with us, you are very welcome; but if you want any meat, you must pay for your board." Even in the tea the hospitality does not appear to have been lavish, for Miss Martineau complains that she could not obtain a drop of cream with any ease of mind, Wordsworth appearing to part with it reluctantly. He was, she adds, giving away all the milk to his poor neighbors.

Probably, of the six eminent men dealt with in this volume the most curiosity will be felt about Coleridge. The group of thinking men, especially young men, who sat reverently at his feet looked to him as a prophet. It was the custom to speak of them as "going to Highgate [where Coleridge lived] to worship." His influence upon them was great and lasting; but others who were taken to Highgate, and found themselves unable to worship, averred that Coleridge's vaunted wisdom was empty sound, pleasant and musical as it was. A story is told here amusingly illustrative of this view, and it is told against two of his admirers. It is said that Wordsworth and Rogers were returning from Coleridge's house, where, as usual, Coleridge had talked incessantly. "What a wonderful man he is!" exclaimed Wordsworth. "Wonderful, indeed!" Rogers replied. "What depth of thought, what richness of expression!" Wordsworth continued, "There's nothing like him that ever I heard," Rogers rejoined, "Pray," inquired Wordsworth, "did you precisely understand what he said about the Kantian philosophy?" Rogers said, "Not precisely." "Or about the plurality of worlds?" Wordsworth asked. "I can't say I did," Rogers admitted. "Indeed," he continued, "if the truth must out, I did not understand a syllable from one end of his monologue to the other." To which Wordsworth replied, with laughter in which both joined, "No more did I." Probably they were not the only enthusiastic admirers of Coleridge who were similarly situated. Of Lamb, Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt, and Procter, the fund of anecdote contained here is very rich. The reader may be puzzled in making up his mind about these famous men, amid so much conflicting testimony, but he certainly has abundant material for forming a judgment. The book is published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons. Pp. 295. Price $1.50.

DEMONOLOGY;

or, Spiritualism, Ancient and Modern, by Elder E. P. Hanson. This exposure of spiritualism is written by one who knows whereof he speaks. His father and mother embraced spiritualism

during his infancy, and for many years—in fact, until he was twenty-three years of age—he attended the lectures and séances as an ardent believer, and witnessed its phenomena in all its phases, from “the tiny rap to spirit materialization, from slate-writing to a floating violin in mid-air, played by invisible hands.” In November, 1876, Mr. Hanson was converted to Christ; and when the scales dropped from his eyes he saw spiritualism as it is, and could not rest until he had exposed it. In this work he deliberately records his opinion. It is not, he says, wholly fraudulent, though in many cases, especially in the slate-writing phase, the manifestations are frauds. “The greater part is the work of demons operating through human agents as mediums,” controlling them by a subtle power, similar to that of mesmerism. That is his belief after a long experience, and this work is written to prove it. Mr. Hanson, in our opinion, is right in his belief. He is evidently very much in earnest, and, as is common with writers who have suffered much and are indignant, he allows his anger to manifest itself in his pages. That is a pity. “It is cold steel that cuts,” and Mr. Hanson’s sword seems to be red-hot. If another edition of his work is called for, we would advise him to omit some of his most extravagant expressions, and to generally moderate his tone. As it now stands, his readers are apt to have their attention divided between the iniquities of spiritualism and the antics of a frenzied writer. A calm, judicious statement of the case would be better adapted to attain his object of arousing society to do battle with spiritualism. Pp. 310. Price $1.25. Published by E. F. Hanson, Belfast, Me.

THE UNKNOWN WAY.

a dainty little volume of illustrations of Bryant’s well-known poem, has been issued by Messrs. E. P. Dutton & Co. Each stanza has one, and some of them have two pictures appropriately representing the varied scenes which the poet’s words describe. The engravings are exquisitely done, and the publishers have done everything in their power by elegant binding, the finest paper, and excellent typography to produce a charming little book suitable for a wedding or birthday present. Price, 75 cents.

A COUNCIL IN THE DESERT.

THE scene depicted in our illustration was one of frequent occurrence during the recent campaign of the British in the Soudan. The native guides had to be consulted respecting each day’s march in the desert. How important a part of an expedition are the guides, when the route taken is in a desert, may be imagined. It may be said, indeed, that upon their intelligence and fidelity hung the very existence of the army. The desert is roadless; there are trails, but the shifting sands render them scarcely perceptible to the European eye, though the guides follow them without difficulty. It would, however, be possible, by the aid of the compass, to cross the desert in any direction without guides, were it not for another and more serious difficulty. It is in his knowledge of the situation of the wells that the native guide is able to render essential service to the generals of the expedition.

The Soudan, when once the Nile is quitted, is a waterless region. An American officer states that during a journey of six thousand miles in the desert he saw but five living springs of water, and they were lost in the sand within a few yards. The natives told him they had had no rain in three years. In crossing the desert the traveller is therefore wholly dependent on the wells, which are few and far apart. On several occasions, though travelling swiftly, it required five days to journey from one well to another. The difficulties which were encountered by the British troops were therefore formidable beyond precedent. Their enemy in this matter had the advantage of them. The Soudanese soldier can, and generally does, exist for forty-eight hours without water, and being accustomed to a scarcity of water knows how to husband it better than Europeans, and is able to endure thirst longer than they are. The supply of water was therefore a matter of paramount importance to the expedition, and for this they were dependent upon their native guides, whose advice had more to do with the movements of the troops than the strategy of the generals.

CHRISTIANA AND HER SONS.

ALL who are familiar with Bunyan’s “Pilgrim’s Progress” will understand the scene depicted in our illustration. It cannot be described better than in Bunyan’s own words:

"This Christiana, after her husband had gone over the river, and she could hear of him no more, her thoughts began to work in her mind. First for that she had lost her husband, and for that the loving bond of that relation was utterly broken betwixt them. For you know nature can do no less but entertain the living with many a heavy cogitation, in the remembrance of the loss of loving relations. This therefore of her husband did cost her many a tear. But this was not all; for Christiana did also begin to consider with herself whether unbecoming behavior toward her husband was not one cause that she saw him no more, and that in such sort he was taken away from her. And, upon this, came into her mind, by swarms, all her unkind, unnatural, and ungodly carriages to her dear friend; which also clogged her conscience, and did load her with guilt. She was, moreover, much broken by recalling to remembrance the restless groans, brinish tears and self-bemoanings of her husband, and how she did harden her heart against all his entreaties and loving persuasions of her and her sons to go with him; yea, there was not anything that

Christian either said to her or did before her all the while that his burden did hang on his back, but it returned upon her like a flash of lightning and rent the caul of her heart in sunder. Specially that bitter outcry of his, 'What shall I do to be saved?' did ring in her ears most dolefully.

"Then said she to her children, 'Sons, we are all undone. I have sinned away your father and he is gone; he would have had us with him, but I would not go myself; I also have hindered you of life.'

"With that the boys fell all into tears, and cried out to go after their father."

The scene so quaintly described is excellently depicted in our illustration. The artist seems to have caught exactly the idea the great allegorist had in his mind. The expression of the faces, the attitudes of all in that momentous family council, the costumes, which were those worn when Bunyan wrote, seem to unite in producing for us accurately the scene Bunyan imagined. We are indebted for the picture to Messrs. Anson D. Randolph & Company, of 900 Broadway, New York. It is one of a hundred which embellish their magnificent edition of the "Pilgrim's Progress," described in our issue of February 26th. The book, elegantly bound, is offered for sale at $4; by mail, $4.25.

"Then said she to her Children, 'Sons, we are all undone.'"

THE JEW'S WARD.

In a Purer Air.

How to raise the depraved and degraded masses of humanity in our great cities out of the miseries of their lives, is a problem which has long puzzled social philosophers. Education has been tried, but the result has been disappointing. It has done something, it is true, but in many cases it has sharpened the intellectual faculties while leaving the moral nature untouched. The mental training has failed to reach the heart, and there the seat of evil is to be found. "Ye must be born again," said the Great Teacher, and His words are proved true in our experience. The work of the preacher of the Gospel is more productive than that of all other social reformers. The converted criminal steals no more; the educated criminal abandons burglary and highway robbery, but he takes to forgery and fraud. The only hope for our criminal population and the society menaced by its presence is in the Gospel, and therefore we preach Christ, the Saviour of the world. The little heedless city girl whose life is here portrayed is a type of her class. There is no transforming influence known to the world equal in power to the knowledge of Jesus. What the Jew could not do for the child he loved, earnestly though he tried, the simple reading of the New Testament had done; she became a new creature.

A few days after old Matthias Levi had transferred her little fortune to Carola, she entered upon a new life. The post of village schoolmistress was offered to her through her governesses, and she accepted it gladly. It was a small endowed school, founded by a certain Lady Hazelmount more than a hundred years ago, with a salary worth five dollars a week and a cottage and garden attached to the school-house, rent free. The rector of St. Chad's had, before his death, recommended her to the office when it should next be vacant, and the vacancy occurred just as Carola was twenty-one.

She awoke with the earliest gleam of dawn on the morning after the long journey that had carried her down to Hazelmount. There was at first no sound to be heard save the rustling of the ivy-leaves round her open window—a sound more soothing than is dead silence; and she might have fallen asleep again but for the sudden crowing of a cock, which seemed to awaken a hundred chirping little birds under the eaves of the thatched roof. Very soft and sleepy the twittering was at first, but as the light grew stronger, all the many cries and notes of country life resounded through her quiet chamber, and Carola made haste to dress herself, and see what her new home was like.

A short flight of stairs led her down into a large, old-fashioned kitchen, with a low ceiling crossed by massive oak-beams. A broad, deep window of lattice-panes stretched across the one side of the kitchen, and on the window-sill stood a blue jug, filled with tall white lilies, which just caught the first rays of the rising sun. The quarried floor was of dark red, and the oak chairs and table and the long dresser near the window were almost black with age. An eight-day clock, a hundred years old, was ticking softly in a corner. The tender sunlight was flickering here and there through the quivering ivy-leaves, and filling the pleasant room with a cool and subtle cheerfulness. Carola looked round with a smile of utter contentment. She had never seen a place like this before; never before had she felt as if she had a home. She breathed a sigh of satisfaction, though the tears started to her eyes. "Jesus Christ and His mother could have lived here," she said to herself.

The thought made it seem a holy place, without taking away from its homeliness. Yes, Mary might have sat there, in the tall old arm-chair in the chimney-corner; and the Lord, weary and wayworn as He often was, could have rested on the oaken settee, with its high back, which screened the chimney-corner from the door. Oh, if she could but have ministered to Him as the women did! If she could but have washed His feet, and wiped them with her hair, and kissed them with many kisses! Or if He would have asked her, as He asked the woman of Samaria, to bring him water to drink! She had never seen a place before where she could fancy Him living at home, as He might have done here, in this spotlessly clean and solemn, yet cheerful room. The thought of it made her wondrously happy, as she crossed the quarried floor with quiet steps, and threw open the latticed casement.

"How lovely it is!" she breathed, half aloud. The cottage stood on the slope of a hill, and as far as her eager eyes could reach there stretched a vast plain of meadows and corn-fields, losing themselves in a hazy distance, yet with faint forms lying across the dim horizon, which might be either low soft clouds or far-off mountains. Near at hand the hedgerows were full of fine oak and elm trees, still in full leaf, but with shining gossamer webs woven round them. The sun was touching all the landscape with its earliest and tenderest rays; and low-lying beds of mist, brooding over the hollows, gleamed like pools of silver in the light.

A narrow lane ran past her cottage, and on the other side of it was a corn-field, with the corn gathered into brown shocks, which cast long shadows across the yellow ground; while the restless leaves of a row of aspen trees glistened and danced in the morning breeze. As she leaned through the window, scarcely breathing for very gladness, a lark began to sing so suddenly as almost to startle her with the flutter of sweet song that fell upon her ear. Carola listened as if she had never heard a bird sing before.

"Yes, certainly He might have lived here," she thought, "and yonder corn-field might be that where He walked with the disciples on the Sabbath-day. And it is my own house," she added, as she turned away from the open window.

Home was a thought entirely new to her. She had been happy at school, working hard to gain the knowledge she longed for; but it had been too full of little rules and regulations to possess the freedom of a home, and Carola had always loved freedom. It was very pleasant to her, lonely as she was, to set about her morning's work, kindling the fire, and hanging the kettle on to the chain and hook which fell from the chimney. The housewifely instinct stirred pleasantly within her. She had never tasted a meal so delicious as the breakfast she ate with her door open, and the little birds hopping fearlessly on to her door-sill to pick up the crumbs she scattered for them. How good it was to have a home, especially such a home as the Lord Himself might have lived in.

Her work as schoolmistress was not to begin till the harvest was over, but Carola found plenty to do, and the day passed quickly by. The corn-field before her house was a busy place, and now and then she paused to watch the wagons coming and going, and the band of harvestmen lading them, while little knots of women and children loitered round the gate and under the hedges. Toward evening, when half the field was cleared, they were allowed to enter and glean the stray stalks of corn, and Carola could no longer keep herself away from them. The thin film of school-girl shyness which had crept over her during the last three years was dispersed at once. Bare-headed, as she had been used to run about the streets of London, she stepped out of her cottage, and crossed over into the crowded corn-field. The old impulse to be in the front of any gathering of her fellow-creatures was astir again.

It was a very busy hour, for the sun would be setting soon, and though there would be a long twilight under the harvest moon, night would be come before the field was cleared. The village folk had little time for more than a word and a smile as their new schoolmistress passed to and fro, helping the feeblest and the youngest to make up their tiny shocks of corn. Babies, wrapped up in cloaks and shawls, were lying under the hedge, most of them sleeping with their thumbs in their little mouths; but Carola came upon one that was fretting with low, languid wailing and sobs, unheard by its busy mother. She picked it up with a strange thrill of tenderness, for oh! how long it was since she held a baby in her arms! Soothing it very gently, she strayed on toward a closed gate, over which she could see the setting sun going down in a clear sky, with a soft green light lying all around it.

Almost unconsciously to herself, Carola's sweet ringing voice was heard over the busy corn-field, singing as the lark she listened to in the morning had sung:

"Glory to Thee, my God, this night
For all the blessings of the light."

The first two lines she sang alone, standing with the glow of the setting sun shining on her uplifted face; but then the familiar hymn was taken up by the deep voices of the men at the wagons, and the women who were gleaming lifted themselves up to join in it, and the children shouted it out with delight. A finely solemn feeling fell upon them all; it was almost like being in church the women said to one another afterward. When the hymn was ended, and the new schoolmistress came down the field again, still carrying the baby in her arms, she had won the hearts of all who were there.

Hazelmount was so small a village, that the news of what the young schoolmistress was like, and how she had sung the Evening Hymn in the corn-field, spread throughout it that evening. The men who carried in the last load spoke of it to Mrs. Arnold, of the Grange, as they sat slowly eating their supper, which had been spread for them on a long table in the farm-yard under her own superintendence. She had been too much occupied all day to pay her intended visit to the new schoolmistress, whose cottage had been made ready for her by herself and her servants the day before. The coming of a schoolmistress was always a little event in Hazelmount; and what the men said of her heightened Mrs. Arnold's curiosity. But her husband and her son would tell her more when they came in from the field.

They came in shortly after their harvesters. Both of them were tall, strong, handsome men, with a masterful air about each of them, as if there was no one with any right to dispute their authority. The son stooped down to kiss his mother, and she stroked his arm with her hands fondly.

"Well, and what is our Miss Fielding like?" she asked, somewhat eagerly; "and what is this I hear about you all singing 'Glory to Thee' together in the field?"

"She's as pretty a young maiden as any twenty miles round," answered her husband, "and she sang the hymn as naturally as a bird. She was singing to a baby she'd picked up under the hedge, and it sounded so hearty and so true we couldn't help joining in. It seemed just a right thing to do, and not a soul of us but was the better for it. We'll get her to sing for us at the Harvest Home."

"And what do you think of her, Philip?" asked Mrs. Arnold.

"Oh, she has a good voice," he answered, carelessly.

But he did not tell his mother that he could still see Carola standing bareheaded, with her rapt face toward the setting sun, singing out of the pure gladness of her heart; and that the sweet, joyous tones of her voice were still ringing in his ears. She had not noticed him among his men; how should she, when he was working as hard as any, in a dress very little different? But he should not get the thought of her out of his head until he had seen her again.

The little hamlet of Hazelmount was not altogether a common country village. It lay at the gates of Hazelmount Park, and every cottage in it was built in a picturesque style, and surrounded by pretty gardens, that the eyes of the owners of the park, or those of their numerous guests, should not fall upon anything to shock them. There was no liquor-saloon in it, and only one little store, in a cottage down a by-lane. The parish church was a mile away, but there was a highly decorated private chapel at the hall, the road to which ran through the Park and past the village school; with a chaplain's house half-way between the hall and the school.

Hazelmount was built at the end of a long inland cliff of red sandstone, with the fresh air of thousands of meadows blowing across it whichever way the wind blew. There was no town nearer to it than Market Upton, which was seven miles away, and which was only a small country town numbering five or six thousand inhabitants. No manufactories were within thirty or forty miles of it, and the nearest railway station was four miles away.

The Arnolds of the Grange had lived there from generation to generation. The hall and the estate had passed away from the old family of the Hazelmounts, and had been bought by a rich manufacturer, whose widow, Mrs. Stewart, was still in possession of them. But the Arnolds, though tenant farmers only, held their old farm, with no fear of being disturbed, and inscribed their names in the parish register as their forefathers had done for hundreds of years back. It was the same with many of their laborers, whose names, usually attested by a cross, could be traced in the register of births, marriages, and deaths, as far back as the name of the Arnolds. The laborers who tilled the fields and tended the cattle lived and died, like their employers, under the same old roof-tree beneath which they were born. The ancient half-timber farm-house, with its dependent cottages, was like a strong old oak, with its branches; and the human beings dwelling in them came and passed by as the leaves came and went in their seasons.

It might have seemed, but for the sweet winds blowing all about it, that the air of the little hamlet was heavy and tainted with the deaths of so many untold generations of men and women; and that the cottages, so often visited by the last enemy, would strike a chill like that of a tomb; but the dead were as much forgotten as last summer's leaves. The sun shone as merrily for those who were in the land of the living, and the corn grew as thickly in the furrows where so many departed forefathers had sown and reaped; and the thick trees sheltered the harvesters as kindly; and the earth and all that is therein was as fresh and fruitful and as joyous as it had ever been in earlier and younger times.

The very core and heart of the little hamlet was the Grange; and the rulers of all its concerns and affairs were the Arnolds. There was no other farm in it, and Mr. Arnold was looked upon as the best farmer for many miles round. He was the agent of Mrs. Stewart, who was generally absent from the hall, where he was almost master. The great kitchen at the Grange, which was large enough to hold all the population of Hazelmount, was the common council-chamber and assembly-room of the village. Men and women and children brought their troubles and their wants there, sure of a patient audience from the master or the mistress. This was so natural a custom that the latter would have felt aggrieved if their humble neighbors and dependents had sought help and counsel elsewhere.

Mr. Arnold, like his father before him, was churchwarden; and neither he nor his wife and son were ever absent from their great square pew next to the reading-desk in the parish church. They were men much in earnest about doing their duty both toward God and man, and they were held in high repute as men of honor and integrity.

Mrs. Arnold went somewhat beyond this in her religion. Though she could not induce her husband to deviate from the customs of his forefathers, by having family prayer at any other time than Sunday night, she read some chapters in the Bible to herself, morning and evening, with scrupulous care; and as long as Philip was only a boy she had required him to read with her. She made a point of going through the Bible from beginning to end once a year; and she had accomplished this feat thirty times. When any of their cottagers were ill, she visited them daily, and read to them suitable and impressive passages of Scripture; sometimes with an inward thrill of emotion which made her feel that there was something more in the familiar words than she had yet laid hold of. It is natural to any community of human beings to seek a spiritual guide; and for many years Mrs. Arnold had been the spiritual guide at Hazelmount, as being the one among them who stood in relationship to the unseen world.

No stranger had settled in Hazelmount for many years; in fact, there were no other dwellings than the cottages of the farm laborers, and a few of the workpeople belonging to the hall gardens and the Park. The only persons from outside the old time-worn circle of village life were the mistresses of Lady Hazelmount's school, who came and went away again after a longer or shorter sojourn in the place. They had been a class of well-conducted, commonplace young women, who felt themselves above the cottagers, and were looked down upon as social inferiors by the families of well-to-do farmers in the neighborhood. Mrs. Arnold, in the absence of any lady at the hall, stood in the place of a patroness to them. She was invariably kind to them, and supplied them with frequent welcome presents of farm-house produce, which materially added to their salary, and Mr. Arnold was liberal in his presents to them; but there had been no attempt on either side at intimate social intercourse. The schoolmistresses had found the place too dull and lonely for them, and they had seldom stayed longer than one twelvemonth.

THE BODY OF CHRIST.

S. S. Lesson for March 29, 1 Cor. 12: 12-27. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Places in the Body Assigned—Complete Representation—Patience Represented by Afflicted Members—Representatives of Wisdom and Power—Members used by the Head—All Members Needed—Relative Importance—The Less Honorable Members—Correction only from the Head—Perfect Union of Members—The Complete Bride.

"Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ?" (1 Cor. 6: 15) asks Paul; and the same man makes this statement, "We being many are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another" (Rom. 12: 5). He goes even further, and says, "We are members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones" (Eph. 5: 30). "By one Spirit" are we all baptized into one body; "fitted into Christ by the Holy Ghost, our place in the body is not by any chance, it is arranged of God, and equally so our membership one of another: "God hath tempered the body together."

Many of us are troubled that we so little or so partially manifest our dear Lord. His thought is to be by the whole body unitedly. He may shine in His patience through one member, who may be tried on that point; in His wisdom through another, whose life may just present the opportunity for this very thing. His power may be manifest in another. Some may manifest Christ in His gentleness, some in the spirit of discernment which another may not so manifest. And thus we are taught that there are "diversities of gifts," as well as different fruits of the Spirit (Gal. 5: 22). In the cherubim, Christ is represented in four characters: as the lion, the ox, the man, and the eagle—the kingly, the sacrificial, the human, and the divine side of His character—but it takes all the four to shew forth Christ. Thus it comes to pass that "to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; to another faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing by the same Spirit; to another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to another discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues." But these gifts of the Spirit are no more at the command of the members of the body than are the fruits of the Spirit—love, joy, peace, etc.

A member of our bodies does not use itself; it is used by the Head, "All these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit." Then are diversities of operations, but it is the same all in all. How often Satan has tried to cast us down, when we have seen something of the spiritual gifts and the usefulness of a fellow-member in the body! We have had something like shame in thinking how short we came, and yet we knew that all we were and all we had was the Lord's, not only offered to Him, but accepted by Him. The precious lesson had been lost upon us that "God set the members in the body, as it hath pleased Him. And if they were all one member, where were the body?" A very active member of the body of Christ, winning his thousands to the Lord, untiring and full of zeal, may seem to be much more necessary to the body than other members, just as a hand is. But one who, as an eye of the body, endures as seeing Him who is invisible, who sees the dangers of Christian workers, and having the faith of God (Mark 11: 22, margin), asks and receives blessing wherever he sees the need, may be equally or even more necessary. He may reckon himself, and be reckoned by others, as one of the feeble members; but "those members of the body which seem to be more feeble are necessary"—how necessary only God knows. "If the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body?" The ear which listens to God may make a very poor preacher, and may seem to be a feeble member; but none are more really blest to the body than such as take in quietly God's thought, and are still enough in soul to hear His voice.

GOD'S LISTENERS

are indispensable in the body. We can never be the judges as to whether any of the gifts of the blessed Spirit can or cannot be dispensed with in His working. There are some who think and say that the Holy Ghost's working in the way of physical healing or in the gift of tongues is not needed in our day; and that His working in wisdom and knowledge alone is necessary. Let God be the judge; He hath "set the members every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased Him," and it is the workman who must judge what tools his work requires; the Head must judge with what member he can carry out His purposes.

We are specially told that those members of the body which we think to be less honorable, upon these we bestow more abundant honor. That is to say, when a brother or sister in the Lord is particularly trying to our spirit, when such an one seems to spoil the meeting by the manifestation of self in his prayers or in the words he utters, or when a converted servant does anything but adore the doctrine of God her Saviour in all things (Tit. 2: 10)—when a Christian worker manifests the strongest self-will and the most domineering spirit, and such as these seem to be a real hindrance to the truth—these very members are the most necessary of all. How so? Because they give the most glorious opportunities for the manifestation of Christ in their fellow-members. Oh, how often we attempt to deal with one of our fellow-members as though we possessed power to set him right where he is wrong! As well might a member of our natural body attempt to aid another member without any direction from the brain. Loosen the connection with the brain, and the physical member becomes powerless; suspend it, as in the case of madness or of epilepsy, and the hands, set free from the control of the brain, beat and bruise the head, tear the skin off the face, or maim some other part. The feet, undirected by the brain, bear the poor body into places of danger, " Ofttimes it hath cast him into the fire, and into the waters, to destroy him" (Mark 9: 22). When we attempt to touch a fellow-member, except through Jesus our Head, we always do harm rather than good. We wound the spirit, provoke resentment, and arouse the flesh. The Head alone can set another member right. When we only touch our fellow-members by going to Christ about them, He shows them what they cannot take from us.

It was His one great prayer, "That they all may be one; as Thou, Father, art in me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us" (John 17: 21). And here we see the precious truth that "God hath tempered the body together, having given more abundant honor to that part which lacked; that there might be NO SCHISM IN THE BODY."

Just as in our human bodies, not one member can be spared, so it is in the body of Christ. Not one of the feeblest, most unworthy, most unsatisfactory Christians could be spared from the body. "We are members one of another," we belong to one another, whether we will or not. The heathen who was converted yesterday in India or in China belongs to us as our hand and foot belong one to another. "If one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honored, all the members rejoice with it." The whole body is affected by each member, consciously or unconsciously. Let an attack of neuralgia gripe a hold of agony upon one of the great nerve centres, there is not a member of our physical frame which is not dragged down into weakness or suffering with it. And exactly so is it with the church of Christ. And also the honor of Jesus, the life of Jesus, belongs to every member of His body. But it is only as the members of our body respond to the Head that they can respond one to another. Some grit or other substance enters the eye; a tiny branch-nerve communicates it instantly to the brain, and the brain dictates to the hand what is to be done to remove it. Thus through the head, the hand and the eye act as members one of another.

It takes all Christians combined to make a bride for the Lamb, a church which comes up to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ. One member, or even many members, cannot perfectly manifest the fullness of Jesus. But He wills that we "speaking the truth in love, may grow up into Him in all things, which is the Head, even Christ; From whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working" (God's working) "in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love" (Eph. 4: 15, 16). Every joint through which Jesus has not full play, every one which does not freely subserve the interests of the Head and of the body, is really hindering the full manifestation of the love of God to the lost world. In writing to the Colossians, Paul speaks of such a one as is "vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind," wanting to be something in himself, "And not holding the Head, from which all the body, by joints and bands having nourishment ministered, and kept together, increaseth with the increase of God." We may hold a very feeble place in the body of Christ, but, thank God, we are necessary, just as every member is necessary. If we see defects or lacks in ourselves, let us praise and thank our God that some other member responds to Him in that point where we do not. The plan of the body is not with us, but with Him. Let us leave to Him where to set us in the body, and how to temper us together with our fellow-members.

THE MEMBERS OF PRESIDENT CLEVELAND'S CABINET.

THE CABINET.

PORTRAITS of the seven statesmen who compose the Cabinet of President Cleveland appear this week on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. From the time the election of Mr. Cleveland to the highest office in the land was declared an accomplished fact, speculations have been made to the men whom he would select for his Cabinet. Very much of the success or failure of an Administration, as we know by experience, depends upon the character of the men who surround the President by his own invitation. They are called upon to act in a double capacity—first, as chiefs of the respective departments of the Federal Government, and secondly as advisers of the President. It was natural, therefore, that some curiosity, if not anxiety, should be felt about the selections President Cleveland would make.

Beside this solicitude, which is common to the commencement of every Administration, there was at this time an additional element of uncertainty. It is now twenty-four years since the departments were controlled by Democratic chiefs. Almost a generation has passed away in that time, and it was evident that in every case the new officials would be men who had never before held offices of so great responsibility. That they would be unknown men was of course not to be expected; but such knowledge as the public had of them would be of their legislative rather than of their administrative capacity. The discussion therefore commenced with the question of who would be fit men for the various places. Later it changed its point of view, and the probabilities of the selections, based upon the movements of the President-elect, were the chief consideration. It is a remarkable fact that nearly every one of the nominations the President sent to the Senate on March 5th had, with an approach to unanimity, been indicated, and in some cases advocated, by the press of both parties.

THOMAS F. BAYARD,
Secretary of State.

AT the head of the Cabinet, in the position of the highest honor and responsibility, is Thomas Francis Bayard, of Delaware. His service of sixteen years in the United States Senate has rendered his name a familiar one throughout the country. Mr. Bayard is the fifth of his family who has represented his State in the upper legislative chamber. His father, uncle, grandfather, and great-grandfather were each in their day sent by Delaware to the Senate.

The family to which Mr. Bayard belongs is an ancient and honorable one, the record stretching back to the ages of French chivalry, and including among its representatives the honored name of Chevalier Bayard, whose valor and virtue won him the title of "the knight without fear and reproach." In the history of France, at the close of the fifteenth and the commencement of the sixteenth centuries, his name is a prominent one. The American branch of the family is descended from three brothers, who came to this country in 1647 with their mother. She was the widow of a French Huguenot minister, whose three fatherless boys she carried across the Atlantic to find the liberty of conscience denied them in the land of their birth. The present Secretary of State is sixth in the line of descent from the Huguenot preacher, whose great-grandson, James Asheton Bayard, was the Secretary's grandfather. The family secured an estate in Delaware, in which State, at Wilmington, Thomas Francis, the subject of this sketch, was born, October 29th, 1828. He is therefore in his fifty-seventh year.

Mr. Bayard was intended by his father for a business career, and at the close of his educational training he was placed in a business house in New York and subsequently in Philadelphia. When he was twenty years of age he was recalled to the parental roof by the death of his elder brother, which event changed his own future. He was now the eldest son, and his father naturally desired to associate him with himself in his own profession of the law. Three years later Mr. Bayard, senior, was elected Senator, and the main burden of the business fell upon the shoulders of his son. He was so engaged when the great crisis of 1860 came upon the nation. Mainly through the influence of the Bayards, Delaware was kept out of the secession current, though their sympathies with the seceding States made them vigorous opponents of the war and strenuous advocates of a peace policy. It was at the memorable convention held at Dover, Del., on June 27th, 1861, that Mr. Bayard, in the absence of his father, delivered the memorable speech which fixed his position as "a copperhead," and which has since prevented Mr. Bayard receiving the nomination of his party for the Presidency.

In 1869 Mr. Bayard, senior, died, and his son succeeded him in the Senate. He has been twice re-elected, and has always been one of the most influential leaders of his party. He is tall and spare of frame, quick and active beyond his years; he has the fresh, healthy complexion of a youth, bright, sparkling blue eyes, and a broad, high forehead. He married early in his career Miss Louisa Lee, the daughter of a banker in Baltimore. Ten of their twelve children are living.

DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury.

MR. MANNING'S career is a typical one. At starting he seemed to have everything against him, and in any other country in the world would have been considered a very fortunate man if he had been able to save enough money out of his weekly earnings to support him in sickness and old age. Here, the genius, industry, and perseverance he possessed enabled him to rise, until now he holds the proud position of second officer in the Cabinet, and is at the head of the department in which are conducted the vast financial concerns of the nation.

Mr. Manning was born in Albany, N. Y., August 16th, 1831. He is therefore now in his fifty-fourth year. He is of English, Irish, and Dutch extraction. His parents were so poor that they found it necessary to send him to work when he was only eleven years of age. He found employment as office boy in the establishment of the Albany Atlas, where he swept the office, ran errands, and was at the beck and call of every one on the premises. But the boy meant to rise, and he did his work faithfully. His evenings were given to study, and he soon learned to read and set type. In a few years he rose from grade to grade until he was foreman of the composing room. The paper was merged into the Argus, and then Manning distinguished himself in a new line. He had taught himself short-hand, and obtained a place on the Argus staff of reporters. The same faithful, painstaking character distinguished him there, his reports of the State Senate proceedings being remarkably accurate and reliable.

He became, while engaged as a reporter, intimately acquainted with prominent politicians at Albany—an acquaintance which was maintained after he left the reporters' desk and became managing editor of the Argus. In 1873 he assumed sole charge of the Argus, and was elected President of the company, which position he yet holds, though he has done little or no writing for some time. When the fight against the Tweed Ring was begun, Mr. Manning identified himself with Samuel J. Tilden, Charles O'Connor, and other anti-Ring Democrats. He became a fast and trusted friend of Mr. Tilden, and was a prominent member of the Democratic State Convention in 1874, at which Mr. Tilden was nominated for Governor. The Albany Argus was unflinching in its advocacy of all the measures of reform which were started and pushed forward by Governor Tilden. Mr. Manning has been a member of the Democratic State Committee since 1876. He was its Secretary in 1879 and 1880 and its Chairman in 1881, 1882, and 1883.

It is not alone as a politician that the new Secretary of the Treasury has won distinction.

He has developed an extraordinary degree of skill as a financier and an organizer of various business enterprises. In 1873 he became Director in the National Commercial Bank of Albany. In 1881 he was elected Vice-President and he succeeded to the Presidency in the following year upon the death of General Robert H. Pruyn. For several years Mr. Manning has been the Director for Albany in the Albany and Susquehanna Railway Company. He is Par Commissioner and a Director in the Albany Electric Light Company. He is also one of the Trustees of the Fort Orange Club.

Mr. Manning was wedded to Miss Mary Little in 1853, by whom he had four children, one of whom—James Hilton Manning—recently became managing editor of the Argus. Mr. Manning's first wife died in 1882, and on October 19th last he married Miss Mary Margarita Fryer, of Albany.

WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

AN entirely different man in tastes, associations, and early education from the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury is Judge Endicott, who has accepted the portfolio of war in President Cleveland's Cabinet. It is a curious turn of affairs that has placed a distinguished lawyer, with no military experience beyond that of captain of a militia company, at the head of the Army Department. It is not, however, necessary for the efficient discharge of his duties that he should have been identified with the army. There have been precedents in this and other countries for such appointments. There have been successful chiefs of the department of military affairs who never wore a uniform, and of the department of naval affairs who never were on shipboard except as passengers. Happily for us, we have no complications or hand which threaten to involve us in war, and the chief duties of the new Secretary will be to see that the affairs of the army are conducted economically, honestly, and with justice. We want no more of the disgraceful proceedings of drunken officers kept in their places in defiance of public decency, which characterized Mr. Hayes's administration; and it may be hoped from Mr. Endicott's high moral character that he will work a reform in that respect.

William Crowninshield Endicott is fifty-eight years of age, having been born in 1827 at Salem, Mass. He is said to be the oldest lineal descendant of John Endicott, the first Governor of Massachusetts under the charter from the Crown in 1629. He gets his middle name—Crowninshield—from his mother, who was a daughter of Jacob Crowninshield, Thomas Jefferson's Secretary of the Navy from 1805 to 1809. He was graduated from Harvard College in 1847, subsequently took a course in law, and was admitted to the Massachusetts Bar in 1850. He married his cousin, who was a daughter of George Peabody, and he has now one son and one daughter. A few years after his admission to the bar he formed a partnership with the late J. W. Perry, and continued with him until his appointment, by Governor Washburn, to a seat on the Supreme Bench in 1873. This position he held until 1882, when he resigned on account of his health.

His resignation was an act which indicates the high and honorable spirit that has characterized his whole career. His health became impaired by long service in the Massachusetts Supreme Court—an overworked body—and he went abroad on six months' leave of absence about three years ago. While in Europe he chafed under the feeling of limitation in his vacation, and also under his delicate sense of obligation toward his associates on the bench, who were in the meantime doing his work. Consequently, he early made up his mind to cut loose from all public duty as a prerequisite to complete rest, and forwarded his resignation from across the water. He thereupon began to recuperate rapidly, and in the course of a year or two returned wholly restored in health, and with a disposition to resume an active career. Politically Mr. Endicott is of Whig antecedents, his affiliation with the Democratic party dating from the Bell-Everett campaign of 1860; but he has never been an active politician. Last fall, it may be recalled, he was the candidate of his party for Governor in the State, but did not himself appear in the canvass, and received a comparatively small vote. As a lawyer and a judge Mr. Endicott holds high rank, and his reputation is untarnished. He will bring to the Cabinet sound judicial knowledge and acute sagacity.

WILLIAM C. WHITNEY,
Secretary of the Navy.

The head of the Naval Department is also a lawyer. He is one of the leaders and originators of the County Democracy of New York, established to counteract the influence of Tammany Hall, and was a zealous supporter of Mr. Cleveland's nomination.

William Collins Whitney was born at Conway, Mass., in 1839. His father, General James S. Whitney, who died in 1878, was a prominent railroad man and a well-known Democrat, having served as Superintendent of the Government Arsenal at Springfield, Mass., under the administration of President Pierce, and as Collector of Customs at Boston under President Buchanan. After going through the Williston Seminary at East Hampton William C. Whitney entered Yale College, where he was graduated with honor in 1863. Among his college classmates was Professor William G. Sumner, the well-known free-trade writer. Mr. Whitney was also graduated at the Harvard Law School, after which he came to New York and entered the law office of Abraham R. Lawrence, now one of the judges of the Supreme Court.

Mr. Whitney made his entrance into political life with Abraham R. Lawrence, during the campaign against the Tweed Ring in 1870 and 1871. In the latter year he was associated with Governor Tilden, Mayor Wickham, and others in the campaign when the Apollo Hall organization, of which Mayor Wickham was the head, aided in the overthrow of the Tweed Ring. In 1872 Mr. Whitney ran for District Attorney on the Apollo Hall ticket, and was defeated. He afterward joined the Tammany Hall organization, but remained in close relations with Mr. Tilden. In 1875 he was appointed by Mayor Wickham Corporation Counsel, to succeed E. Delafield Smith, removed.

Mr. Whitney's most valuable work has been performed in the defence of the city of New York against rings and corporations which preyed on the city treasury. When he became the official adviser of the mayor he was placed as a barrier between the Public Treasury and the establishment of claims aggregating millions of dollars growing out of the ring frauds. There were already over thirty-eight hundred suits pending against the city, involving $15,000,000 to $20,000,000, and new ones were beginning every day by the score. He held this office until December, 1882, having twice been reappointed, when he resigned the position, in which he was entitled to continue for two years more. During his term of seven years he not only saved large sums of money, but instituted a system for the protection of the city's legal rights which it is estimated that his saving to the city directly amounted to $2,000,000, and indirectly to much more. Mr. Whitney will find in the Navy Department abundant opportunity for the exercise of the talents which have made him famous in New York.

LUCIUS Q. C. LAMAR,
Secretary of the Interior.

This selection on the part of President Cleveland is significant of the advance made in the work of reconciliation of the sections. Mr. Lamar was a prominent leader in the secession movement, and served under the Southern flag in the war as colonel. He achieved military distinction at the battle of James Island, or Secessionville, near Charleston, S. C., June 16th, 1862. According to the Charleston Mercury, he directed the opening fire of the Confederate batteries in defence of the works, and "to his cool courage and energy in the early part of the action is due the preservation of the position. His brave example and personal efforts greatly inspired his command." He was finally wounded by a rifle bullet and carried from the field. In 1863 Jefferson Davis sent him on a diplomatic mission to Russia, which failed to accomplish anything in behalf of the Confederacy. Mr. Lamar has never attempted to ingratiate himself with the North by concealing or denying his sympathies or pretending that he has changed his mind. Nevertheless he frankly accepted the results of the war, and his speeches have been since that loyal and frankly patriotic.

Lucius Quintus Curtius Lamar was born in Putnam County, Ga., in September, 1825. He was graduated from Emory College when twenty years old, and after studying law was admitted to the bar in 1847. Two years later he removed to Oxford, Miss., and was there elected Assistant Professor of Mathematics in the State University. He resigned the next year and went to Covington, Ga., to resume the practice of law. In 1853 he was elected to the Georgia Legislature. After serving one term he moved back to Mississippi again and settled on a plantation in Lafayette County. He was elected to the Thirty-fifth and again to the Thirty-sixth Congresses, but resigned his seat in 1860 to participate in the Secession Convention in his State. He joined the Confederate Army as Lieutenant-Colonel of the Nineteenth Mississippi Regiment in 1861, and soon became its colonel.

After the war Colonel Lamar was elected Professor of Political Economy and Social Science in the Mississippi University, and in 1867 he was transferred to the Law Professorship in the same institution. He was elected to the Forty-third Congress, but attracted little public notice until he delivered an eloquent eulogy of Charles Sumner in the House of Representatives, March 14th, 1874. That address made Congressman Lamar somewhat conspicuous among his associates for a time. In 1877 he took his seat in the United States Senate.

WILLIAM F. VILAS,
Postmaster General.

THE representative of the West in the Cabinet is the Postmaster-General, who will sit at the same board with Mr. Lamar, who, had he met him twenty-three years ago on the battle-field, he would not have treated as a colleague.

William Freeman Vilas is the youngest member of the Cabinet; he is only forty-five years of age. He was born in Chelsea, Orange County, Vt., July 9th, 1840. His father, Judge Levi B. Vilas, took pride in showing to friends a genealogical tree which took root in the heraldic records of the time of Henry III. in England. The family name was originally Villiers, but the corruptions of pronunciation and spelling through the successive ages brought it down to Vilas. The subject of this sketch went to Wisconsin with his parents in 1851. His father settled in Madison, and soon established a lucrative law practice. He built a stately stone mansion, which is still one of the most imposing residences in Madison. Judge Vilas became Mayor of the city, and subsequently was Speaker of the Assembly. William F. Vilas was educated in the Wisconsin State University, from which institution he was graduated at the age of eighteen years. He studied law in the Albany Law School, and in 1860 was admitted to practice in the Supreme Courts of New York and Wisconsin. He opened a law office in Madison, and had just got well started in his profession when the war broke out.

Young Vilas organized a company of volunteers in 1862, and was elected captain of it. The company went to the front as part of the Twenty-third Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers. It took part in several engagements, and Captain Vilas's conduct was such that he was promoted in quick succession to the ranks of major and lieutenant-colonel, respectively. Owing to the illness of the colonel he was in command of his regiment for about three months while in the field. At the close of the war he returned to Madison and resumed his profession, in which he has been very successful. He married, in 1866, Miss Anna M. Fox, of Oregon, Wis. Colonel and Mrs. Vilas have three children.

AUGUSTUS H. GARLAND, Attorney General.

ANOTHER prominent leader of the Confederate States, who now takes his seat in the Cabinet of the President, is Mr. Garland, of Arkansas. He was born at Covington, Tenn., in June, 1832. When he was only one year old his parents, who were natives of North Carolina, removed to Arkansas and settled on the rich bottom lands of the Red River Valley. They gave their son a thorough education, and fitted him for the bar. He first practised law in Washington, Ark., but three years later he removed to Little Rock. A Whig in politics, he was made a Presidential Elector on the Bell and Everett ticket in 1860. When all probability of a peaceful settlement of national difficulties seemed hopeless Mr. Garland sided with the people of his adopted State, and was elected to the Provincial Congress which met at Montgomery, Ala., in 1861, and framed the Constitution of the Confederate States. He also served in both Houses of the Confederate Congress.

After the war Mr. Garland resumed the practice of his profession in Little Rock. Desiring to practice in the United States Supreme Court he found himself much hampered by the iron-clad test oath, which was designed to exclude from public office and from practice in all the United States courts all men who had taken a voluntary part in the rebellion. In 1865 Mr. Garland, who had been admitted to the privileges of the Supreme Court in 1860, petitioned to practice there again without taking the iron-clad oath. The printed argument which he submitted on his own behalf attracted wide attention among lawyers, and marked its author as a man of unquestioned ability. A majority of the court sustained his views upon three of the four points raised. Four judges dissented.

While this test case was pending Mr. Garland was elected to the United States Senate for the term beginning March 4th, 1867, but he was not permitted to take his seat. He continued the practice of law until 1874, when he was elected Governor. After serving two years he was again elected United States Senator, and this time he took his seat in March, 1877. He was re-elected in 1883 for the term to expire in March, 1889. Seven years ago Senator Garland lost his wife, and his mother lives with him to care for his four children. Senator Garland is

A TOTAL ABSTAINER.

A correspondent of the New York Sun thus relates the circumstances under which he abandoned the use of intoxicating liquors: "He was asked one day how it happened that he, coming as he did from a part of the country where liquor was believed to be used as commonly as coffee, was a teetotaler. 'Well, it was this way: I used to drink as regularly and as frequently as any one, but one day some years ago I was walking through our cemetery at Little Rock, and I saw the grave of one very bright man who would have been my age, and then I saw another, and another, until I suddenly realized that almost all the young men with whom I began life had gone, and I almost alone was left, and I knew what had carried them away. Well, as I had been spared, it occurred to me that I had certainly had my share of alcohol, so I made up my mind that I wouldn't drink anybody else's share; that wouldn't be fair. So I just stopped right then and there.'"

THE BOY HOME.

In all ages of the world it has been customary to celebrate joyful events by festivity—the signing of treaties, the proclamation of peace, the Christmas, the marriage. However much on other days of the year our table may have stinted supply, on Thanksgiving Day there must be something bounteous. And all the comfortable homes of Christendom have at some time celebrated joyful events by banquet and festivity.

Something has happened in the old homestead greater than anything that has ever happened before. A favorite son whom the world supposed would become a vagabond and outlaw forever has got tired of sight-seeing and has returned to

HIS FATHER'S HOUSE.

The world said he never would come back. The old man always said his son would come. He had been looking for him day after day and year after year. He knew he would come back. Now, having returned to his father's house, the father proclaims celebration.

There is a calf in the paddock that has been kept up and fed to utmost capacity so as to be ready for some occasion of joy that might come along. Ah! there never will be a grander day on the old homestead than this day. Let the butchers do their work, and the housekeepers bring in to the table the smoking meat. The musicians will take their places, and the gay groups will move up and down the floor. All the friends and neighbors are gathered in, and extra supply is sent out to the table of the servants. The father presides at the table, and says grace, and thanks God that his long-absent boy is home again. Oh! how they missed him; to have him back. One brother indeed stands pouting at the back door and says, "This is a great ado about nothing; this bad boy should have been chastened instead of greeted; 'veal is too good for him!'" But the father says, "Nothing is too good, nothing is good enough." There sits the young man, glad at the hearty reception, but a shadow of sorrow flitting across his brow at the remembrance of the trouble he had seen. All ready now. Let the covers lift! Music. He was dead and he is alive again! He was lost and he is found! By such bold imagery does the Bible set forth the merry-making when a soul comes home to God.

HOW GLAD THEY ARE

I. First of all there is

THE NEW CONVERT'S JOY.

It is no tame thing to become a Christian. The most tremendous moment in a man's life is when he surrenders himself to God. The grandest time on the father's homestead is when the boy comes back. Among the great throng who in the parlors of this church professed Christ one night was a young man who next morning rang my door-bell and said: "Sir, I cannot contain myself with the joy I feel; I came here this morning to express it. I have found more joy in five minutes in serving God than in all the years of my prodigality, and I came to say so."

You have seen, perhaps, a man running for his physical liberty and the officers of the law after him, and you saw him escape, or afterward you heard the judge had pardoned him, and how great was the glee of that rescued man; but it is a very tame thing that, compared with the running for one's everlasting life—the terrors of the law after him, or Christ coming in to pardon and bless and rescue and save. You remember John Bunyan in his great story tells how the Pilgrim put his fingers in his ears, and ran, crying, "Life, life, eternal life!" A poor car-driver in this city some months ago, after years having had to struggle to support his family, suddenly was informed that a large inheritance was his, and there was joy amounting to bewilderment; but that is a small thing compared with the experience of one when he has put in his hands the title-deed to the joys, the raptures, the splendors of Heaven, and he can truly say, "Its mansions are mine, its temples are mine, its songs are mine, its God is mine!"

Oh, it is no tame thing to become a Christian. It is a merry-making. It is the killing of the fatted calf. It is jubilee. You know the Bible never compares it to a funeral, but always compares it to something bright. It is more apt to be than anything else. It is compared in the Bible to the water, bright, flashing water; to the morning, roscate, fireworked, mountain-transfigured morning. I wish I could to-day take all the Bible expressions about pardon and peace and life and comfort and hope and Heaven and twist them into one garland, and put it on the brow of the humblest child of God in this assemblage, and cry: "Wear it, wear it now, wear it forever, son of God, daughter of the Lord God Almighty. Oh, the joy of the new convert! Oh, the gladness of the Christian service!"

You have seen sometimes a man in a religious assembly get up and give his experience. Well, Paul gave his experience. He arose in the presence of two churches, the church on earth and the Church in Heaven, and he said: "Now this is my experience: 'sorrowful, yet always rejoicing—poor, yet making many rich—having nothing, yet possessing all things.'" If the people in this house this morning knew the joys of the Christian religion, they would all pass over into the kingdom of God the next moment. When Daniel Sandeman was dying of cholera his attendant said: "Have you much pain?" "Oh," he replied, "since I found the Lord I have never had any pain except sin." Then they said to him: "Would you like to send a message to your friends?" "Yes, I would; tell them that only last night the love of Jesus came rushing into my soul like the surges of the sea, and I had to cry out, 'Stop, Lord, it is enough; stop, Lord, enough!'" Oh, the joys of this Christian religion!

Just pass over from those tame joys in which you are indulging—joys of this world—into the raptures of the Gospel. The world cannot satisfy you; you have found that out—Alexander longing for other worlds to conquer, and yet drowned in his own bottle; Byron whipped by disquietudes around the world; Voltaire cursing his own soul while all the streets of Paris were applauding him; Henry VIII. consuming with hatred against poor Thomas à Becket—all illustrations of the fact that this world cannot make a man happy. The very man who poisoned the pommel of the saddle on which Queen Elizabeth rode, shouted in the street, "God save the Queen!" One moment the world applauds and the next moment the world anathematizes. Oh, come over into this greater joy, this sublime solace, this magnificent beatitude. The night after and there were thousands of wounded on the field, and the ambulances had not come, one Christian soldier lying there a-dying under the starlight began to sing:

"There is a land of pure delight,"

And when he came to the next line there were scores of voices uniting:

"Where saints immortal reign."

The song was caught up all through the fields among the wounded, until it was said there were at least ten thousand wounded men reuniting their voices as they came to the verse:

"There everlasting spring abides,
And never-withering flowers;
Death like a narrow stream divides
That Heavenly land from ours."

Oh, it is a great religion to live by, and it is a great religion to die by. There is only one heart-throb between you and that religion this morning. Just look into the face of your pardoning God, and surrender yourself for time and for eternity, and He is yours, and Heaven is yours, and all is yours. Some of you, like the young man of the text, have gone far astray. I know not the history, but you know it, you know it.

THE CHARMED CIRCLE.

When a young man went forth into life, the legend says, his guardian angel went forth with him, and getting him into a field the guardian angel swept a circle clear around where the young man stood. It was a circle of virtue and honor, and he must not step beyond that circle. Armed foes came down, but were obliged to halt at the circle—they could not pass. But one day a temptress with diamonded hand stretched forth and crossed that circle with the hand, and the tempted soul took it, and by that one fell grip was brought beyond the circle and died. Some of you have stepped beyond that circle. Would you not like this day by the grace of God to step back? This, I say to you, is your hour of salvation. There was in what is called the clock scene. Flat down on the pillow in helpless sickness, she could not move her head or move her hand. She was waiving for the hour when the ministers of state should gather in angry contest, and, worried and worn out by the coming hour, and in momentary absence of the nurse, in the power, the strange power which delirium sometimes gives one, she arose and stood in front of the clock, and stood there watching the clock when the nurse returned. The nurse said, "Do you see anything peculiar about that clock?" She made no answer, but soon died. There is a clock scene in every history. If some of you I would rise from the bed of lethargy and come out from your delirium of sin and look on the clock of your destiny this morning, you would see and hear something you have not seen or heard before, and every tick of the minute, and every stroke of the hour, and every swing of the pendulum would say: "Now, now, now, now!" Oh, come home to your Father's house. Come home, oh, prodigal, from the wilderness. Come home, come home!

II. But I notice that when the prodigal came there was

THE FATHER'S JOY.

He did not greet him with any formal "How do you do?" He did not come out and say, "You are unfit to enter; go out and wash in the trough by the well, and then you can come in; we have had enough trouble with you." Ah! no. When the proprietor of that estate proclaimed festival, it was an outburst of a father's love and a father's joy. God is your Father. I have not much sympathy with that description of God I sometimes hear, as though He were a Turkish Sultan, hard and unsympathetic, and listening not to the cry of His subjects. A man told me he saw in one of the Eastern lands a king riding along, and two men were in altercation, and one charged the other with having eaten his rice; and the king said, "Then slay the man, and by post-mortem examination find whether he has eaten the rice." And he was slain. Ah! the cruelty of a scene like that. Our God is not a Sultan, not a Czar, not a despot, but a Father—kind, loving, forgiving, and He makes all Heaven ring again when a prodigal comes back. "I have no pleasure," He says, "in the death of him that dieth."

ALL MAY BE SAVED.

If a man does not get to Heaven it is because he will not go there. No difference the color, no difference the history, no difference the antecedents, no difference the surroundings, no difference the sin. When the white horses of Christ's victory are brought out to celebrate the eternal triumph you may ride one of them, and as God is greater than all, His joy is greater, and when a soul comes back there is in His heart the surging of an infinite ocean of gladness, and to express that gladness it takes all the rivers of pleasure, and all the thrones of pomp, and all the ages of eternity. It is a joy deeper than all depth, and higher than all height, and wider than all width, and vaster than all immensity. It overtops, it undergirds, it outweighs all the unfitted splendor and joy of the universe. Who can tell what God's joy is?

You remember reading the story of a king, who on some great day of festivity scattered silver and gold among the people, who sent valuable presents to his courtiers; but methinks when a soul comes back, God is so glad that to express His joy He flings out new worlds into space, and kindles up new suns, and rolls among the white-robed anthems of the redeemed a greater hallelujah, while with a voice that reverberates among the mountains of frankincense and is echoed back from the everlasting gates, He cries: "This, my son, was dead, and he is alive again!"

At the opening of the Exposition in New Orleans, I saw a Mexican flutist, and he played the solo, and then afterward the eight or ten bands of music, accompanied by the great organ, came in; but the sound of that one flute as compared with all the orchestra was greater than all the combined joy of the universe when compared with the resounding heart of Almighty God.

For ten years a father went three times a day to the depot. His son went off in aggravating circumstances, but the father said, "He will come back." The strain was too much, and his mind parted, and three times a day the father went. In the early morning, he watched the train, its arrival, the stepping out of the passengers, and then the departure of the train. At noon he was there again watching the advance of the train, watching the departure. At night, there again; watching the coming, watching the going for ten years. He was so sure his son would come back. God has been watching and waiting for some of you, my brothers, ten years, twenty years, thirty years, forty years, perhaps fifty years—waiting, watching, watching; and if this morning the prodigal should come home what a scene of gladness and festivity, and how the great Father's heart would rejoice at your coming home. You will come, some of you, will you not? You will, you will!

III. I notice also that when a prodigal comes home there is joy.

JOY OF THE MINISTERS

Oh, it is a grand thing to preach this gospel. I know there has been a great deal said about the trials and the hardships of the Christian ministry. I wish somebody would write a good, rousing book about the joys of the Christian ministry. Since I entered the profession I have seen more of the goodness of God than I will be able to celebrate in all eternity. I know some boast about their equilibrium, and they do not rise into enthusiasm, and they do not break down with emotion; but I confess to you plainly that when I see a man coming to God and giving up his sin I feel in body, mind, and soul a transport. When I see a man who is bound hand and foot in evil habit emancipated, I rejoice over it as though it were my own emancipation. When in our last communion service such throngs of young and old stood at these altars, and in the presence of Heaven and earth and hell attested their allegiance to Jesus Christ, I felt a joy something akin to that which the apostle describes when he says: "Whether in the body I cannot tell, or out of the body I cannot tell; God knoweth."

Oh, have not ministers a right to rejoice when a prodigal comes home? They blew the trumpet, and ought they not to be glad of the gathering of the host? They pointed to the full supply, and ought they not to rejoice when souls pant as the hart for the water-brooks? They came forth saying, "All things are now ready" ought they not to rejoice when the prodigal sits down at the banquet?

Life-insurance men will all tell you that ministers of religion as a class live longer than any other. It is confirmed by the statistics of all those who calculate upon human longevity. Why is it? There is more draft upon the nervous system than in any other profession, and their toil is most exhausting. I have seen ministers kept on miserable stipends by parsimonious congregations who wondered at the dulness of the sermons, when the men of God were perplexed almost to death by questions of liveliness, and had not enough nutritious food to keep any fire in their temperament. No fuel, no fire. I have sometimes seen the inside of the life of many of the American clergymen—never accepting their hospitality, because they cannot afford it; but I have seen them struggle on with salaries of five and six hundred dollars a year—the average less than that—their struggle well depicted by the Western missionary who says in a letter: "Thank you for your last remittance; until it came we had not any meat in our house for one year, and all last winter, although it was a severe winter, our children wore their summer clothes." And these men of God I find in different parts of the land, struggling against annoyances and exasperations innumerable; some of them week after week entertaining agents who have maps to sell, and submitting themselves to all styles of annoyance, and yet without complaint, and cheerful of soul. How do you account for the fact that these life-insurance men tell us that ministers as a class live longer than any others? It is because of the joy of their work, the joy of the harvest field, the joy of greeting prodigals home to their Father's house.

Oh, we are in sympathy with all innocent hilarities. We can enjoy a hearty song, and we can be merry with the merriest; but those of us who have toiled in the service are ready to testify that all these joys are tame compared with the satisfaction of seeing men enter the kingdom of God. The great eras of every minister are the outpourings of the Holy Ghost, and I thank God I have seen sixteen of them. Thank God, thank God!

IV. I notice also when the prodigal comes back, all earnest

CHRISTIANS REJOICE.

If you stood on Montauk Point and there was a hurricane at sea, and it was blowing toward the shore, and a vessel crashed into the rocks and you saw people get ashore in the life-boats and the very last man got on the rocks in safety, you could not control your joy. And it is a glad time when the Church of God sees men who are tossed on the ocean of their sins plant their feet on the rock Christ Jesus.

Oh, when prodigals come home just hear those Christians sing. It is not a dull tune you have heard in human congregations. Just hear those Christians pray. It is not a stereotyped supplication we have heard over and over again for twenty years, but a putting of the case in the hands of God with an importunate pleading.

NO LONG PRAYERS.

Men never pray at great length unless they have nothing to say and their hearts are hard and cold. All the prayers in the Bible that were answered were short prayers: "God be merciful to me a sinner." "Lord, that I may receive my sight." "Lord, save me or I perish." The longest prayer, Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the temple, less than eight minutes in length, according to the ordinary rate of enunciation.

And just hear them pray now that the prodigals are coming home. Just see them shake hands. No putting forth of the four tips of the fingers in a formal way, but a hearty grasp, where the muscles of the heart seem to clench the fingers of one hand around the other hand. And then see those Christian faces how illumined they are. And see that old man get up and with the same voice that he sang fifty years ago in the old country meeting-house, say, "Now, Lord, lettest Thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation." There was

who was hurried into prison in time of persecution, and one day he got off his shackles and he came and stood by the prison door, and when the jailer was opening the door, with one stroke he struck down the man who had incarcerated him. Passing along the streets of London, he wondered where his family was. He did not dare to ask lest he excite suspicion, but, passing along a little way from the prison, he saw a Keith tankard, a cup that belonged to the family from generation to generation—he saw it in a window. His family, hoping that some day he would get clear, came and lived as near as they could to the prison house, and they set that Keith tankard in the window, hoping he would see it; and he came along and saw it, and knocked at the door, and went in, and the long-absent family were all together again. Oh, if you would start for the kingdom of God to-night, I think some of you would find nearly all your friends and nearly all your families around the holy tankard of the holy communion—fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters around that sacred tankard which commemorates the love of Jesus Christ our Lord. Oh, it will be a great communion day when your whole family sits around the sacred tankard. One on earth, one in heaven.

V. Once more I remark, that when the prodigal gets back the INHABITANTS OF HEAVEN KEEP FESTIVAL.

I am very certain of it. If you have never seen a telegraphic chart, you have no idea how many cities are connected together and how many lands. Nearly all the neighborhoods of the earth seem articulate, and news flies from city to city, and from continent to continent. But more rapidly go the tidings from earth to Heaven, and when a prodigal returns it is announced before the throne of God. And if these souls this morning should enter the kingdom there would be some one in the heavenly kingdom to say: "That's my father," "That's my mother," "That's my father," "That's my mother," "That's my son," "That's my daughter," "That's my friend," "That's the one I used to pray for," "That's the one for whom I wept so many tears," and one soul would say, "Hosanna!" and another soul would say, "Hallelujah!"

"Pleased with the news the saints below

In songs their tongues employ:
Beyond the skies the tidings go,
And Heaven is filled with joy.

Nor angels can their joy contain,
But kindle with new fire;
The sinner lost is found, they sing,
And strike the sounding lyre."

At the banquet of Lucullus sat Cicero the orator, at the Macedonian festal sat Philip the conqueror, at the Grecian banquet sat Socrates the philosopher; but at sit all the returned prodigals, more than conquerors. The table is so wide its leaves reach across seas and across lands. Its guests are the redeemed of earth and the glorified of Heaven. The ring of God's forgiveness on every hand, the robe of a Saviour's righteousness adrop from every shoulder. The wine that glows in the cups is from the bowls of ten thousand sacraments. Let all the redeemed of earth and all the glorified of Heaven rise, and with gleaming chalice drink to the return, of a thousand prodigals. Sing! sing! sing! "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive blessing and riches and honor and glory and power, world without end!"

WITH THE MOHAMMEDAN ANTI-CHRIST.

The Story of his Escaped Captives.

THE great Napoleon Antichrist of the last days, whom Christ will "consume with the spirit of His mouth and destroy with the brightness of His coming" (1 Thess. 2: 8), will be, as we learn by predictions scattered through the Word of God, a curious combination of

A DESPOT AND A COMMUNIST.

How principles so antagonistic can exist at the same time in the same person it is difficult to understand; but the Mahdi appears to be a practical illustration of the possibility of the combination. His sudden rise, his surprising success in inspiring the enthusiasm of the Soudanese, and his declared object of attaining world-wide dominion, also render him a type of the great Antichrist who will arise. He is one of the false Christs whose appearance the Saviour taught us to expect before His own advent and to recognize as one of the signs heralding its near approach (Matt. 24: 24).

A clearer idea than any we have had before of what the Mahdi is, how he governs, what he aims at, and how he, sincerely or hypocritically, uses the superstitious reverence of his followers to further his own ends, is given by the narrative of four men—three Greeks and a Copt—who saw much of him while they were held as his prisoners, but have now escaped. They related their experience to a newspaper correspondent at Massowah, who has given it publication. The escaped prisoners had been established for years as where they were doing a prosperous business, and when the recent troubles broke out they were residing at Ghedarif, and fell with that city into the hands of the Mahdi's followers, who sent them to his camp, together with other Christians captured on the same occasion. There they were forced to become Mussulmans, and detained for some months as unwilling guests, until at last they succeeded in making their escape and reaching the frontiers of Abyssinia, where they were furnished by the people of King John with the means of reaching the coast. During the first days of which followed the capture of Ghedarif, when the town was given over to sack and slaughter, they succeeded in hiding themselves away in an underground grain store. When thirst and hunger at last drove them out of their place of refuge to throw themselves on the mercy of the conqueror, their lives were spared on condition that they pronounced the Mussulman confession of faith, "There is no God but God, and Mahomet is his Prophet," and surrendered all their property and goods and chattels to the Beit-ul-Mal, or Public Treasure House. In the presence of the Mahdi's Ameer they were then stripped of their semi-European clothing, receiving in exchange a long strip of white linen stitched with green and red—the Mahdi's colors—to wind round their loins and throw over their shoulders, a pair of leather sandals for their feet, and a gray felt cap, round which was wound a bit of green and red rag, to replace the fez.

When thus arrayed in the orthodox costume prescribed by the Prophet of the Soudan they were made to recite the confession of faith, and kiss the Ameer's hands. Each of them then received from him two spears, with which they were told to strike the ground three times while uttering the sacramental war cry of the Mahdi's followers, "Kh zebil Allah" ("For the cause of God"). They were then dismissed to their houses, or to what remained of them, after the wholesale work of plunder and destruction which had followed the capture of the place, there to await the Ameer's further pleasure.

Their existence was, however, still by no means free from anxieties and annoyances. Five times a day they were compelled to go forth to the Mosque and join in the public prayers, where they tried to follow and imitate exactly the complicated attitudes and prostrations of their fellow-worshippers. Their attention was stimulated by hard blows administered promptly when they inadvertently blundered. At home at no moment of the day or night were they free from the intrusion of the Mahdi's followers, who dropped in to observe with a jealously vigilant eye whether the neophytes ate and drank and dressed and slept as became good Mussulmans. After a few weeks of this irksome bondage they were told to proceed with the Ameer to the Mahdi's camp, which they joined a few days' march from Khartoum.

The Mahdi, who is always styled by his followers "Saidna el Imamm," which means appears to have received them with consideration. A tent was assigned to them, and an allowance was made to them of fifteen dollars a month per head from the general treasury. Moreover, the Mahdi's personal influence was always exercised to protect them against the ill-will of his over-zealous followers, many of whom were, as is usual in such cases, "more royalist than the royal person himself." Some of the leading lights in the Mahdi's camp, for instance, were much scandalized by the fact that these converts to Islam had not been duly circumcised, but the Mahdi promptly silenced the grumblers by receiving an opportune revelation that circumcision was not compulsory on adult converts. He occasionally favored them with his conversation, and used to make numerous inquiries about Constantinople, which after Cairo and Mecca, seems to be the goal of his ambition, though, as he places it on the confines of Hindostan, his geographical notions are evidently vague.

The Mahdi has followed the precedent of Mohammed and set himself above the general law which limits the number of a Mussulman's legitimate wives to four, but in all other respects he lives as simply and unostentatiously as the rank and file of his followers, and strictly observes the stringent discipline to which he has subjected their mode and manner of life. The use of tobacco, snuff, and intoxicating drinks is absolutely forbidden. Even sugar, spices, and sweet sherberts are looked upon as savoring of ungodliness. Sumptuary laws have been enacted prescribing the material, color, cut, and shape of every garment which a true believer may wear, and the possession even of any article of raiment of Egyptian or European origin or fashion is punished with a given number of strokes of the koorbash.

Altogether the régime inaugurated by the Mahdi seems to favor strongly of state socialism, with a dash of COMMUNISM.

His paternal influence asserts itself in every detail of domestic and social life, and if the restrictions he imposes are sometimes irksome, he has provided ample compensation for the multitude in the unlimited prospect of plunder in this world and felicity in the next which he promises to his followers. All rents, all taxes, even the Koranic tithes, are abolished. The nationalization of land has been consummated in the most thorough-going fashion. Every vestige of the former bureaucracy down to the humble Sheikh-Beled, or village elder, has been swept away, and in its place has been substituted the sole authority of the Mahdi's Ameer or lieutenants, who wield despotic power in each district. The one great institution is the Beit-ul-Mal, or revived from the earliest Mohammedan traditions, into which are swept the plunder taken from the enemy, the property confiscated from Christians and other suspects, the voluntary offerings of devoted followers, and the forced contributions levied upon those whose zeal is more backward.

The last-named source of revenue is chiefly derived from the merchants, who, even though they be Mussulmans, appear to be under the Mahdi's special ban. By these means the Beit-ul-Mal is always kept sufficiently replenished to provide for the requirements of the Mahdi's followers, and during the whole time the four prisoners were in the rebel camp around Omdurman there was never any lack either of provisions or of money.

The enthusiasm of the Dervishes appeared to be wrought up to the highest pitch by the Prophet's and to be in no way abated by the repeated checks they experienced before Omdurman. To account, however, for the stubborn resistance which General Gordon successfully opposed to the Prince of the Faith, he was fain to explain that Gordon was no ordinary unbeliever, but the Antichrist himself, spoken of in the prophetic passages of the Koran, whom the Mahdi is destined to overthrow before the establishment of the Islamic millennium.

CRUEL CHEAPNESS.

By Archibald G. Brown.

[In the great cities of the United States we have entered upon a course of pauperization, the consequences of which we have not yet realized. Few citizens are aware how low are the wages paid to women who toil with their needle for their daily bread. A few inquiries will prove that here where the cost of living is double that of living in Europe, the wages paid to needlewomen is almost as low. The evil is a serious one. A few years more and we shall find out that it is too late to remedy it. Perhaps the following appeal from the eminent Baptist minister of London may arouse Christians here to an effort to check the evil before it reaches the desperate stage it has reached in England.—Ed.]

"CHEAP!" "Very cheap!" "Remarkably cheap!" "Astonishingly cheap!" Who has not read or heard these words times without number? To many there must be music in this one-syllable word, for it flows so glibly, so gladly from the lip. To say that anything is "cheap" is counted the highest commendation that can be uttered. The article at once becomes invested with a charming attractiveness; peculiar pleasure is experienced in its purchase, and yet greater pleasure in telling of the skillful bargain. The "cheap" house is praised to the skies, and patronized from far and near. "Cheap!" It is the peroration of many a laudation. The garment is not only "well cut, well made, and well finished, but is so cheap." This is a climax. It were folly to try and add another word. What more can any one want?

This style of doing business is contagious, and when a few have caught the infection, it becomes compulsory with the many. One cannot afford to let the other out-bid him.

A WAR OF PRICES

is carried on. Every lowering of figure in one house is answered by a similar reduction in the other. Competition becomes keener, and the houses do what is called a "cutting" trade—in other words, "cutting their own and their neighbors' throats at the same time."

Many who read these lines will doubtless reply, "True; but the public reaps the benefit by everything being cheap." Who is this "public," so distinct from every trade and class you can mention, which profits by others' losses? There is no such body. We are all so linked in social life that no one class can isolate itself, and look upon the rest as making up the public. The social body is not one member, but many. It takes all to make the public. In the body politic no one member can say, "I have no need of thee." Indeed, those members of the body which seem to be more feeble are most necessary.

The "public" can never gain by others' losses, whatever individual schemers may do. I confess to a growing hatred to the word "cheap." So far from being an angel of mercy, it often appears to my eyes as a blood-stained tyrant. Let those who find comfort in things being cheap make a little inquiry, and find out how it is that they are so. Their comfort will soon depart, and their present solace become their sorrow.

A few lines back I spoke of the cutting trade, and the ever lowering prices ticketed upon the goods. Does my reader know what that means? Has he ever looked into the well set-out window, read the bold figures, and thought what a mercy things are so cheap? I tell him that, if he knew all, he would turn with shuddering from figures that ought to be written with blood—and in heaven's sight are. He only sees the victory of cheapness; he does not behold the battle-field that has won it.

Each fierce charge in the war of competition which has succeeded in forcing back the prices, has only won by forcing down the wages of the workers, who make a large portion of the public supposed to be benefited by the reduction. The pressure of that forcing down is passed on from class to class. The poor bid against the poorer, and the hungry against the starving. The complacent purchaser says, "It is cheap." The frenzied woman, with her tattered children, cries, "IT IS DEATH."

I write that I do know, and see, and hear.

I charge also the word "cheap" with being a lie. If the money paid were all the article cost, perhaps the purchaser might congratulate himself on having obtained it cheaply. But when boasting of his bargain, let him remember that others have paid a price which must be added to his money. The real price of the article is what he gave for it, plus what others suffered for it. Ticket it rightly, and it will stand—"So much money and so much misery. So much cash and so much life-blood. So many shillings and so many sighs. So many pence and so much prostitution!"

Start not in anger! It is simply true. I am only telling a fact. It is no alliterative fancy.

RUINED GIRLHOOD

must be reckoned in the price. The child's suit, with its careful braiding, does not look so cheap when you add this item. No, nor shirts and jackets, and baby hats, and lawn-tennis aprons, and children's frocks, and a host of other things beside. The true value of any article is what it costs, not what it fetches. How much "buying on the cheap" is responsible for fallen virtue, only God knows. The marvel to me is, not that there are so many seeking a livelihood upon the streets, but that so many, in spite of want and hardship, still hold with tenacious grip the innocence of childhood. Nothing is cheap that is bought at the cost of misery, weariness, hopelessness, and virtue.

Having thus written, I wish it distinctly to be understood, that I do not level any charge against manufacturers, nor insinuate that low wages are the result of heartless greed, and a desire for exorbitant profits. I deeply regret that some have, by their unguarded utterances, rather more than insinuated such an explanation of affairs. While such examples are doubtless to be found, I believe them to be exceedingly rare. The fact is, that employers, as well as employed, are sufferers. It is in which both are working. Through the smallness of profits, the manufacturer has to do two or three times as much trade as he had a few years ago, in order to realize the same income. He naturally tries to do it; so do all the rest. The consequence is, enormous over-production. This reduces prices still further. Thus, cheapness demands quantity, and quantity produces greater cheapness. They act and react on one another. In the fierce fight of competition, without any deliberate intention, the weak are trodden down. This is grievous, and ought not to be, for it is a violation of Christ's law; but let us not impute motives or judge harshly. Thousands of employers are being carried along in a rush they have no power to stem.

SOMETHING MUST BE DONE—

done quickly, and on a large scale! What is that something? This is a question hard to answer. It is always far easier to see a difficulty than point a way out of it. Yet is there one remedy I venture to suggest. It is one I have frequently advocated and hold by more strongly than ever: "Let teaching a trade be considered a necessary part of the national education of a lad." It was so with the Jewish nation. "To the Greeks and Romans all mechanical trade appeared mean, vulgar, contemptible, and was therefore left to slaves. The Jews, with a truer and nobler wisdom, enacted that every boy should learn a trade."

It is the mass of unskilled labor that fills our slums and constitutes a national danger and disgrace, and this will never be removed by mental training only. Last week a child of thirteen stood in the doorway of a house near by. It was filthy, dirty, ragged in garments, with toes looking through the rotten shoes. In answer to the question, "What are you doing at school?" the reply was, "Decimal fractions, please, sir." Poor little creature! It looked a decimal fraction itself. Would it not be striking at the very root of the evil if, with the decimal fractions, we taught the use of saw, chisel, and file, etc.?

I have little hope of anything being done with the fathers and mothers, but we may save their children from sinking into the slough after them. Trade education, combined with State-directed emigration, would, in my judgment, go far to eradicate the evil.

It is recorded of Christ that, in helping the helpless one, "He took him by the hand." There are thin, tired hands all around us. Let them feel our grasp.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Christ Versus a Fortune.—At a Recent Meeting Mr. McFarlane said: "I was speaking to a man one night about his soul. After I had urged Christ upon him, he said: 'No, I will not accept Christ to-night; I will go home and think about it.' 'Go home and think about it!' I rejoined; 'how dare you treat Christ in so careless a way? If I were to offer you a fortune just now, would you tell me you would go home and think about it?' 'Oh, no,' he said, 'I would take it at once.' Oh friends, think of it! he would take a fortune rather than the Lord Jesus Christ! May God have mercy upon all who thus cheat themselves and dishonor Him!"

How an Injured Blood-Vessel was Healed.—A Christian worker narrated: "Some time ago I burst a blood-vessel, and I was at once taken to the Infirmary. I put myself entirely into the Lord's hands, telling Him that I was willing to die or to live, whichever was His blessed will. I had such confidence in the Lord that I kept calm and peaceful through all my illness. God revealed Himself so much to me that I had a blessed time of it. After I recovered, the doctors told me that if it had not been for my entire trust in God, I would not have recovered. And now, dear friends, I am here, a living witness, to thank the Lord for that illness, for it was supereminently blessed to my soul."

Snatched from Suicide.—Mr. Simpson Related: "In the month of March of last year a gentleman was standing at the edge of a pond, at two o'clock in the morning, ready to plunge into the water to put an end to his life. While he was about to take the fatal leap a thought struck him. 'When my dead body is found they will not know who I am, or to whom I belong; and putting his hand into his pocket he drew forth a piece of paper for the purpose of writing his name on it. It was a tract which some one had given him, and it being a beautiful moonlight night, he could easily read the words at the top of the tract, which were, 'Where shall I spend eternity?' He read the words aloud, and then turned from the pond. He has since given his heart to the Lord, and is rejoicing in the unspeakable riches of Jesus Christ."

End of Two Sailors' Pleasure.—The Rev. Mr. Evans told the following: "A young sailor with his ship came into Cardiff in the month of November, and when he landed he leaped about for very joy because he was going to spend his Christmas there. Looking at that morning's paper, he exclaimed, 'Ah, mates, my brother's ship will be here in a few hours, and a rare and happy day we will have together.' The young man could scarcely contain himself; he walked about impatiently for his brother's arrival. Ah! he did not see what was just before them, or his joy would have turned into mourning. The ship at length arrived, and the brothers met and shook each other warmly by the hand, and went to seek their day's pleasure; but before twelve o'clock that night they were both committed to prison on a charge of murder. They had gone to a rum shop first, thinking that the greatest pleasure could be found there. A heated quarrel ensued, and this was the sad end of it." "The way of transgressors is hard."

A Very Common Mistake.—Mr. Jack Related this narrative of an incident in actual life: "I was speaking to a gentleman who has an extensive business to attend to, and he said to me, 'I can trust God for my eternal welfare without the least shadow of a doubt; and when I am among my machinery I have implicit confidence in Him for my life; but do what I will, I cannot trust Him with my temporal matters. I have tried again and again, and I find I cannot trust Him.' And that business man sometimes suffers the greatest agonies in consequence of his business, and yet he does not—he says he cannot—trust God. I think such a person is to be pitied. How many there are like him! And yet the Lord is willing to manage everything connected with our temporal affairs, in the business or the family, if only we will let Him."

A Converted Circus Performer.—An Evangelist tells us of "a young man who lived a quiet and peaceful life, and was brought up by godly parents. He went to a northern commercial city, and joined himself to a circus company. They were not in the habit of drinking to excess, but they sometimes met together to have a glass of beer and talk of the events of the evening. This young man said to me: 'I never got drunk but once, and on that occasion when I went home I dropped on my knees and repeated the prayer that my mother had taught me. I don't know what impelled me to pray, for I had not prayed for years; I had been trying to live without God. At any rate, this prayer awoke old memories, which caused me to think of the sinful life I was leading, and made me turn to the Saviour. Such is the power of a mother's prayer.' Very soon this young man is going as a missionary to a foreign land to preach the Gospel of Christ to others."

An Entry in a Young Lady's Diary.—A well-known Christian worker in the North related the following: "A young lady came into one of Mr. Moody's meetings, and went away very much troubled about her sins. When she went home she wandered about the house, taking pleasure in nothing, trying one thing after another to put to silence the thoughts that had been stirred within her. At length she thought, 'I must make up my mind to do something to get rest, for this is agony,' and taking her diary she said, 'I will write in here that I will give myself to the Lord in two years, for I cannot give up the pleasures of the world yet; I am young, and there is time enough.' But again, she thought, 'Two years is a long time; I might die before they expired, and then what would become of my soul? I would give myself to the Lord just now, but I must go to that ball next week.' Thus she argued with herself, and in her diary she wrote, 'I will give myself to the Lord next week.' Her mind was now at rest, and she went to the ball with a light heart, and was one of the gayest of the company; but she came home heated from it, and caught cold, and within a few days she was tossing about on her bed quite unconscious, and said, 'Mother, how long have I been ill?' 'Just a week to-day, Mary,' answered her mother. 'Just a week too late!' Mary exclaimed. 'O mother, I'm lost; and with these awful words upon her lips she died.'

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

President Cleveland has Disappointed the hopes of Democrats who expected prompt and extensive removals in the civil service. Last week only four important changes were made. They were the nomination of Joseph S. Miller, of West Virginia, to be Commissioner of Internal Revenue; Malcolm Hay, of Pennsylvania, for First Assistant Postmaster-General; Milton J. Durham, of Kentucky, for First Controller of the Treasury, and Martin V. Montgomery, of Michigan, for Commissioner of Patents. All these nominations were approved by the Republican press and by a large section of the Democratic journals. The nominees are described as capable men, whose fitness for their respective offices is more conspicuous than their political qualifications. One appointment made since the inauguration alone is condemned, and the newspapers of both parties disapprove it. It is for the office of appointment clerk in the Treasury, to which Eugene Higgins, of Baltimore, is appointed. The most severe strictures on the selection come from Maryland, and efforts are being made to have it cancelled.

Two Government Departments are to be thoroughly overhauled, with the object of putting them on a more efficient and economical basis. Mr. Manning has placed the work in the Treasury in the hands of a commission composed of Messrs. Fairchild, Coon, and E. O. Graves. Mr. Fairchild is a new-comer, but Mr. Coon and Mr. Graves are both familiar with the business of the department, and are both Republicans. Mr. Whitney has engaged the services of a New York accountant to examine the books of the Navy Department, not with a view of discovering irregularities as much as to introduce a more systematic and careful system of keeping the accounts. It is possible that discoveries may be made, as it is stated that "points" have been supplied voluntarily by persons employed in the department some years ago. It is a significant fact that the Secretary declined last week to authorize the payment of the final instalment for the new despatch boat "Dolphin," which John Roach has been building. He wished, he said, to look over the contract a little, examine bills, and satisfy himself that Mr. Roach has fulfilled all the terms of his contract before authorizing payment. If Mr. Whitney adheres to that system he will never become so popular with contractors as Mr. Robeson was, but perhaps the country may have a navy worthy the name.

The Court-Martial on General Hazen concluded the hearing of testimony last week and has now to consider its verdict. The responsibility of General Hazen for the disaster at Cape Sabine was unhappily not a question for its consideration. Its inquiry was limited to the question of whether General Hazen committed an offense in making public strictures on the conduct of Secretary Lincoln. There is no doubt about the strictures being made, but General Hazen contended that the sending of relief to the Greely party was in the immediate charge of the President, and that the decision of the Secretary of War against sending an expedition in the autumn of 1883, after Garlington's return, was therefore not made "in the performance of official duty." Consequently a criticism of that decision was not an offense under the articles of war. He further argued that it was not a criticism of an act of military administration, as it related to the nautical question whether Melville Bay was navigable in October. The public is not greatly concerned in this settlement of the question of discipline, but it would be much interested in knowing who is responsible for the lives lost through an evident blunder on the part of some one in office.

The Dissensions in the Republican Camp in New York show no signs of being healed. Last week the Republican County Committee decided that a large number of prominent members of the party, including ex-Governor Alonzo B. Cornell, William Dowd, Thomas C. Acton, John I. Davenport, and Charles T. Wing, have lost their right to enroll as Republicans and cannot participate in the primaries. The Committee on Appeals considered the action of the County Committee and approved it. The reason given for excluding Governor Cornell was that he refused to answer the question whether he voted for the Republican Presidential electors in 1884. In another case the appellant declared that he was unable to vote for the Republican electors, but that, nevertheless, he was a Republican. The committee excluded him also. Some protests are heard against these acts of the committee from Republicans, who think this a bad time to exclude any one from the party, especially members so eminent as those now ruled out. They contend that it is more important to secure the success of the party in the State than to punish the members of it who were "unable" to vote for Blaine.

An Amicable Settlement of the Extensive railroad strike in the West has been effected through the mediation of the Governors of Kansas and Missouri, who advised the companies to restore to their striking employes the same rate of wages paid previous to the recent ten per cent reduction, including one and one half price for extra time worked. The railroad managers accepted this basis of agreement. The strikers throughout the contest maintained a quiet and peaceable demeanor and won the respect and sympathy of the people by their moderation. No intimidation was used at any place.

A Battle was Fought near Suakin on Thursday by the English forces under General Graham against Osman Digna's army. The encounter, though represented as a British victory, appears to have been really a drawn battle. The engagement lasted five hours. The marines were first sent to the front to drive the Arabs from the hills west of Hasheen. As soon as possible they were re-enforced by batteries of Gardner and Krupp guns and by cavalry. There was a hot engagement, during which the British cavalry charged repeatedly upon the Arabs, while the machine guns were worked with deadly effect whenever their fire could be made available. Great bravery was displayed on both sides. At the end of the engagement the Arabs retreated slowly toward Tamai. The valor of the Arabs is described as extraordinary. For more than two hours victory for them seemed certain. The British superiority in artillery at last turned the tide, but the Arabs retreated unmolested and in good order. This battle renders it clear that the attempt to reach Berber from Suakin will be a hazardous and costly one.

War between England and Russia is still considered probable in European capitals. The London correspondent of the New York Times cables to that journal that "the situation could hardly be in a more critical and menacing stage than it is in now. I find among politicians that the better informed a man is the more firmly he believes that the outcome must inevitably be war. The only way out of it is an abject and complete surrender on the part of England, and that the country would not tolerate the bare thought of." The Ameer of Afghanistan has gone on a visit to Lord Dufferin, the Viceroy of India, which will, it is expected, lead to an extension of British influence over him. Nevertheless he is a man unworthy of confidence and is capable of surrendering to Russia if he sees his interest in that course. Between his two mighty neighbors the Ameer is in an embarrassing position, and he appears to be in doubt, as he naturally may be, as to the wisest step to take. Both in England and India preparations for war are being actively pressed forward. Russia, too, is trying to raise money and is massing troops on the Afghan frontiers. It may be hoped that in spite of these ominous signs war may yet be providentially averted.

Mr. Parnell's Manifesto on the Visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Ireland has been declared a treasonable document by the law officers of the government. The manifesto was an expression of the attitude Mr. Parnell considered proper to be observed by the National League toward the Prince of Wales during his coming visit to Ireland. It advised nationalists to maintain an attitude of reserve, to make no hostile demonstrations and no expressions of welcome, and declared that the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Ireland was inopportune while an unspeakably indecent coterie remained in possession of Dublin Castle. The decision of the government on the course it will pursue toward Mr. Parnell is awaited with anxiety. It would be a most imprudent act to arrest Mr. Parnell and try him for treason just as the royal visit is to take place.

The Emperor of Germany Celebrated his eighty-eighth birthday on Sunday last. The sacred character of the day was disregarded, and it was kept in Berlin as a popular holiday. The city wore a festival appearance, thousands of flags flying from public and private buildings. About a hundred princely persons were present, including the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, and the King of Saxony, to whom the Crown Prince and suite attended the greatest attention. The Duke of Genoa went as representative for King Humbert. All the distinguished guests called on the Chancellor, the Prince of Wales staying nearly an hour with him. The Prince wore the uniform of a Prussian hussar. The aged Emperor appeared to be in excellent health, and on Saturday he entertained his princely guests at dinner. On Sunday Prince Bismarck gave a grand entertainment in honor of the day. Two hundred guests were invited.

The French Government has made Overtures of peace to China. A dispatch to the New York Herald states that the French Government has intimated to the Chinese Minister at Berlin that it considers a renewal of peace negotiations desirable. To this intimation the Minister replied that China would never pay the indemnity demanded by France for the affair at Langson. In view of this reply the St. James Gazette concludes that if negotiations for peace are resumed they will be resumed on the basis of a complete cession of Tonquin to the French. China, the Gazette says, will not permit the temporary occupation of Formosa.

The Ohio Divorce Statistics Show that that State is not behind others in this serious evil. In its recently issued report, the Ohio Divorce Reform League states that since 1870 the number of divorces granted annually has increased ninety-five per cent. In 1883 the ratio of divorces to marriages in Ashtabula County was one divorce to every four marriages; in three other counties one to five; in nine counties one to seven; and in forty-three counties one to ten. The League, in view of these startling facts, is agitating for greater stringency in the Ohio divorce law, and especially for the repeal of the clause granting divorce for the vague cause of "gross neglect of duty" under which many divorces are claimed. The need of a uniform divorce law for all the States is apparent, and might be effected if Congress would pass such a law as would serve as a model for the State Legislatures.

A Death from Roller-Skating was Reported last week. Joseph Cohen, one of the most graceful of the skaters who took part in the recent six days' contest in Madison Square Garden, New York, died on Sunday, March 15th. During the contest he skated five hundred and forty-eight miles. He looked tired and dispirited, and seemed much disappointed at being last in the race. He fell ill on March 11th, and soon became delirious. His thoughts were running on the race, and he was continually calling out to have his record marked up. After his death an autopsy was made which showed that he had died from acute spinal meningitis, the result of the skating.

A Test Case has been Decided under the Prohibition Amendment by the Supreme Court of Iowa. A saloon-keeper of Des Moines paid no heed to the new law, and after the usual remedies had failed, an injunction was served against him in the Circuit Court. The saloon-keeper was backed by the Brewers' Association, and in effect it became a test case. In the lower court the application was for a permanent injunction, which was resisted on the ground that the defendant was estopped by the proceedings from demanding a jury. The objection was overruled by the lower court, and an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, which on March 17th sustained the court below and affirmed the validity of the sections of the new liquor law allowing injunctions to be issued against both saloons and saloon-keepers. This decision will strengthen the hands of the Prohibitionists by providing them with an efficient weapon against transgressors.

Dr. Talmage has Returned from his Tour in the West with hopeful prognostications. In the course of his Friday evening talk, on March 20th, he said: "I return to report a great revival of religion in many cities as well as our own, and business slowly but surely improving, and that the almost universal opinion is that we are on the eve of restored prosperity. All classes of fair-minded people are willing to give the new administration at Washington a fair hearing." He then spoke of what he termed the four episodes in American politics of to-day. The first episode, he said, was the unparalleled geniality with which President Arthur bowed himself out and his successor in. "There are millions of people in the North, South, East and West, and on both sides of the sea, myself among them," said Dr. Talmage, "who think we never had a better President." The second episode," he said, "was the mother's Bible on which President Cleveland took the oath of office. The unthinking," said he, "might call it a mere sentimentality, but to me it means more than words can express. It means, first, the faithful remembrance of a departed one, as much as to say, if it were not for her this honor would never have come to me; and next it means, May my mother's God help me in this tremendous responsibility! Make way for the administration that starts from the worn and faded lids of a Bible presented by a mother's hands at parting." The third episode was Mr. Blaine's visit to President Cleveland. The fourth episode, he said, was putting General Grant's name on the retired list. Concluding, he said: "May God alleviate the distress of the ex-Commander-in-Chief, give him strength to put reliance in the remembrance of the Scripture passage, 'No discharge in that war.' The conqueror on the pale horse rides down our former military chief."

Genuine Counterfeit Money is in Extensive circulation. Warning was given last week that a large number of spurious half dollars were in use. Business men call them "genuine counterfeits," because they are identical in size, weight, and composition with those from the Government mints. Counterfeiting of this sort is exceedingly profitable when done on a large scale, as detection is practically impossible. It is believed that most of the metal used is from remelted trade dollars. By the purchase of these in large quantities the counterfeiters obtain the metal already mixed at just the standard alloy. The market price of one hundred trade dollars is $84, and the metal in them is sufficient to make two hundred and seventeen standard half dollars, which gives a profit of $24.50. The coins pass readily in the course of trade, neither the public nor the merchant detects them, but when they go to the Treasury or the mint, where the genuine coins are made, they are quickly found out. It is so with human imposture. Ministers and churches and the world frequently think the hypocrite a genuine Christian, but when he appears before God he will certainly be unmasked (Matt. 7: 22, 23).

Compensation after Seventy-two Years is to be made by the Federal Government to a citizen of Georgia. A despatch from Americus, Ga. states that in 1813 the Washington Government seized two ships belonging to a prosperous merchant of Baltimore, Md., and impressed them for service in the war. The value of them was $200,000, but the merchant was never able to collect his claim. His son and grandson endeavored to recover payment, but were unable to prove their right, owing to the absence of certain papers in which the obligations of the government were admitted. The great-grandson of the merchant received a few days ago a letter from R. T. Merrick, of Washington, telling him that the long-missing papers have been found in the files of the Navy Department, and that not only is he secure in his claim for the $200,000, but that he can collect seventy-two years' interest in addition. It may be supposed he will lose no time in applying for the large sum of money to which he is entitled. Men are usually prompt in such matters, though the offer of eternal riches in the Gospel needs to be pressed on their acceptance and frequently is neglected until too late (Matt. 6: 19, 20).

An Infuriated Elephant was Subdued at Forepaugh's Menagerie, in Philadelphia, recently by an ingenious method. Among four elephants shipped to this country two months ago was one named Ajax, who seemed sullen when he arrived. He was chained up and submitted quietly, but was always regarded as a vicious beast. At the end of last month he grew violent, and one night broke his chains, burst down the iron-bound doors of his room, and effected an entrance into another part of the menagerie, where he did much mischief. It was found difficult to secure him, but eventually he was chained again. His temper, however, continued violent, and it was dangerous to approach him. Such an elephant is a constant source of terror until his spirit is subdued and he learns that resistance to man is useless. Very cruel means are sometimes employed to enforce this lesson, but Mr. Forepaugh resolved to avoid them. Leather bands of enormous strength were passed under the animal and attached to stout chains, which were drawn over pulleys fixed in the roof. The next time Ajax became violent he was raised from the ground and suspended a few feet from the floor. The huge beast was as helpless as a child, and was allowed to butt the air and plunge and kick as he pleased. He was let down when he grew weary; but when he again became violent he was quietly hoisted. A short experience, in which he suffered no pain except from his temper, completely conquered him, and he has become docile. If men would observe the providences of God they would see that He designs them to learn the identical lesson the elephant was taught. Those suffer least who most quickly learn complete submission to the will of God. Rebellion entails suffering in this world and the next, and will eventually be completely subdued (Phil. 2: 10).

How Lives were Saved by a Fire is Explained by Dr. Hughes in the current number of The Alienist. He says that "during the week of the great St. Louis fire, in 1849, the ravages of cholera, which up to that event had reached a mortality of over two hundred a day out of a population of fifty thousand, almost entirely ceased, so stimulating and invigorating was the excitement of that week to the brains and nervous systems of the people, and the physical exaltation inseparable from the sudden necessity thrown upon so many business men for repairing the sudden damage and re-establishing their abruptly interrupted business." A similar effect is observable in spiritual life. It is not those who are actively engaged in Christian work who fall into scepticism and spiritual darkness, but those who seldom do anything to help the cause of Christ in the world. The idle man is Satan's easiest prey (Heb. 6: 4-12).

The Osteotome is a New Surgical Instrument invented by a professor in the New York University. It is designed for the treatment of diseases in the joints, such as hip disease. The instrument is similar in its mode of operating to the instruments used by dentists in scraping out the diseased cavities of teeth. It is operated by electricity and is capable of making twelve thousand revolutions per minute. It is designed to leave the patient's joint as useful as it was before being attacked with the disease. The instrument, as shown last week in operation, has an auger with a circular blade, which, when rapidly revolved by electric power, excavated all the diseased part of the bone without touching the delicate articular surface. The operation is described as inconceivably painful, but as it successfully removes the diseased parts of the bone, there are many sufferers who will brace up their courage to undergo it. Acute suffering for a short time is preferable to lifelong agony, ending in permanent disability or death. It is so in our moral nature. The afflictions God sends upon His children are often intended to act as the osteotome, removing the parts on which the spiritual disease of sin has fastened. The suffering is hard to bear, but its results are of eternal benefit (Mal. 3: 3).

A Marriage in a Police Court in New York last week ended a painful trial. A man was arraigned for wounding the young woman to whom he was engaged to be married. Last November he had an altercation with her in the street, and in a fit of ungovernable rage he drew his pistol and shot her in the mouth, making an ugly wound. She has been in the hospital since then, but being cured, was taken to court to give evidence against her assailant. She refused to testify, and when the Judge questioned her, it appeared she still loved the man. "Are you willing to marry him?" said the magistrate, addressing the woman. "Yes, sir," she answered, with a blush. "Will you take her for your wife? The Justice asked the prisoner. "I will only be too glad to have the opportunity," he replied, frankly. "Then go into my room." They did as they were requested, and in a few minutes they were made man and wife. The bridegroom seemed overwhelmed with joy and solemnly promised to be a kind husband. He will be an ungrateful monster if he breaks his promise, for his wife has given a noble proof of her love to him by not only forgiving him, but taking him for her husband. Such magnanimity in an infinitely greater degree God shows to those whom he receives as His sons. Having had much forgiven they love much (Luke 7: 47).

EXCEEDING GLADNESS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For thou hast made him most blessed forever: thou hast made him exceeding glad with thy countenance."—PSALM 21: 6.

The Man of Sorrows—Also a Man of Joys—His Joy in Doing Good—In Finished Work—The Source of Joy to Men—Joy in Conversions—In the Deeds of His Followers—In their Suffering—I. Gladness the Privilege of Saints—Present Solaces—Brilliant Future—Blessings Secure—II. Gladness of Peculiar Sort—The Worst Side Foremost—Knights of Rueil Countenance—The Facts of the Case.

YOU have heard a great many sermons upon the Man of Sorrows. I am sure that you have not heard too many; and if, from this time to the end of your life, you should every Sabbath hear of Him, and of His sufferings, you will not be nauseated with that theme. You will still feel an intense pleasure in hearing the story of your Lord's griefs, and in having fellowship with Him in His sufferings, for by His agonies and death He has redeemed you unto Himself. Probably you have never listened to a discourse upon

"THE MAN OF JOYS!"

I venture thus to name the Christ of God. We do not often enough meditate upon the happiness of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Remember that it was for the joy that was set before Him that He endured the cross, despising the shame; and the expectation of joy is joy. The light of His coming reward shone on our Lord's daily path, and made it bright with a glorious hope. Sin is the mother of sorrow, and Jesus knew no sin; conscience never made Him a coward; remorse never pricked His heart; malice, envy, and discontent never gnawed at His soul. He was the Prince of Peace, even when He was despised and rejected of men. Deep as were His griefs, we may reckon Jesus of Nazareth among the happiest of men. There was nothing of that efflorescence, that effervescence, that froth of joy, which carnal men value so highly; but there was a deep peace, a calm content, which is beyond all price. Jesus did not enter into such mirth as might have befitted Herod's palace, or Dives's gilded saloons, or Cæsar's luxurious banquets; but He knew such joy as the Son of God must know when His Father heareth Him always, and as the Saviour of men must know when His every word and act are blessing a fallen race.

A man cannot be full of such benevolence as that which filled the heart of Christ, and yet be utterly miserable. Unselfishness brings with it necessarily a measure of joy. A man could not open blind eyes, and unstop deaf ears, make lame men leap, heal lepers, and raise the dead, and yet remain comfortless himself; as well suppose that the sun, which scatters so much heat, may be itself a huge globe of ice. The fountain which yields such streams of blessing has its own flash and sparkle; we feel sure of it. As pearls may lie in plenty in caverns, over which there rolls a dread tempestuous sea, so there slept in the heart of Jesus treasures of joy, even when the ocean of His holy soul was lashed with hurricanes of woe. There is which cannot be separated from the doing of the good; and the Saviour possessed it beyond conception. There is a joy in living entirely out of one's self for the good of others, and this Jesus drank to the full. There is a joy in achieving a great purpose, even when it is only by sorrow that our design is wrought out, and that also our Redeemer knew. In Him was perfectly explained that enigma of Paul, "As sorrowful, yet always rejoicing."

I need not enter into the joy of Christ as God, for this is inseparable from His Godhead; but I speak of Him now as Mediator, in His complex person standing between God and man. In that capacity, as risen from the dead, and gone into glory, He is supremely glad—glad because

HIS WORK IS FINISHED.

Such a work as His had so taken up His whole heart, and engrossed His whole being, that it became a baptism to be baptized with, and He was straitened until it was accomplished. It is accomplished now, and the straitening is ended.

Nor is this all, for Jesus Christ our Lord rejoices to think that now, from this day forth, God has made Him to be the fountain of priceless, numberless, endless blessings to men. Observe the first clause of our text, and remember that it may be read thus: "Thou hast made Him blessings forever"—that is to say, God has now opened in His Son Jesus Christ, a well of blessings, which will never cease to flow as long as there are men to drink thereat. He is no curse to men, but only blessing; He is not one blessing only, but all blessings; these blessings are the chief boons that even God can give, and they are in Christ Jesus to all eternity. The Lord Jesus, who was once the centre of grief, has now become the source of love, favor, help, healing, benediction, delight, heaven, and whatever else may be called blessing. Whenever God makes any one of you to be to other people, are you not very happy? Yes, certainly, in your measure. But what must be the superlative gladness of the Christ in being the centre of centres, the fountain of fountains, to all those who draw near to Him?

Our Lord has joy beyond this. I want you to think much of His gladness that you may be able to obey Him now, should He say to you, "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." At this very hour may His joy be in you, that your joy may be full. Jesus sympathizes with you in your sorrows; will you not sympathize with Him in His joys? Should we not rejoice with them that do rejoice, and especially with Him, the Bridegroom of our souls? This is a further part of His gladness—He joys in the conversion, the comfort, the justification, the salvation of every soul that comes to Him. "There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth."

Moreover, I believe that Jesus in glory finds great joy in all the deeds of His saved people. Whenever He sees one of His believing people counting His reproach to be greater riches than all the treasures of Egypt, our Lord is glad. When He sees a heart that has been washed in His blood true to Him, refusing to believe false doctrine, or to do that which is unjust, then is Christ glad over His disciple. When He sees you plotting and planning how you can honor Him, when He marks your self-denials, when He sees you prayerful, earnest, active, spiritual, loving, His gladness is great. I tell you all the love you have to Him He delights in; and your childlike confidence in Him, and your little struggling light which seeks after more light, and your earnest longings for His coming and His kingdom, and those broken words of yours by which you speak to others of His love—all those things He sees with exquisite pleasure.

Moreover—and I speak gently and softly here—I believe that our Master derives

A DIVINE SATISFACTION
